Bush said he was satisfied with those assurances. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaeda, I believe him," he said.

Both presidents were asked about Musharraf's claim -- to be aired Sunday on CBS's "60 Minutes" -- that former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage had issued a "Stone Age" bombing threat in the days after Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush said he was "taken aback by the harshness of the words" attributed to Armitage but had no knowledge of such a threat. He said the first he heard of it was in the newspaper Friday.

Armitage categorically denied it. "I've never made a threat in my life that I couldn't back up," he told CNN, "and since I wasn't authorized to say such a thing and hence couldn't back up that threat, I never said it." Asked separately to comment on the report, Armitage's then-boss, former secretary of state Colin L. Powell, said there was "no such bombing threat."

The CBS interview is part of Musharraf's own promotion for U.S. publication of his memoirs next week. Musharraf said at the news conference that he could reveal no more because he was "honor-bound" to his publisher, Simon & Schuster, to keep the book under wraps until next week -- an assertion that seemed to amuse President Bush.

As he shook hands with Musharraf after the news conference, Bush smiled and told reporters, "Buy the book."

In the "60 Minutes" interview, Musharraf said that Armitage made the threat to Lt. Gen. Mahmood Ahmed, Pakistan's intelligence chief, the day after the Sept. 11 attacks by al-Qaeda. Pakistan was one of only three nations that maintained diplomatic relations with the Taliban government in Afghanistan, and al-Qaeda members were known to move freely in the mountainous border area between the two countries.

As was publicly reported shortly after their meeting, Armitage told Mahmood that Pakistan would have to choose sides between the Taliban and the United States, which wanted it to cut all ties with the Afghans and cooperate with planned retaliation for the attacks. Armitage described it yesterday as "a very straightforward conversation" held in his State Department office. "I told him that for Americans this was black or white, that Pakistan was either with us fully or not. It wasn't a matter of being able to negotiate it."

Musharraf's promise yesterday of greater cooperation in fighting the Taliban drew mixed reaction from outside experts on the region, who noted that militia commanders continue to operate in the Pakistani provincial capital Quetta -- with the tacit approval of the Pakistani government. "The problem is Musharraf is proving to be an incredibly grudging ally," said Robert Templer, director of the Asia program for the International Crisis Group, which closely monitors events in Pakistan and Afghanistan. "He has received a lot of U.S. aid, and he is simply not delivering on the really critical security issues."

But Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the International Relations Committee, said he thinks the administration is on the right track in prodding the two South Asian leaders. "Both Musharraf and Karzai need to recognize . . that they are on the same side of the battle and need to stop sniping at one another," he said. But he voiced concern that "we are in danger of losing Afghanistan a second time," urging greater U.S. and allied attention to the problems.

Musharraf Defends Deal With Tribal Leaders (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 22 — President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan tried to convince President Bush on Friday that a deal he approved with tribal leaders in one of the country's most lawless border areas would rid the areas of Qaeda and Taliban influence, rather than give the groups more freedom to operate.

Mr. Bush and his national security aides were clearly skeptical, according to administration officials, but at a news conference, Mr. Bush appeared to take General Musharraf's assurances at face value. General Musharraf knew that there were enough questions in the air about the accord that he felt compelled to explain that "this deal is not at all with the Taliban; as I said, this is against the Taliban, actually."

At the heart of the discussion in the Oval Office was a fear among American officials that General Musharraf, whose political hold over sections of his own country is tenuous at best, is only episodically engaged in the battle against Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

That has been an increasingly contentious issue between Afghanistan and Pakistan, with Afghan leaders complaining that many of the attacks launched against Afghan targets are originating from Pakistan's side of the border.

General Musharraf's visit marked the fifth anniversary of the radical change in Washington's relationship with Islamabad after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but the uneasiness of the alliance created from those events was on full display today.

General Musharraf, who has a book coming out on Monday, told "60 Minutes," in an interview to be broadcast this weekend on CBS, that Richard L. Armitage, then the deputy secretary of state, had threatened Pakistan's intelligence chief in September 2001 that the consequences of failing to side with the United States would be huge. General Musharraf quoted the intelligence chief as recalling Mr. Armitage as saying: "Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age."

But Mr. Armitage said Friday that he had never made such a threat, and that he was not authorized to make any threats during that meeting. "I never made a threat in my life that I couldn't back up," he said on CNN. "Since I wasn't authorized to say such a thing, hence, I couldn't back up that threat."

When asked about the issue at the East Room news conference, General Musharraf refused to answer the question — not on national security grounds, but on the grounds that it would violate his book contract. "I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honor-bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book before that day," he said.

After laughter subsided, Mr. Bush said, "In other words, buy the book."

But Mr. Bush also said that he "was taken aback by the harshness of the words" of the threat, and that he doubted that events unfolded that way. He said he recalled that General Musharraf was "one of the first leaders to step up and say that the stakes have changed."

Mr. Armitage did recall telling Pakistan's leaders that they had to make a choice between supporting the Taliban and supporting the United States, which was clearly headed into conflict with the Taliban leaders of Afghanistan. But five years later, the loyalties of the tribal leaders in North Waziristan are divided, with many of the tribesmen allied with the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

That subject took up much of the time between the leaders today. General Musharraf said the agreement had "three bottom lines." He said one was "no Al Qaeda activities in our tribal agencies or across the border in Afghanistan." The second was "no Taliban activity" in the same areas. And the third was "no Talibanization,'' which he described as "obscurantist thoughts or way of life."

It is unclear how General Musharraf can enforce such edicts, however, or even whether Pakistani government forces could go into the tribal areas to hunt down Osama bin Laden, the Qaeda leader. Tony Snow, President Bush's spokesman, said after the news conference that he did not believe that the discussion went into that level of detail, though the scope of Islamabad's authority to send forces into the area is a crucial point of concern at the White House.

"He made it clear he is serious about going after the Taliban," Mr. Snow said.

That is also a central concern of Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who is supposed to have dinner with General Musharraf and Mr. Bush at the White House next week.

In a meeting with reporters and editors of The New York Times on Thursday, Mr. Karzai said his government had provided Pakistan with "information on training grounds, on operations, people, their phone numbers, their GPS locations," in an effort to rout out Taliban forces.

"Our friends come back to us and say this information is old," he said. "Maybe. But it means they were there."

Mr. Bush and General Musharraf stepped around the question of whether American forces or intelligence agencies had the right to go into Pakistan to hunt down Mr. bin Laden. General Musharraf has bristled at the idea before, largely because of the unpopularity of giving American forces the right to operate inside Pakistan's borders.

On Friday, Mr. Bush fudged the issue by saying, "We're on the hunt together."

On Thursday, asked if he knew the whereabouts of Mr. bin Laden, Mr. Karzai smiled and said: "If I said he was in Pakistan, President Musharraf would be mad at me. And if I said he was in Afghanistan, it would not be true."

Bush Tries To Ease Strain In Pakistan Ties (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

He backs away from a pledge to invade the Asian nation if needed to find Bin Laden.

WASHINGTON — President Bush, struggling with turbulence in the important U.S.-Pakistani relationship, eased back Friday from his vow to order U.S. troops to invade Pakistan, if necessary, to track down Osama bin Laden.

Bush, appearing at the White House with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, backed away from a pledge he made this week and signaled that he would prefer to keep ambiguous how he would handle a situation of such diplomatic sensitivity.

American and Pakistani officials are "on the hunt together" for the leader of the Al Qaeda terrorist network, Bush told reporters. "And we'll just let the tactics speak for themselves after it happens."

His comments followed a rare public collision between Bush and Musharraf on Wednesday, when Bush, in response to a question from CNN, insisted that he would "absolutely" order military action inside Pakistan if there were intelligence showing that Bin Laden or other terrorist leaders were hiding there.

The comment seemed likely to draw a sharp reaction from Pakistanis, who are highly sensitive about any suggestion of U.S. infringement on Pakistani sovereignty. Musharraf immediately contended that only Pakistani troops could handle such a situation.

The exchange came at an especially difficult time for the relationship. U.S., Afghan and NATO officials are increasingly concerned that Al Qaeda and Taliban fighters are using Pakistani border areas for sanctuary. Meanwhile, Musharraf is trying to cope with domestic dissatisfaction over the extent of his cooperation with the controversial U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

Bush on Friday tried to smooth relations in his meeting with Musharraf, and next week will receive both Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai at the White House in an effort to end the public feuding between the leaders of the two Asian nations. Each has accused the other of doing too little to fight militants; Karzai suggested at the United Nations this week that the allied forces needed to strike terrorism at its roots by going inside Pakistan.

Bush also struggled to deal with a second provocative subject, the allegation by Musharraf that a senior State Department official had warned in 2001 that the United States would bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it did not cooperate in the impending U.S. attack on Afghanistan.

Musharraf said in an interview taped for broadcast Sunday on CBS' "60 Minutes" that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage made the comment to the head of Pakistani intelligence. Excerpts were made public Thursday.

"The first I heard of it was when I read it in the newspaper today," Bush said during his joint appearance with Musharraf on Friday. "I guess I was taken aback by the harshness of the words."

Musharraf, for his part, declined at the White House news conference to elaborate on his comments, saying he was "honor-bound" to do so under a contract with the publisher Simon & Schuster for a memoir to be released Monday.

Musharraf's demurral marked the first time in memory that a head of state had declined to give an answer to a national security question that could have interfered with sales of his book, analysts said.

Meanwhile, Armitage denied that he had made the remark. In an interview with CNN that was broadcast Friday, Armitage said he had no authority to make such a threat. But he said he had a stern conversation with the Pakistani intelligence chief, warning him that Pakistan would be "with us or against us."

Armitage's office said he was unavailable for further comment.

U.S. confidence in the Pakistani government has recently been shaken by Musharraf's decision to end his army's attempt to root out Taliban from the border territory of North Waziristan and to reach a peace deal with tribal leaders there. Many analysts have said the deal, which calls for release of accused militants held in prison, would increase the risks and burdens for U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces struggling in an uphill fight in Afghanistan.

But Bush sought again and again to offer reassurance that Musharraf, a general who took power in a coup, is a loyal ally and an indispensable part of the fight against Islamic extremism.

"When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people … I believe him…. This is a person with whom I have had a close working relationship for 5 1/2 years," Bush said. He noted that Musharraf had survived assassination attempts, which he suggested was a sign of commitment to the fight against radicals.

Musharraf, whose security services are skeptical about U.S.-Pakistani cooperation, tried, in turn, to vouch for Bush.

"I have total confidence in him, that he desires well for Pakistan and for our region," Musharraf said.

The joint appearance shed some light on Bush's intentions on Arab-Israeli issues.

European and Islamic leaders have recently increased pressure on Bush to restart negotiations in the aftermath of the summer's deadly fighting in Lebanon. Musharraf praised Bush for his efforts to resolve the Palestinian dispute that he said was the "core issue" in terrorism.

And Bush said at the United Nations this week that he would be ordering a renewed effort in the region.

Yet Bush, circumscribing American responsibility, said Friday that in the Arab-Israeli issue, as in the dispute between India and Pakistan over Kashmir, the lead would be played by the participants, not by Washington. That approach is the strong preference of Israeli officials.

"Leadership is going to be required between Israel and Palestine. We, of course, can help and will help," Bush said. "But it's important for you to understand that we cannot impose peace."

Bush And Musharraf: Friends Again (TIME)

By Douglas Waller

Time, September 23, 2006

Heads of state are sometimes too candid for their own good. But rarely do two of them blurt out what they're really thinking almost simultaneously, as George Bush and Pervez Musharraf did this week — and on a topic as touchy as U.S.-Pakistani cooperation against terrorism. Asked by CNN on Wednesday if he'd order U.S. military operations inside Pakistan to capture Osama bin Laden if there was solid intelligence on his location, Bush said "absolutely." The next day CBS released portions of a 60 Minutes interview with Musharraf, to be aired Sunday, in which he claims that in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage threatened Pakistan's military intelligence chief that the U.S. would bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" if Musharraf didn't cooperate in the war against Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Bush's cowboy-like threat certainly played well with the conservative base that the Republicans desperately need to turn out for the congressional midterm elections less than two months away. And Musharraf, promoting his memoir to be published next week, has to placate even more dangerous political enemies at home who have tried several times to assassinate him. But both men's blunt remarks sent their diplomatic minders scrambling.

How far the U.S. military would go in chasing bin Laden or other al-Qaeda leaders inside Pakistan is a sensitive subject that American commanders would prefer not be given too much air time. Pakistan-U.S. relations are tense at the moment, particularly on the question of how deeply committed Musharraf is to rooting out Qaeda and Taliban extremists and capturing bin Laden, who's believed to be hiding in Pakistan's lawless tribal areas bordering Afghanistan. Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who has complained that Pakistan's tolerance of extremists operating from its territory has helped them gain a stronger foothold in his own country, is furious that Musharraf recently signed a truce with pro-Taliban Pakistani tribal leaders in the North West Frontier Province. That truce calls for Pakistani troops to end their military campaign against militants in exchange for their ending attacks on Pakistani forces and cross-border raids into Afghanistan. Karzai doesn't trust the militants to live up to their part of the bargain.

The precise nature of Armitage's message to the Pakistanis in 2001 is open to question. A barrel-chested Vietnam vet who still lifts weights, Armitage — who left the State Department last year — can be intimidating in meetings. But diplomats don't as a rule threaten military action unless they've been authorized to do so, and Armitage, a seasoned envoy, insists he "never said it" because that was not his instruction from Washington. But he does admit to delivering a strong message to Musharraf's aide that Pakistan was either with the U.S. or against it in the war on terror.

Bush and Musharraf finally got back on the same talking points Friday. After a White House huddle, they emerged to tell reporters they were still joined at the hip when it comes to fighting al-Qaeda and the Taliban. And, as his military commanders prefer, Bush danced around the question of whether he'd ask Musharraf's permission to send U.S. troops into Pakistan to grab bin Laden, insisting that both leaders are still "on the hunt together." Musharraf insisted the agreement he struck with the tribal leaders is not a deal with the Taliban. "This deal is against the Taliban," he claimed. And Bush said: "I believe him."

As for his claim that Armitage threatened to bomb his country, Musharraf now says his publisher has told him to keep mum on that tidbit until his memoir hits the stores — probably the first time a foreign president has delivered a teaser for his book at a White House press conference.

Bush, however, was delighted the two of them were back on their talking points. "Good job," he told Musharraf as they walked away from the press conference. But the tensions in the relationship remain. And the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, said Thursday he plans no immediate cuts in the 20,000 American troops battling a growing Taliban threat. Nor will Friday's spin control reverse the worsening war there.

Musharraf Dodges 'bomb' Spat Question (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

Pervez Musharraf, Pakistan's president, on Friday transformed a White House news conference into a book promotion when he refused to answer a question about his claim that the US had threatened to bomb Pakistan "into the Stone Age".

General Musharraf makes the claim in an interview with CBS, which is being broadcast on Saturday to coincide with the publication of his memoirs. In the interview, he says Richard Armitage, former US deputy secretary of state, warned Pakistan after the attacks of September 11 2001 of the consequences of refusing to help with the war in Afghanistan. "Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age," he recalls Mr Armitage as saying.

However, setting a new precedent for a non-answer on a question of international diplomacy at a White House press conference, Gen Musharraf, when asked about the claim on Friday, said: "I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honour-bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book before that day."

This prompted George W. Bush, US president, to interject: "In other words, buy the book is what he's saying."

Mr Bush denied he had known of the threat and said he was "taken aback by the harshness of the words".

He strongly defended the actions of Gen Musharraf after 9/11, noting that he was "one of the first leaders to step up and say that the stakes have changed".

The exchange, however, underlined continued tensions in the US-Pakistan relationship strengthened by revived concerns about whether the US could strike at Osama bin Laden, al-Qaeda leader, in Pakistani territory and doubts about the peace agreement Gen Musharraf has struck with tribal leaders on the border of Afghanistan, an area allegedly used by Taliban forces.

John Abizaid, commander of the US forces in the region, has expressed scepticism about the agreement but Mr Bush emphasised his trust in his relationship with Gen Musharraf.

“When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanisation of the people and that there won’t be a Taliban and there won’t be al-Qaeda, I believe him,” he said.

Both leaders side-stepped concerns about targeting the al-Qaeda leader, with Gen Musharraf dismissing the debate as about “the semantics of the tactics . . . We are in the hunt together”.

Pakistan’s role in Afghanistan will dominate discussions on Wednesday, when Gen Musharraf returns to the White House for a joint meeting with Hamid Karzai, Afghanistan’s president.

Bush, Musharraf Duck 'US Bomb Threat' (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, September 23, 2006

US President George W. Bush and Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf celebrated their close cooperation in the war on terrorism but did not deny that it began with a US threat to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age."

In a joint appearance after talks at the White House, Musharraf assured Bush that a peace treaty with tribal elders near the Afghan border would not take pressure off Afghanistan's Islamist Taliban militia or their terrorist allies.

And Bush refused to say whether he would seek Pakistan's permission to strike inside its territory at Osama bin Laden and his Al-Qaeda network, which carried out the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States.

Musharraf made White House history when he invoked a book deal with a major US publishing house to keep silent on his earlier charge, in an interview with CBS television, that a senior US official had threatened to bomb Pakistan in order to force Islamabad to meet US demands after the September 11 strikes.

"I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honor-bound to Simon and Schuster not to comment on the book before that day," he said, sparking incredulous laughter among reporters and relieved chuckling from Bush.

"In other words, 'buy the book,' is what he's saying," joked the US leader, who said that he had just learned of the allegation on Friday in a newspaper and was "taken aback by the harshness of the words."

"I don't know of any conversation that was reported in the newspaper like that. I just don't know about it," said Bush.

The US official who supposedly made the remark, former deputy US secretary of state Richard Armitage, flatly denied saying any such thing, declaring in an interview with CNN: "Never did I threaten to use any military force."

"I was not authorized to," added Armitage, who did confirm he made a series of non-negotiable demands on Pakistan in a bid to secure its cooperation in the US assault on Afghanistan's then Taliban leaders.

Musharraf, who rattled the key anti-terrorism alliance this past week with several public critiques of Washington, defended the Pakistani government's agreement with tribal leaders in Waziristan along the Afghan border.

"This treaty is not to deal with the Taliban. It is actually to fight the Taliban," he said in response to criticisms by some US politicians that it is really a deal with the resurgent Taliban militia.

General James Jones, supreme commander of allied forces Europe, said Thursday the pact -- which bars the presence of foreign fighters -- could work, if properly applied but it has been savaged by Bush's opponents.

Bush also praised Musharraf's anti-terror credentials, and pointed out that Al-Qaeda had tried to assassinate him several times.

"He has been a, strong, forceful leader he has become a target of those who can't stand the thought of moderation prevailing. I admire your leadership," Bush said.

The controversy over the purported US bomb threat was unleashed by Musharraf in an interview with the CBS show "60 Minutes" due to be broadcast Sunday.

He said Richard Armitage told Pakistan'ss intelligence director after the attacks. "Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age" in a bid to coerce Pakistani cooperation in the new US-led 'war on terror.'

"I think it was a very rude remark," Musharraf said in the interview.

Earlier, White House spokesman Tony Snow also declined to say the exchange never took place, stressing instead that "US policy was not to issue bombing threats" and adding: "This could have been a classic failure to communicate."

Musharraf has been a key player in the fight ever since he ceded to US persuasion and renounced Pakistan's ties to the Taliban, which had harbored bin Laden.

But Pakistan's role has come under increasing scrutiny in recent weeks, partly fuelled by fresh suggestions bin Laden is hiding somewhere in the otherwise inhospitable mountains of the Pakistan-Afghan border.

There has also been concern about spats between Afghanistan and Pakistan over claims Taliban militants use Pakistani territory to launch attacks on NATO and Afghan troops.

In a sign of US concern at cross-border disagreements, Bush will welcome Musharraf back to the White House next week, for three-way talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

Friday's visit was leant added spice when Bush and Musharraf disagreed publicly about the hunt for Laden earlier this week.

Bush has gone back and forth on whether he would seek Pakistani permission to strike bin Laden, and left the issue no clearer in the press conference. Musharraf dismissed the matter as "semantics of the tactics" to hunt bin Laden.

"We are working together and when the situation arises, we need to take the right decision to strike," said Musharraf.

Bush, Musharraf Vow To Get Bin Laden (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

President Bush and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said yesterday they are united in the effort to capture or kill al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, even though the Pakistani general has signed a treaty with tribes along the Afghanistan border thought to harbor members of the Taliban.

While Mr. Bush has said U.S. forces cannot simply walk into Pakistan in search of the mastermind of the September 11 terrorist attacks, Gen. Musharraf did not invite troops to scour the mountainous border region, where bin Laden is thought to be holed up.

But Mr. Bush also did not back off his pledge this week that if he had convincing U.S. intelligence that bin Laden was in Pakistan, he would send troops in to capture or kill him.

"When he says, if we find -- when we find Osama bin Laden, he will be brought to justice, I believe him," the president said after an Oval Office meeting with the Pakistani leader. "And we'll let the tactics speak for themselves after it happens. We're on the hunt together."

Gen. Musharraf, who has said Pakistan would handle such a situation itself, complained about criticism that he would not allow U.S. troops in his country.

"Now, why are we bothering or how to -- the semantics of the tactics of how to deal with the situation? We will deal with it. We are on the hunt together. You want the person -- if at all we confront him, if at all we find out his location, we are quite clear what to do," Gen. Musharraf said.

"But let's not get involved in how it ought to be done, by whom it ought to be done," he said, noting that there is coordination between the two nations on intelligence, operations, strategy and tactics.

Gen. Musharraf said a peace treaty between his government and tribes along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border is not meant to support the Taliban, and that news reports had mischaracterized the deals.

"The deal is not at all with the Taliban. This deal is against the Taliban. This deal is with the tribal elders," Gen. Musharraf said.

Mr. Bush said: "I believe him."

Pakistan earlier this month signed a truce with tribal figures. Afghanistan has insisted that the tribes are linked to the Taliban, the militant Islamic group that once ruled Afghanistan until driven from power in 2001.

Pakistan's point man on the truce told The Washington Times Thursday that it is part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out and will not undermine the fight against Islamic extremists.

"It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm," Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province said in a meeting with the paper's editors and reporters.

The president said Gen. Musharraf vowed that "the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people and that there won't be a Taliban and there won't be al Qaeda" in Pakistan.

Mr. Bush has praised Pakistan for arresting hundreds of al Qaeda operatives inside its borders, but he has also urged the nation to do more to stop militants from crossing from its tribal regions into Afghanistan.

The president plans talks Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Then, he will have a three-way sit-down with both Mr. Karzai and Gen. Musharraf at the White House on Wednesday.

Bush Unaware Of Musharraf's Contention (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

DOJ_NMG_0067998

AP, September 23, 2006

President Bush said Friday that if a U.S. official tried to strong-arm Pakistan into fighting the war on terror after the Sept. 11 attacks, he didn't know about it.

Standing beside Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, Bush brushed off any idea of disagreement, praising Musharraf for pursuing terrorists, including Osama bin Laden.

"We're on the hunt together," Bush said after an Oval Office meeting with the general who is leader of the world's second-largest Islamic nation.

Musharraf has contended that after the Sept. 11 attacks, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage told Pakistan's intelligence director that the United States would bomb the country if it didn't become a partner in the war against terrorism.

"The intelligence director told me that (Armitage) said, "Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age,'" Musharraf told CBS' "60 Minutes" in a report to air on Sunday. "I thought it was a very rude remark."

The president said he first learned of the purported conversation from news reports. "I just don't know about it," he said. "I guess I was taken aback by the harshness of the words."

Musharraf declined to comment further, citing a book deal.

"Buy the book," Bush quipped.

Armitage said he never threatened a military strike but did tell Pakistan firmly that "you are either for us or against us."

Armitage, who met with Musharraf on Thursday, told Associated Press Radio concerning the bombing quote: "I was not authorized to say something like that. I did not say it."

In Pakistan, Ameer ul-Azeem, a spokesman for the hard-line opposition Islamic coalition Mutahida Majlis-e-Amal, said Musharraf's contention would anger Pakistani people who have long believed that they were forced "at gunpoint" into supporting the war on terror.

Bush's meeting with Musharraf, following the president's U.N. speech on Tuesday, gave the White House a new chance to persuade voters that Republicans have better credentials than Democrats on national security. However, with the November congressional elections approaching, it also offered a reminder that bin Laden is still on the loose five years after the Sept. 11 attacks.

In a recent interview, Bush said he would order military action inside Pakistan if intelligence indicated that bin Laden or other top terror leaders were hiding there. Some Pakistani officials took issue with that, saying that Pakistan was a sovereign country.

"All I can tell you is, is that when Osama bin Laden is found, he will be brought to justice," Bush said.

Musharraf shrugged off the issue as an exercise in semantics.

"We will deal with it. We are on the hunt together," Musharraf said.

The Pakistani president later told students at The George Washington University that Pakistan "joined the war not so much for the world but for ourselves."

He described his government as moderate and progressive and said, "I am the greatest believer in democracy." Musharraf seized power in a 1999 coup.

Responding to a student's question, Musharraf acknowledged that "we are moving slowly" in reforming the Islamic madrassas, or extremist schools, in his country. But he said they accounted for only 5 percent of the country's schools.

The United States has urged Pakistan to do more to stop militants from crossing from its tribal regions into Afghanistan. Violence fanned by Taliban extremists has reached the deadliest level since the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the hard-line government in Afghanistan in 2001.

Pakistan, which has deployed 80,000 troops along the border, signed a truce this month with tribal figures in an area where bin Laden is believed to be hiding. Musharraf said the truce calls for no al-Qaida or Taliban activity.

Some Afghan officials have labeled the truce as a deal with the Taliban, but Musharraf strongly rejected that.

"This deal is not at all with the Taliban," he said. "As I said, this is against the Taliban, actually."

Bush said Musharraf briefed him on the details of the truce.

"When the president looks me in the eye and says, the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaida, I believe him, you know?" Bush said.

Bush is playing the role of middle man between Pakistan and Afghanistan — two U.S. allies in the war on terror who accuse each other of not doing enough to crack down on extremism. Bush will follow his meeting with Musharraf with one next Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Then the three will have a sit-down and working dinner at the White House on Wednesday.

Human rights activists are asking Bush to press Musharraf to restore civilian rule in Pakistan, end discrimination against women and stop using torture and arbitrary detention in counterterrorism operations.

Instead of giving up his military uniform in 2004 as promised, Musharraf changed the constitution so he could hold both his army post and the presidency until 2007.

Bush said that during their meeting, Musharraf renewed his commitment to holding elections in Pakistan next year.

Musharraf Tells Bush That Pakistan Is Cracking Down On Extremists (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf sought to assure President Bush on Friday that he's fighting Islamic extremism, but Western diplomats, U.S. officials and independent analysts say secret Pakistani support for the Taliban aided the extremist group's resurgence in neighboring Afghanistan.

Bush said he accepted Musharraf's word, but he has little choice. The United States depends heavily on Pakistani cooperation in the fight against Osama bin Laden, and Bush risks jeopardizing the relationship by getting too tough with the Pakistani military ruler.

The two leaders held a news conference after talks at the White House and sidestepped questions about Musharraf's charge that the Bush administration threatened to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it refused to join the anti-terror coalition after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In an interview with the CBS program "60 Minutes" scheduled for broadcast on Sunday, Musharraf said the threat was delivered to one of his intelligence chiefs by then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Armitage told McClatchy Newspapers that he never made such a threat, although he said he used "strong language" in telling the Pakistani that his country must decided whether it was with or against the United States.

"The first I heard of this was when I read it in the newspaper today," Bush said, adding that he was "taken aback by the harshness of the words."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who'll join Musharraf for a White House meeting with Bush on Wednesday, has repeatedly accused Pakistan of supporting the Taliban's resurgence.

Some 42,000 U.S. and NATO-led troops are tied down trying to contain the worst violence in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led intervention that ousted the Taliban in 2001. An estimated 1,500 Afghan security forces and civilians and foreign troops have died since January.

Speaking in New York on Thursday, Karzai complained that Musharraf failed to follow up when he gave the Pakistani leader the location of Taliban leader Mullah Omar in Quetta, Pakistan.

"We have even given him the GPS (global positioning system) number of Mullah Omar's house and the telephone numbers," Karzai said. Karzai will meet with Bush privately on Tuesday, before joining Musharraf for the three-way summit.

Musharraf assured Bush that he's working hard to cleanse Taliban and al-Qaida operatives from their havens in northwest Pakistan, a remote tribal region that's largely beyond Islamabad's control.

He insisted that a peace deal he recently struck in the region was with tribal elders, not extremist groups, and that it will help stop infiltration into Afghanistan by Taliban and foreign radicals.

"This treaty is not to deal with the Taliban. It is actually to fight the Taliban," Musharraf said. "There will be no al-Qaida activity in our tribal agency or across the border into Afghanistan. There will be no Taliban activity in our tribal agency or across in Afghanistan."

But Western diplomats, U.S. officials and other experts said the peace deal essentially ceded the area of Waziristan to Taliban allies, who seized control of it in a humiliating defeat for 80,000 Pakistani troops deployed there at the White House's behest in mid-2003.

Those with whom Pakistani officials negotiated the deal included Jalaluddin Haqqani, the commander of pro-Taliban forces in eastern Afghanistan who's a prime target of American forces, said a senior Western diplomat in Kabul who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Haqqani is closely linked to bin Laden and was a prime recipient of CIA aid during the war against the 1979-89 Soviet occupation.

U.S. and Western officials and other experts also say that Pakistan's powerful military intelligence agency, the Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI, is providing important support to the Taliban as part of a long-term policy of seeking a pro-Pakistan regime in Kabul.

The Taliban leadership councils, or shuras, are directing the insurgency from the Pakistani cities of Quetta and Peshawar, and ISI officers are supplying them with arms, money, intelligence and protection, they said.

Musharraf, who's facing tribal rebellions and growing disenchantment in his officer corps and among Pakistanis over his close cooperation with the United States, can't afford to reverse the policy, said U.S. intelligence officials, who requested anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak publicly.

The Pakistani leader seized power in a 1999 military coup and has refused to relinquish his post as army chief of staff. Bush said Musharraf renewed his commitment to hold "free and fair" elections next year.

Musharraf On Bomb Threat: Wait For The Book (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The Pakistani president dodges questions about claims of U.S. coercion after the 9/11 attacks.

WASHINGTON — Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf is a seasoned military officer who led troops to battle, trained commandos, seized control of his country and escaped three assassination attempts. But he said he was powerless to answer reporters' key question Friday during a visit to the White House — because he was at the mercy of his publisher.

Musharraf cited a book contract as he dodged a question about a purported Bush administration threat to bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" if it did not cooperate with the U.S. after the Sept. 11 attacks. He told a packed East Room audience that he was "honor bound" by his publisher not to answer until it releases the book, "In The Line of Fire: A Memoir" on Monday, he said.

Musharraf did not sign a confidentiality agreement with publisher Free Press, an imprint of Simon & Schuster, but he promised not to speak about its contents until Monday, spokeswoman Carisa Hays said.

The publisher arranged an exclusive interview for Musharraf with "60 Minutes," set to air Sunday night, in which he discusses threats made by a senior Bush administration official to bomb Pakistan if it did not cooperate after the terrorist attacks. Excerpts of the interview were made public Thursday.

The publisher's website said Musharraf also has interviews scheduled with NPR, NBC's "Today" show and "Meet the Press," and Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart."

Musharraf's literary agent, Chris Calhoun, said the president was standing on principle.

"He's appreciative of the job the publisher has done. He's keeping his word," Calhoun said.

Publishing industry leaders disagreed.

Though it is common for high-profile authors, including world leaders such as former Prime Ministers Margaret Thatcher and Golda Meir, to reserve comment on books they write while in office, they rarely stay mum on issues of national security to protect their publicity, said Sara Nelson, editor of Publishers Weekly.

"If the responsibility of a leader is to inform his people about what's going on, and he says 'I can't because I have a book coming out,' that's weird," Nelson said.

"If George Bush said he couldn't comment on 9/11 because he had a contract with Simon & Schuster, all hell would break loose," she said.

Nelson said the episode probably would boost Musharraf's book sales next week, but would garner little lasting attention. As of Friday evening, Musharraf's 368-page memoir was ranked No. 122 in pre-release sales at Amazon.com.

"What are we protecting here? The book has been written and shipped. He has already been interviewed. This is a curious gambit," Osnos said.

The honor code among authors is flexible, Osnos said, and Musharraf's "honor bound" comment was all showmanship, "for fun and profit rather than out of principle."

Publishers have speculated that Musharraf received a six-figure contract for the book in February 2005, and Nelson of Publishers Weekly said he probably was earning much more.

"They've orchestrated this very well," Nelson said. "It's going to get everybody — as we are now — talking about the ethics of it."

Armitage Denies Threatening To Send Pakistan "Back To The Stone Age" (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Friday that he knew of no threat by the United States to attack Pakistan if it didn't ended its support for the Taliban and cooperate in the war on al Qaida following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0068001

"The first I've heard of this is when I read it in the newspaper today," Bush told a news conference he held with Musharraf following talks between the two leaders at the White House.

Musharraf declined to comment, citing a confidentiality requirement of a deal on his soon-to-be published memoirs.

The Pakistani leader, who seized power in a 1999 coup, told the CBS program "60 Minutes" in an interview to be aired Sunday that former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage threatened a U.S. attack on Pakistan unless it stopped supporting the Taliban and helped hunt down Osama bin Laden after the Sept. 11 strikes.

Pakistan backed the Taliban takeover of Afghanistan, and had resisted repeated U.S. requests for helping in tracking down bin Laden, who maintained bases and training camps around the country.

Musharraf told "60 Minutes" that Armitage delivered the warning to the then-director of Pakistan's powerful military intelligence agency, the Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence.

"Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age," he quoted Armitage as warning Lt. Gen. Mahmood Ahmed, who was in Washington when the attacks in New York and Washington took place. Ahmed was purged shortly after returning to Islamabad.

Armitage denied ever making such a threat in a telephone interview on Thursday with McClatchy Newspapers. "I didn't command any airplanes," he said.

Armitage said he used "strong language" to convey to Ahmed demands for Pakistan's cooperation against al Qaida and the Taliban.

He recalled telling Ahmed that "history begins today" and "you're either with us or against us."

CNN.com, September 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- President Bush on Friday said he was "taken aback" by a report that a U.S. official threatened the United States would attack Pakistan if it did not help immediately after 9/11.

Bush made the remarks at a White House news conference with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, thanking the U.S. ally for his role in the war on terror.

The Pakistan president has told CBS News that -- immediately following the September 11, 2001, attacks -- the Bush administration threatened to bomb his country "back to the Stone Age" if Pakistan did not help in the U.S. war on terrorism.

Bush said he first heard of the alleged threat "in the newspaper today." (Watch as Bush says he's unaware of any such conversation -- 1:56)

"I was taken aback by the harshness of the words," he said.

"All I can tell you is that shortly after 9/11, Secretary [of State] Colin Powell came in and said President Musharraf understands the stakes, and he wants to join and help root out an enemy that has come and killed 3,000 of our citizens."

Richard Armitage, then U.S. deputy secretary of state, is the official whom Musharraf identified in the CBS report. In an interview Friday with CNN, Armitage denied the allegation.

"Never did I threaten to use military force," he said. "I was not authorized to." (Watch as Armitage says he had a strong, straightforward talk with Pakistan -- 3:52)

Armitage acknowledged he was part of a group who met with Pakistan's intelligence chief to convey strong U.S. determination. He said the message was that "we absolutely need their help if we were going to prosecute the Taliban and al Qaeda in Afghanistan."

"We wanted to make sure they understood both the opportunities and the downside, but there was no threat," he said.

Musharraf was asked Friday about the CBS report, but he said he couldn't talk about it because of a legal agreement with his publisher before the release of his new memoir next week. "I am honor bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book" before it's published, he said.

In the CBS report, Musharraf said, "The intelligence director told me that [Armitage] said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age.' "

"I think it was a very rude remark," Musharraf told reporter Steve Kroft, the AP said. But Musharraf said he reacted in a responsible way. "One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation and that is what I did," he said, according to the AP. Hunt for bin Laden

Friday's White House meeting occurred just days after Bush said he would send U.S. troops into Pakistan to capture Osama bin Laden if he received good intelligence on the al Qaeda leader's location.

Asked Friday by reporters if the U.S. needs permission to strike inside Pakistan if bin Laden is located there, Bush said, "All I can tell you is that when Osama bin Laden is found, he will be brought to justice. And that's what we've continually discussed. I think, as the president said, we are in the hunt together against these people."

Musharraf said he was puzzled that people seem concerned about "the semantics of the tactics of how to deal with the situation. We will deal with it. We are in the hunt together."

Bush told CNN's Wolf Blitzer on Wednesday that he would order U.S. forces to go after Osama bin Laden inside Pakistan if he received good information on the fugitive al Qaeda leader's location. "Absolutely," the president said.

Pakistani authorities recently signed a peace agreement with pro-Taliban tribal leaders in the country's restive northwest after two years of clashes with the traditionally autonomous tribes that left more than 600 Pakistani troops dead.

Musharraf said he and Bush discussed the pact, asserting that the treaty is against the Taliban, the former Afghan regime that harbored al Qaeda and that was ousted by U.S.-led forces after 9/11.

"It is actually to fight the Taliban," Musharraf said. "The misperception in the media, I did clarify to the president ... that this is a holistic approach that we are taking to fighting terrorism in Pakistan, in the tribal agencies of Pakistan."

He said the deal states "there will be no al Qaeda activity in our tribal agencies or across the border in Afghanistan."

Bush said he appreciated Musharraf's briefing. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people and that there won't be a Taliban and there won't be al Qaeda, I believe him," Bush said.

He also told Musharraf that "I admire your leadership. I admire your courage and I thank you very much for working on common strategies to protect our respective peoples."

Bush said Musharraf again promised to hold free elections in 2007.

"He understands that the best way to defeat radicalism and extremism is to give people a chance to participate in the political process of a nation," Bush said.

The Pakistani leader is scheduled to see Bush again next week in a three-way meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

Pakistani President Dodges Alliance Query (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf yesterday stood next to President Bush and refused to answer a reporter's question about what persuaded him to oppose the Taliban after the September 11 attacks, saying his book contract prevents it.

Minutes later, when asked whether American troops would be allowed to strike at Osama bin Laden should he be found in Pakistan, neither president gave a yes-or-no answer, with Gen. Musharraf calling the issue "the semantics of the tactics of how to deal with the situation."

The man to whom Mr. Bush has hitched his wagon as a key U.S. ally in the war on terrorism in Central Asia is a complicated character -- an elected president who first ascended by bloodless military coup, and who still retains his role as army chief of staff.

Human rights advocates and some members of Congress have questioned the pace of progress in Pakistan, while military analysts wonder whether Gen. Musharraf could do more to root out al Qaeda and Taliban militants hiding in his country's remote regions.

But for Mr. Bush, Gen. Musharraf is one of the Muslim leaders he is trying to promote as a moderate fighting extreme elements, along with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"This president is a strong defender of freedom and the people of Pakistan, and I appreciate your leadership," Mr. Bush said at a joint appearance after morning talks at the White House. "These extremists who can't stand the thought of a moderate leader leading an important country like Pakistan want to kill the president. That should say things to the people of Pakistan and the people of America."

Yesterday's hot topic was Gen. Musharraf's revelation to CBS News that in 2001, then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage told Pakistan's intelligence chief to side with the United States against the Taliban or to, "'be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age.'"

Gen. Musharraf revealed this in an interview with "60 Minutes" to air tomorrow, in advance of the release of his memoirs, which is being published by Simon & Schuster. Both the news network and the book publisher are owned by CBS Corp.

Mr. Armitage denies having used those words, and Mr. Bush yesterday said he didn't know about the conversation, but said Gen. Musharraf signaled early on he would be an ally.

"I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honor-bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book before that day," he said.

Speaking at George Washington University later in the day, Gen. Musharraf again was asked about the comment and said, "We joined the war on terror not really for the world as much as for ourselves.

"Pakistan is together to fight extremism in all its complexities, and maybe people could learn from us -- we are on board in the war against terrorism," he said.

Gen. Musharraf pointed out that since that time, Pakistan's economy has grown, the gross domestic product has increased, the per-capita income has doubled and foreign direct investment had leaped by 1,000 percent.

Danielle Pletka, vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute, said U.S.-Pakistan relations have always been complicated.

"Pakistan has, ever since the Cold War, made a choice to align itself with the United States, but it's always kept one leg hanging over the fence in defense of what it perceives as its own national security," she said.

"On balance, Musharraf is better with us than against us, but could he do more? I believe so," she said

How much more will be put to the test next week when he returns to the White House for a trilateral meeting with Mr. Bush and Mr. Karzai. The three will try to lessen tensions over a recent agreement Pakistan reached with tribal leaders on the Afghan border that some see as ceding control to al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Mrs. Pletka said Pakistan views Afghanistan as providing "strategic depth" should war with India ever break out, so "Pakistani meddling in Afghanistan is just a given." She said the problem arises when that support crosses the line to become support for Islamic extremists.

Mr. Bush has taken some grief for his support of Gen. Musharraf. He told the United Nations this week that the world should no longer trade away support for freedom and democracy in the hopes of getting stability.

And yet that is exactly what some critics -- including democracy advocates in Pakistan -- say Mr. Bush is doing with Gen. Musharraf. They point to the Pakistani leader's broken promise to step down in 2004 as head of the military and his pardon of Abdul Qadeer Khan, "father" of Pakistan's nuclear weapons, who aided North Korea's program, among others.

He points to Pakistan's help earlier this year in busting up the plot to blow up airplanes headed from Britain to the United States, and as a fair dealer in trying to reach agreement with India over the disputed Kashmir region.

Mr. Bush said Gen. Musharraf reassured him Pakistan will hold free and fair elections next year, adding that the Pakistani leader "understands that the best way to defeat radicalism and extremism is to give people a chance to participate in the political process of a nation."

Axis Of Sketchy Allies (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON

It helps to plug your book at the White House.

At a news conference with President Bush, Pervez Musharraf was asked about his claim on “60 Minutes” that Richard Armitage had threatened to bomb Pakistan back to the Stone Age if it did not cooperate in routing the Taliban in Afghanistan. After coyly sidestepping the question, saying he had to save such juicy tidbits for his book’s publication next week, he shot up over 1,000 spots on Amazon.com.

General Musharraf told Steve Kroft he found the Stone Age crack “very rude,’’ and Mr. Armitage was on the defensive yesterday, explaining that he had been tough with Pakistan just after 9/11 but had not made any Flintstones threats.

The former deputy to Colin Powell needn’t apologize. That was the last time our foreign policy was on track, when we were pursuing the real enemy. It’s all been downhill from there.

The Pakistan president is a smooth operator, a military dictator cruising around the capital with his elegant wife and enormous security contingent, talking about how much he likes democracy, which he won’t yet allow.

He may have more respect for checks and balances than Dick Cheney, but that’s not saying much.

On the subject of Osama, he’s so slippery you want to lock him in a room with the muscle-bound Mr. Armitage. General ... General, as W. called him in that famous campaign pop quiz, tried to persuade Mr. Bush that the shabby truce he recently made with tribal leaders, agreeing that the Pakistani Army would stay out of the wild border area next to Afghanistan — where Osama and other Al Qaeda and Taliban members are believed to be hiding — was really “against” the militants.

The Pakistan government has, in effect, simply turned over the North Waziristan area to the militants. ABC News quoted Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan Khan of Pakistan as saying that the deal was an implicit amnesty, and that Osama "would not be taken into custody" as long as he was "being like a peaceful citizen."

American officials are dubious about Mr. Musharraf's commitment to destroying Al Qaeda and the Taliban. But at the press conference, W., who no doubt thinks he has seen into General ... General's soul, acted as though he were willing to believe the Pakistani president when he says he is "on the hunt" for Osama and the Taliban at the same time he's setting up a safe haven for them — and getting huffy at the idea that American forces have the right to go into Pakistan to track Osama.

"Americans who are concerned about a recurrence of 9/11 are worried about the Axis of Evil when the real problem is the Axis of Allies — Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Britain,'' the British historian Niall Ferguson says. "The terrorists are funded in Saudi Arabia, they're trained in Pakistan, and they organize their plots quite easily in London.''

Mr. Ferguson, who analyzes evildoers and despots in his new book, "The War of the World: Twentieth-Century Conflict and the Descent of the West,'' observes that Mr. Musharraf could not survive if he truly tried to break up the cozy relationship between militants, tribal leaders and some in his Army and intelligence service.

The Paks, as W. and Vice like to call them, are at the heart of the Faustian deal the Bush administration has made. The justification for invading Iraq was that they couldn't allow a dictator who might be harboring terrorists to stay in power. But their great ally in the war on terror is General Musharraf, a dictator who appears to be harboring terrorists, including the one we want most.

Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who will dine with W. and General ... General at the White House next week, expressed a sly skepticism about his neighbor's protestations that he is strategizing against militants. As David Sanger reported, Mr. Karzai told Times editors and reporters that he had tried to get Pakistan's help in repelling the resurgent Taliban by giving the Pakistanis "information on training ground, on operation, people, their phone numbers, their G.P.S. locations.''

"Our friends come back to us and say this information is old,'' Mr. Karzai continued. "Maybe. But it means they were there."

Asked where Osama was, he smiled and replied: "If I said he was in Pakistan, President Musharraf would be mad at me. And if I said he was in Afghanistan, it would not be true."

We may not have Osama, but at least W. helped General ...General with his Amazon ranking. "Buy the book," the president recommended as the two allies wrapped up.

Detainee Deal Comes With Contradictions (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

The compromise reached on Thursday between Congressional Republicans and the White House on the interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects is, legal experts said yesterday, a series of interlocking paradoxes.

It would impose new legal standards that it forbids the courts to enforce.

It would guarantee terrorist masterminds charged with war crimes an array of procedural protections. But it would bar hundreds of minor figures and people who say they are innocent bystanders from access to the courts to challenge their potentially lifelong detentions.

And while there is substantial disagreement about just which harsh interrogation techniques the compromise would prohibit, there is no dispute that it would allow military prosecutors to use statements that had been obtained under harsh techniques that are now banned.

The complex, technical and often ambiguous language in the 94-page measure was a subject of debate, posturing and, perhaps, some wishful thinking yesterday. Each side in the hard-fought negotiations — the White House and the three opposing Republican senators — declared victory.

And human rights groups simultaneously insisted that the new bill should be read to forbid various tough antiterrorism tactics and cautioned that the Bush administration had been given too much power to make the rules.

Some longtime critics of the administration expressed satisfaction with aspects of the compromise. They hailed the three senators who negotiated it, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, John McCain of Arizona and John W. Warner of Virginia, as leaders who placed principle over politics in stopping the effort to redefine a provision of the Geneva Conventions knows as Common Article 3.

That provision bars, among other practices, "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment."

"The McCain, Graham, Warner trio really fought back and prevented the administration from winning its effort to reinterpret Common Article 3," said Jennifer Daskal, the United States advocacy director for Human Rights Watch.

The proposed law, at least if it is interpreted honestly, Ms. Daskal said, would prohibit interrogation techniques like sleep deprivation, forced standing for long periods and extreme temperatures.

Others said that the negotiations were a sham and that an array of harsh techniques remained available.

"The only thing that was actually accomplished," said Eric M. Freedman, a law professor at Hofstra University and the author of a book on habeas corpus, "was that the politicians got to announce the existence of a compromise. But in fact, most of the critical issues were not resolved."

Martin S. Lederman, who teaches constitutional law at Georgetown, said the bill continued to allow the harsh treatment of detainees by the Central Intelligence Agency.

"They appear to have negotiated a statutory definition of cruel treatment that doesn't cover the C.I.A. techniques," Professor Lederman said. "And they purport to foreclose the ability of the courts to determine whether they satisfy the Geneva obligations."

The bill would allow, and perhaps require, the president to issue regulations concerning "the meaning and application of the Geneva Conventions," and it calls for them to be published in The Federal Register.

Legal experts differed about whether that bargain, trading power for transparency, was sound.

Changes to the procedures for the military commissions established to try terrorism suspects for war crimes also met with mixed responses. Revisions that would let defendants see the evidence against them were welcomed by military defense lawyers and human rights groups.

But some voiced concern that using statements obtained through coercion, even coercion forbidden by the McCain Amendment to Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, would still be allowed in many circumstances. So would be hearsay evidence, as well as a combination of the two.

"You create a situation," Ms. Daskal said, "in which someone could be convicted based on a second- or third-hand statement from a detainee during an abusive interrogation."

The issue that most engaged administration critics was the new bill's aggressive and possibly constitutionally suspect efforts to keep the courts from hearing many detainees' challenges or claims based on the Geneva Conventions. Though people charged with war crimes would receive trials before military commissions that largely resemble courts-martial and criminal prosecutions, the administration has announced plans to use just a score of those.

About 430 people are being held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and there is no guarantee that they will ever be tried. The legislation, unchanged by the compromise, would prohibit habeas corpus challenges to these indefinite detentions.

"You're creating a system," Ms. Daskal said, "where Khalid Shaikh Mohammed," called the mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, "will have more rights than the low-level detainee who was sold into U.S. custody by bounty hunters."

Indeed, the propriety of indefinite detentions at Guantánamo will continue to be decided by combatant status review tribunals, or C.S.R.T.'s. The revised rules for military commissions do nothing to alter the tribunals' unorthodox procedures.

"The C.S.R.T. is the first time in U.S. history in which the lawfulness of a person's detention is based on evidence secured by torture that's not shared with the prisoner, that he has the burden to rebut and without the assistance of counsel," said Joseph Margulies, author of "Guantánamo and the Abuse of Presidential Power" (Simon & Schuster, 2006).

A limited appeal from adverse determinations of these tribunals is permitted, but habeas corpus challenges are not. That means, Professor Freedman said, that "the feature of the bill that does the greatest amount of harm to the American legal system remains untouched."

The compromise adds a wrinkle, prohibiting the very invocation of the Geneva Conventions in civil cases and habeas proceedings and, depending on how one reads an ambiguous passage, perhaps criminal cases, too.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will hold hearings on Monday on limiting detainees' habeas challenges. If Congress does not act, Professor Freedman said, the courts may reject the habeas provisions in the law.

"An attempt to throw out of court many hundreds of pending cases that the Supreme Court has twice held have a right to be there," he said, "is not likely to be met with a favorable reaction in the Supreme Court."

Critics Say Bill On Detainee Interrogation Will Not Prevent Torture (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - Several Democrats and civil rights advocates charged Friday that a Republican compromise over the treatment of terrorism suspects leaves the door open for torture and abuse, while stripping captives of a basic right to a court appeal.

"This is a bill that's essentially going to continue to allow coercive interrogations," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has represented about 500 detainees, many of them held for more than four years at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. "I find it just shameful as a human rights lawyer who's spent my life suing every dictator in the world over this kind of stuff."

But leading Democrats stopped short of opposing the compromise plan announced Thursday between the White House and Senate Republicans. The top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, called the compromise "promising."

The House of Representatives and Senate are expected to vote next week before the Congress recesses for elections.

Circling their wagons, Republicans all but dared Democrats to vote against the plan, suggesting that would turn off voters and kill the Democrats' efforts to take back control of either chamber of Congress in the November elections.

"I don't think sitting on the sidelines in the war on terrorism is a good idea," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "My advice to the Democrats would be to support us - that would be a great way to take that issue off the table."

Congress has been under pressure to pass a comprehensive detainee plan since the Supreme Court ruled 5-3 in June that the system President Bush created to handle terrorism cases violated U.S. law.

Bush previously took the position that the international Geneva Conventions of 1949, protecting prisoners of war, didn't cover so-called "enemy combatants" seized in the war on terrorism, enabling the CIA to use aggressive interrogation techniques that are widely considered tantamount to torture.

The compromise bill seeks to immunize interrogators from prosecution for those tactics prior to the end of 2005, while limiting their use going forward. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that "would put our own troops at risk if other countries decide to apply a similar standard."

Critics of the compromise praised Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner of Virginia for forcing the White House to rethink some of what it wanted from Congress, such as changing the wording of U.S. obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and convicting detainees without letting them see key evidence against them.

Still, critics said the administration got too much.

The compromise defines nine "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions as felony war crimes and rules out techniques that could cause serious mental or physical pain. But it gives the president, not Congress, the authority to decide what gray-area techniques should be allowed and how violations should be punished.

Critics also expressed doubts that a required executive order from the president will clearly define the new boundaries of interrogations.

"The key to this deal will be whether Congress exercises real oversight over the CIA interrogation program," said Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. She said the White House should agree to give the intelligence panels a description of the techniques it wants to authorize, legal justifications and evidence that the techniques are necessary and effective. "Congress cannot and must not rubber-stamp another executive-branch intelligence program without adequate oversight," she said.

Ratner said the bill appears to allow CIA interrogators to continue leaving scantily clad detainees in cold rooms, forcing them to stand in stressful positions or denying them sleep for prolonged periods - possibly all at once. "I would hope they will come out and say that's not allowed," he said. "Right now, this bill is full of holes."

The measure, he noted, does nothing to bar renditions, in which the CIA or another agency transfers custody of a detainee to a foreign government, where the detainee could be tortured outside U.S. jurisdiction.

Senators who negotiated the bill said they believe it would bar the use of simulated drowning, known as "water-boarding," a tactic reportedly used on Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the self-proclaimed mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The compromise introduced into legislation on Friday would affect the handling of 469 detainees held at Guantanamo - including Sheikh Mohammed and 13 other "high-value" figures moved this month from secret CIA prisons overseas - and all future captives.

The legislation also limits detainees from appealing in federal court to challenge their detentions - a right that dates to the Magna Carta in the year 1215. Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., of the Senate Judiciary Committee has voiced concerns and scheduled a hearing Monday to explore that issue.

On Rough Treatment, A Rough Accord (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Draft legislation to create a new system of military courts for terrorism suspects would allow prosecutors to introduce at future trials confessions that were obtained through "cruel, unusual, or inhumane" interrogations by the CIA or the military before 2005, but not afterward.

The legislation would also allow defense attorneys to challenge the use of hearsay information obtained through coercive interrogations in distant countries only if they can prove it is unreliable, a daunting task if the information consists of written statements from people the lawyers have no right to confront in court.

These complex provisions reflect some of the last-minute changes to broad legislation drafted by the White House and Republican lawmakers to establish a unique set of rules for detaining, interrogating and trying foreigners believed to be involved in hostilities against the United States.

The bill is designed to confer Congress's approval for the first extrajudicial U.S. trials of non-soldiers since World War II. Many of its provisions were put in to ensure that the rough detention and interrogation policies adopted by the Bush administration in 2001 and 2002 -- and ruled illegal in June by the Supreme Court -- may continue undisturbed.

The 94-page text is dotted with language crafted not only to support future rough interrogations by the CIA but also to improve the odds of obtaining criminal convictions of detainees and to immunize officials for previous violations of a federal law governing detainee abuse. The bill was introduced by Republican leaders in the Senate yesterday after brief discussions with their House counterparts.

Many human rights groups and legal experts who parsed the bill yesterday said the White House had achieved most of its objectives in negotiations with dissident GOP senators, including John McCain (Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and John W. Warner (Va.).

They said the bill's provisions would violate detainees' legitimate rights, conflict with Supreme Court decisions, and come back to haunt Washington when Americans in foreign custody are subjected to the same harsh interrogations and military trials.

"It replaces the old broken" military trial system ruled illegal by the Supreme Court with "a new broken commission system," said Marine Corps Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense counsel for the Defense Department's Office of Military Commissions. He said "it methodically strips rights" guaranteed by laws and treaties and appears to be unconstitutional.

Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch praised the compromise language as an improvement over the administration's initial proposals. But they felt it necessary to press McCain to spell out in a planned television appearance tomorrow his view that the legislation would bar at least three categories of abusive CIA interrogations: waterboarding, which simulates drowning; extreme sleep deprivation; and "stress positions" such as lengthy forced standing.

The bill is complex partly because negotiations were rushed, following a timetable set by President Bush. The White House wants Congress to pass the legislation before adjourning at the end of next week, expecting Democrats to withhold challenges to its most controversial provisions in the pre-election period for fear of being portrayed as soft on terrorism.

But the language is also opaque because its chief objective -- the legitimization of irregular interrogations by the CIA -- is a topic shrouded in official secrecy.

"As you know, specific techniques are classified," White House national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said Thursday evening when he was asked which interrogation techniques the law sanctions. "This whole effort is to get a legal framework supported by the Congress" without letting terrorists know exactly what they will confront after capture, Hadley said. But he added that the draft language meets the CIA's needs.

From the outset, the challenge for the bill's Republican authors was to fit the government's desire for rough treatment and long detentions of terrorism suspects into a web of domestic and international rules and laws requiring fair trials and humane treatment for those held in captivity anywhere. These include the 10-year-old U.S. War Crimes Act, and the 50-year old Geneva Conventions.

Critics said yesterday that the bill's language abuses both of these, as well as the U.S. Constitution. For example, it would bar detainees from challenging the legality of their detention or treatment by the CIA or the U.S. military in any court. The administration has said this controversial "court-stripping" provision is needed so that dangerous detainees could be subjected to lengthy interrogations without hope of release before military trials and could not obstruct or delay trials.

But defense lawyers, a group of retired federal judges and the American Bar Association say the provision violates due-process guarantees and Supreme Court decisions.

"Eliminating habeas is tantamount to letting hundreds of Guantanamo prisoners rot in jail," said David H. Remes, a Covington & Burlington lawyer who has represented several Yemeni detainees. "If the government does not have a valid basis for holding someone in jail, that person should have some recourse."

The bill would also bar detainees from citing the Geneva Conventions -- which the United States ratified in 1949 -- "as a source of rights" in any U.S. court, including the military panels or "commissions" established by the new law. It further states that

President Bush has the authority to interpret the meaning of a Geneva Conventions provision barring detainee abuses that fall below the threshold of "grave breaches."

Although the law states that Bush "shall issue" his interpretations in published executive orders, White House spokesman Tony Snow said yesterday that administration lawyers told him that such publication -- which McCain and others have highlighted as a major White House concession -- might not be necessary.

Another provision would explicitly bar U.S. courts from considering any "foreign or international source of law" in deciding what U.S. interrogators can lawfully do under the War Crimes Act. Eugene R. Fidell, president of the nonprofit National Institute of Military Justice, said this appears to represent one facet of a broad administration effort to keep its treatment of terrorism suspects "hermetically sealed" from treaties and the traditional law of military justice.

"God forbid there should be any infection from foreign sources," Fidell said in a joking summary of the administration's strategy.

"Context is crucial here," said Diane Orentlicher, a professor of international law at American University who studies war crimes. "The administration has tenaciously fought for a legal space to undertake 'harsh' interrogation techniques that, it claims unpersuasively, are perfectly compatible with U.S. treaty obligations. By prohibiting victims of even the most severe war crimes from invoking the Geneva Conventions in habeas or civil actions," the agreed-upon version of the bill would undermine the included detainee protections, she said.

GOP Upbeat On Terror-Trial Bill (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

House GOP leaders signaled yesterday that they are satisfied with the main elements of a bill on military trials negotiated Thursday by dissident Republican senators and White House officials, and they predicted that Congress will pass the measure before adjourning next week.

"We're going to get this thing across the finish line," Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) told reporters, less than 24 hours after giving the measure a much cooler reception.

The House response all but settles an intraparty squabble and puts congressional Democrats in a difficult spot six weeks before elections in which they hope to wrest many House and Senate seats from the GOP. Some of the Democrats' liberal constituents dislike the bill, viewing it as a green light for President Bush to resume a CIA policy of interrogating foreign terrorism suspects with harsh techniques that some critics consider torture. But to oppose the compromise, which Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has embraced, would subject them to charges of being soft on terrorism, several analysts said.

Many Democrats would undoubtedly like to change the bill, "but probably those in competitive races will just have to stay behind McCain," said political scientist Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. A House Democratic leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss political strategy, said: "We had really hoped the White House had caved, but it's looking more and more like the senators caved."

The compromise bill on rules for the trials, known as military "commissions," outlines the kinds of detainee mistreatment by CIA interrogators that would constitute crimes. It bars the administration from reinterpreting the Geneva Conventions but gives the president a dominant role in deciding which interrogation methods would be permitted.

Hunter, who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, raised concerns Thursday about the bill's prohibition against convicting defendants with classified information they are not allowed to see. Yesterday, Hunter said he was satisfied because the suspects would not learn the identity of undercover officers who gathered the crucial evidence.

With Congress planning to adjourn by Sept. 30, it is possible that last-minute snags could complicate or even prevent the bill's passage. But top Democrats in both houses indicated that they will not stand in the bill's path and risk being blamed for its demise.

"I will need to look at the final bill carefully, but elements of the compromise I have seen are promising," said Ike Skelton (Mo.), the Armed Services Committee's ranking Democrat.

Republicans, meanwhile, signaled plans to trumpet their newfound unity and attack Democrats even if only a handful oppose the bill. The office of House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) released a statement saying that "while Democrats talk out of both sides of their mouth, Republicans are working together . . . to provide predictability and clear guidance to both our military and civilian personnel so they may continue to keep Americans safe."

Until the breakthrough was announced Thursday, Democrats had let Republicans fight among themselves as they backed McCain and Sens. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) in their struggle with the White House. Now that McCain and his fellow dissidents have joined hands with Bush, it will be difficult to attack the deal, Democrats acknowledged.

That is not sitting well with liberal activists, whose energy will be important to Democrats on Election Day. Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington legislative office, called the legislation a "get out of jail free" card for the administration's "top torture officials." She said it would render the Geneva Conventions' protections "irrelevant and unenforceable."

Democratic political strategists at Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research encouraged Democrats to challenge Republicans on national security issues. Jeremy Rosner, senior vice president, said polling suggests that Bush's focus on security matters in the past weeks may have helped his personal approval ratings, but it has harmed Republican lawmakers by elevating anxieties over Iraq.

"There is much more room than people have guessed for Democrats to engage on this issue, to get heard and even to win," he stressed.

A few liberal Democratic lawmakers attacked the bill yesterday, but none signaled all-out plans to try to kill it. "By using legal mumbo jumbo to obscure the fact that the CIA will continue to be allowed to use torture and will actually be insulated from legal liability for previous acts of torture, President Bush is proceeding ever further down the slippery slope that Colin Powell warned us will endanger American troops in the field by encouraging other countries to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.).

White House aides are practically daring such Democrats to oppose the legislation. "Now the test is for the Democrats," a senior administration official said. "What are they going to do? . . . This does show that there's a consistent voice now on the subject coming out of our party."

But some conservatives remain angry with McCain and his allies. One Republican leader called them the "it's all about me" senators.

"At a time when we were supposed to be showing unity, we wasted a week on something that could have been worked out behind closed doors," one leadership aide said.

Differences Settled In Deal Over Detainee Treatment (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 22 — After weeks of internal wrangling over legislation to interrogate and prosecute terrorism suspects, Republicans on Friday put aside their differences, setting the House and Senate on a path to approve a compromise struck with the White House before lawmakers break to campaign for the midterm elections.

The House leader who on Thursday had been the only Republican to raise objections to the deal between Senate Republicans and the White House said Friday that he decided he liked the compromise legislation even better than the bill his committee had passed.

“The new provisions are excellent,” said the leader, Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee. “I like them.”

Mr. Hunter, whose committee had endorsed a bill looking much like what the White House had initially proposed, said that although he was still reading the compromise, he believed that the House and the Senate could agree on a common bill, eliminating the need for a conference between the two, and making it possible to win final passage in the five days before Congress adjourns for the midterms.

Senator Mitch McConnell, the No. 2 Republican in the Senate, introduced the compromise bill on the floor Friday, but the leaders said they would not decide until early next week when to begin the debate that would lead to a vote.

After weeks of embarrassing division on a signature issue, Republicans resumed their campaign to portray themselves as the party of strength on national security, with Mr. McConnell practically daring Democrats to get in the way.

“We think our record as a party on the war on terror is excellent and we intend to take that to the American people,” he said. “My advice to the Democrats would be to support us. That would be a great way to take that issue off the table.”

Democrats have allowed three Republican senators with strong military credentials — John W. Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — to take the lead in resisting the president on the issue. Democratic leaders were largely positive about the agreement reached Thursday, signaling that they would continue to cooperate, rather than risk looking obstructionist heading into the midterms.

“A handful of principled Republican Senators have forced the White House to back down from the worst elements of its extreme proposal for new interrogation rules,” said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

The biggest outstanding question was how the White House would define what interrogation techniques are banned under the bill.

The proposed legislation outlaws under the War Crimes Act "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, including specific crimes such as murder, torture and rape, but also broad descriptions that might encompass a variety of crimes: maiming, extreme physical pain, trying to cause physical harm, and serious mental harm.

But the law leaves to the White House to say by executive order whether any techniques that do not rise to the level of grave breaches, but are still objectionable, would also be prohibited.

The executive order is to be published in the Federal Register, where it would be subject to review by Congress. The White House had resisted this proposal, but Senate Republicans insisted on it.

The White House said Friday that it had not yet begun to talk about what techniques the order would include.

The White House had submitted to a demand from Senate Republicans that it take out language that would have redefined the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, which President Bush said was crucial to provide "clarity" to C.I.A. officers regarding what interrogation techniques they can use.

Mr. McCain said on the "Today" show on Friday, "We got what we wanted."

But administration officials resisted the characterization that Mr. Bush had made significant concessions.

"The president had a single test, and the test was met," said Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary, referring to Mr. Bush's repeated assertion that he would accept only a bill that allowed a Central Intelligence Agency program to interrogate major terrorism suspects to continue. "We weren't wedded to the initial language."

The White House resisted saying whether the bill would permit that program to continue in the same form as it has operated in the past. "The program will still be the effective program that it has been," Ms. Perino said.

Some human rights lawyers said they felt the senators had achieved a significant victory in getting the president to drop his demand on the Geneva Conventions, and in securing a provision that protects a defendant's right to see the substance of any classified evidence shown the jury, without revealing sensitive information.

But some said they objected to a proposed provision on habeas corpus rights that denies detainees a right to argue in federal court that they are being improperly held. And some experts in military justice complained that Mr. Bush, through the executive order, would retain substantial authority to define acceptable interrogation techniques. They feared that the White House would push the limits on harsh techniques.

Senators Warner, McCain and Graham said repeatedly that they wanted the administration to have to define these techniques, so that it would have to take responsibility for them, and any public heat. Otherwise, they believed, the president or C.I.A. would justify any techniques that caused public outrage by saying, in effect, "Congress said we could."

By requiring the order to be published in the public record, they believe Congress will retain some oversight.

"You may have some check on the gray area," said John Radsan, who was assistant general counsel for the C.I.A. from 2002 to 2004. "The nongovernmental organizations can assess the standard. Congress can. The American public can."

Representative Jane Harman of California, the senior Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the key would be whether Congress exercised that oversight. To do so, Ms. Harman said, the Intelligence Committees must be told what techniques the president intends to use.

"If Congress does not demand this information, we will be giving the president another blank check to violate the law," she said.

Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, the senior Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, said the compromise was "promising," particularly the provisions on classified evidence.

And Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, praised Senators Warner, McCain and Graham as "standing up to the administration" and producing a bill that, "while it has a number of problems, is a substantial improvement over the language proposed by the administration."

But Mr. Levin objected in particular to the rules on coerced evidence. The compromise would ban evidence obtained through "cruel, unusual or inhumane treatment" as defined by the Detainee Torture Act going back to when that act was passed, in December. "This approach, which was insisted upon by the administration, would put our own troops at risk if other countries decide to apply a similar standard, and is abhorrent to American values," Mr. Levin said.

He argued in favor of language originally proposed by the three senators and approved by the committee, which would exclude statements obtained as result of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, no matter when they were obtained.

Mr. Levin and Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, say they will try to amend the habeas provisions in the bill.

Mr. Specter plans to hold a hearing on the issue on Monday. But that is not expected to hold up the bill's proceeding to the floor.

Interrogations Deal Grants Bush Leeway (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 23, 2006

A Republican deal on terrorism trials and interrogations would give President Bush wide latitude to interpret standards for prisoner treatment, even though it doesn't include a provision he wanted on the Geneva Conventions.

The resulting legislation, if passed next week by Congress as Republicans hope, would revive the CIA's terrorist interrogation program because it would reduce the risk that agency workers could be found guilty of war crimes.

The deal also could open the door to aggressive techniques that test the bounds of international standards of prisoner treatment.

"The key to this deal will be whether Congress exercises real oversight over the CIA interrogation program," said California Rep. Jane Harman, who as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee has been briefed on how the CIA handles terrorism suspects.

The GOP bill outlines specific war crimes such as torture and rape, but it also says the president can "interpret the meaning and application" of the Geneva Convention standards to less severe interrogation procedures. Such a provision is intended to allow him to authorize methods that might otherwise be seen as illegal by international courts.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said the president plans to use this authority to "clarify" Geneva Convention obligations by executive order, which must be published in the Federal Register

Harman said Friday she wants the administration to give Congress a list of techniques approved by the president and legal justification for the methods.

"If Congress does not demand this information, we will be giving the president another blank check to violate the law," she said.

President Bush has been pushing legislation that would endorse the CIA program since June, when the Supreme Court ruled al-Qaida members must be protected under the Geneva Conventions, a 1949 treaty that sets international standards for the treatment of war prisoners .

Before the court ruling, the legality of the interrogation program relied on Bush's assumption that the combatants were not protected under the treaty and, therefore, could be subjected to aggressive techniques.

U.S. officials say the Supreme Court ruling — which also determined the trials Bush established to prosecute the terrorists were illegal — threw cold water on the program because of fears interrogators could be prosecuted for war crimes.

The White House wanted to have Congress endorse the program with a law narrowly defining Geneva Convention standards, giving the president the latitude he wanted to continue the CIA program.

But when three GOP senators objected and were joined by growing numbers of allies — claiming such a move would be seen as an attempt to back out of the treaty — the White House relented. In a deal struck Thursday, the White House and Senate Republicans agreed to drop from the bill an abbreviated definition of Geneva Convention standards.

But enough legal parsing was added to the bill to achieve the president's desired effect anyway.

The Republican bill provides legal protection for the CIA program by precisely defining and enumerating atrocities widely accepted as war crimes — including torture, rape, biological experiments, and cruel and inhuman treatment.

For acts that do not rise to the level of a war crime but may test the bounds of the Geneva Conventions, the GOP bill allows the president to make the call.

The net effect is to raise the legal bar on war crime violations, making it tougher to prosecute a U.S. official unless the act meets those definitions.

"It sounds like the administration got a pretty good deal actually" because it would reinstate the president's prerogative, said John Yoo, a former Justice Department lawyer who helped write internal memos in 2002 designed to give the government more leeway in aggressive questioning of suspects.

Human rights lawyers disagree on whether this flexibility, along with the bill's definition of cruel treatment, would endorse such techniques as "waterboarding" — a method intended to simulate the sensation of drowning. Waterboarding and similar interrogation methods allegedly used by the CIA are not specifically identified as war crimes although some say these techniques could qualify as cruel and inhumane.

But, legal experts agree, in the end it will be up to the president to determine when most interrogation methods go too far. The bill bans detainees from protesting their detention and treatment in court.

"You always run into the potential ... that we're going to go back to secret prisons and bad things will happen," said John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general. "And there's really not a way in legislation to make sure that doesn't happen."

Hutson, who staunchly opposed the administration's initial legal proposal, said he believes the administration intends to "interpret the words in good faith."

Congress is expected to vote on the bill before lawmakers leave at the end of next week for midterm elections. While the bill has been agreed to by the Senate, House conservatives have said they were concerned with the provision that requires a defendant access to evidence if used in an attempt to convict him or her. This stipulation could expose sensitive or classified information, they said.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said Friday he would support the bill but was still reviewing the rules surrounding evidence.

But regarding the CIA program and "the protection of their people, this does the right thing and it does protect them," said Hunter, R-Calif.

Defense Lawyers Assail Legislation On Detainees (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The bill faces scrutiny for stripping habeas corpus. Rights groups worry over vagueness.

WASHINGTON — Military defense lawyers assailed compromise legislation for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects, contending Friday that proposed rules would prevent them from learning whether evidence used against their clients was obtained through coercion or torture.

At the same time, rights groups that initially endorsed the compromise between the Bush administration and key Senate Republicans expressed reservations, saying it appeared on closer reading to be vague and could give President Bush and future presidents too much latitude.

"It is worse than the system that was in place before," said Marine Maj. Michael Mori, a military defense lawyer. "It is not going to ensure there is a fair trial."

Congressional Republican leaders, nonetheless, plan to move the compromise military tribunal bill to a vote next week. They may tie the bill, which has support among a number of Democrats, to a more controversial measure authorizing Bush's once-secret warrantless surveillance program.

Legislation introduced by the Senate GOP leadership Friday would make it clear that the president, in some cases, has the authority under the Constitution to unilaterally order surveillance without a judge's approval.

Both the tribunal and surveillance measures are centerpieces of the security-focused agenda the GOP wants to highlight before the November election, which is expected to determine control of Congress.

Republicans, who were engaged in an intraparty fight over the tribunal legislation until the agreement was reached, appeared to be closing ranks.

But the measure faces additional scrutiny. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) called a hearing for Monday on a provision in the bill that would deny detainees the right to challenge their detention in court, known as the right of habeas corpus.

"It may be the only way some people can have their situation resolved in court," said retired Rear Adm. John Hutson, a former top Navy judge advocate general and member of the board of Human Rights First.

Although the rights group supported the compromise, the group raised questions Friday.

Army Maj. Tom Fleener, an attorney who represents a Yemeni man imprisoned at Guantanamo, said that under the proposed rules, "there is no way for the defendant to determine how the evidence was obtained. There is no way to find out how the witness was interrogated because the techniques are going to be classified."

The compromise leaves it up to military judges to determine whether evidence had been coerced and can be admitted.

Human rights groups also expressed concern about how the Bush administration could interpret the compromise language.

"The main concern is the legislation is ambiguous," said Alexandra Arriaga, director of government relations for Amnesty International USA. "It has language that can be interpreted in many ways. We want to be certain practices that have long been considered torture or cruel, inhumane or degrading are still prohibited."

Allies of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who helped broker the compromise, said the deal does not give the administration any more leeway to interpret U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention than it already had.

But Christopher Anders, ACLU legislative counsel, said he worried that the administration would use the language to claim approval of tough methods.

"If this administration had a better track record of following the rule of law … there wouldn't be so much worry," Anders said.

DOJ_NMG_0068013

Surveillance legislation introduced Friday by Senate GOP leaders also drew criticism.

Civil liberties groups and privacy advocates said the legislation would unduly expand the government's power to monitor the e-mail and phone calls of American citizens and others in terrorism-related cases.

Critics also said it would mark a major departure from the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that required U.S. officials to obtain court approval before launching secret domestic spying programs.

The bill includes a few new safeguards, including a requirement that the administration report to Congress every 180 days on surveillance activities. It also limits how long intercepted communications may be kept.

Specter "remains concerned about ensuring that there is judicial review of the terrorist surveillance program," said a Judiciary Committee aide who said the chairman was, nonetheless, "pleased the legislative process was moving forward."

As Army Adds Interrogators, It Outsources Training (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Since the Iraq war began, the U.S. Army has quadrupled the number of soldiers it trains each year to be detainee interrogators, according to Army officials involved in the program.

Next year, 1,200 interrogators are set to be trained at the Army Intelligence Center at Fort Huachuca, Ariz., up from about 300 in 2003. "The number being trained is based on the current need of interrogators in theater," said Angela Moncur, deputy public affairs officer at the intelligence center.

The greatest one-year expansion of the Army's interrogation program, from 500 to 1,000 trainees, took place in 2005, the year after public disclosure of the scandals involving questioning of prisoners by Army intelligence personnel at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison. Today, with the Army introducing a new interrogation manual and Congress wrestling with legislation sought by the White House that would legalize the CIA's more aggressive questioning techniques, the number of people training to be interrogators is to rise again.

The Army is gearing up for the effort by hiring private companies to handle the training. Last month, the service awarded contracts that could grow to more than $50 million in the next five years to three private firms to provide additional instructors to the 18-week basic course in human-intelligence interrogation at Fort Huachuca.

"If you are qualified as interrogator, you now are either in Iraq or teaching others how to do it when they go there," said Pat Gromek, who spent 23 years as an Army intelligence officer and now handles business development for Integrated Systems Improvement Services Inc. in Sierra Vista, Ariz., the site of Fort Huachuca. ISIS is one of the firms selected to supply interrogation instructors.

The contracts call for the companies to provide outside instructors who would train "selected enlisted soldiers in the skills and knowledge required to perform . . . tactical human intelligence collection," said a government notice published earlier this month. Subjects to be covered include how to interrogate and debrief enemy personnel, potential threat forces, warrior skills, intelligence analysis, and military justice and intelligence law, according to a statement supplied by the center. "The laws of land warfare and the Geneva Convention" are specifically listed in an article on the course in Military Intelligence, an Army publication.

The Army, in the contracting process, estimated the annual cost for an outside instructor at $100,000, Moncur said. That is at least $20,000 above the average of what someone in the service would receive, according to an analysis of military pay vs. civilian pay on the Today's Military Web site.

Only $10 million of the overall amount will be spent next year for an additional 63 instructors to handle the increase in the number of trainees taking the interrogation course, according to Maj. Matthew Garner, the center's public affairs officer. In later years it could ramp up further, Garner said.

Moncur said future instructor levels would depend on the situation in Iraq. "The need may change if we bring some troops home," she said, adding that the intelligence center did not know whether the Army would continue to add instructors at the same or a greater rate.

The increase in the Army's capacity for human-intelligence interrogation reflects the overall expansion of Defense Department intelligence operations at home and abroad since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the start of military operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. As Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told the Senate Appropriations Committee in May, a significant upgrading and refocusing of U.S. intelligence is underway "that will take a good deal of time."

One little-publicized problem in Iraq has been the paucity of intelligence for tactical, or day-to-day, use by commanders on the ground, and the lack of trained Army personnel to do the job. CIA officials have said privately that they have been forced to strip stations in Europe and elsewhere to provide case officers for tours in Iraq. The agency's Baghdad operations office is its largest. The CIA officials want to see the military take up tactical intelligence so CIA officers and analysts can concentrate on broader, strategic targets.

Turning to outside contractors to teach interrogation reflects another trend of the Rumsfeld Pentagon: outsourcing programs to private companies that often are filled with retired military men and women who did similar work when they were in the service.

In the case of the interrogation contract, the companies have had to gear up to handle the work. The day after ISIS received word it had been awarded a part of the contract, it had an advertisement on its Web site saying the company "has been awarded the contract for additional HUMINT Instructor positions. We are seeking HUMINT Instructors to fill numerous openings."

Gromek, the ISIS official, directed intelligence training for Army officers for four years while serving in the military. Before the Iraq war, he said, the interrogator career path was "moribund." ISIS won its share of the contract, he said, because it already had supplied interrogation instructors to Fort Huachuca and this time expects to place 15 to 25 of them. He was confident he could fill the slots with people returning from Iraq, including National Guard and reserve troops.

Another company that won a contract, MTC Technologies Inc. of Dayton, Ohio, has done work for the Air Force. Many of its top executives are retired Air Force colonels, and its board of directors includes retired Lt. Gen. Kenneth A. Minihan, who headed the National Security Agency and the Defense Intelligence Agency. Also on the board are retired Gen. Lester L. Lyles, former commander of the Air Force Materiel Command, and retired Gen. Lawrence A. Skantze, a former Air Force vice chief of staff and commander of the Air Force Systems Command.

MTC's news release announcing its contract made it clear that this first major deal at Fort Huachuca was something of a new direction, expanding "our foothold in the growing field of intelligence training and services." The release added: "This is an excellent complement to the training and services we provide to the other military services."

The third contract winner was Oak Grove Technologies Inc. of Raleigh, N.C. Its chief operating officer is retired Lt. Gen. Philip R. Kensinger Jr., the former commander of the U.S. Army Special Operations Command.

Change Of Heart (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 23, 2006

Three renegade Republican senators may be the biggest winners in Thursday's deal between the White House and Capitol Hill over the treatment of high-level terror detainees. The senators, John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner, had led the opposition to the Bush administration's plans to redefine how the United States would apply the Geneva Conventions to terror detainees.

Two sources close to negotiations between the two sides tell NEWSWEEK that key elements of the deal were first floated by the senators as long as a week ago. (The sources familiar with the negotiations asked for anonymity because of the continuing political sensitivity of the issue.) At one point several days ago, says one of the sources, it looked like the two sides were getting close to an agreement. But the White House then backed away from the negotiations and took a hard line for several days—for reasons that remain unclear.

But by Thursday, the administration essentially agreed to the McCain-Graham-Warner proposal that it had previously rejected. What caused this change of heart? The sources say it was clear that the GOP renegades' position was supported by at least 51 senators. By the same token, an important element in the compromise, the sources say, was the recognition by Graham, McCain and Warner all along that neither they nor a majority of their Senate colleagues really wanted to put the CIA interrogation program completely out of business.

During a five-hour closed-door meeting Thursday on Capitol Hill, the rebel senators and their aides hammered out an agreement with White House representatives. Initially, administration officials, including President Bush, had indicated in public remarks that they believed the CIA interrogation and detention program could only go forward if Congress passed legislation clarifying an allegedly "vague" clause in the 60-year-old Geneva Conventions, an international treaty governing the treatment of prisoners. But Senators McCain, Graham and Warner maintained that international law does not permit the United States to reinterpret treaties ratified by Congress years after they went into force. If Congress did this, the senators argued, then foreign countries could reinterpret the Geneva Conventions in the event they capture American soldiers overseas and want to interrogate them using harsh methods.

The new agreement does not qualify or redefine the "vague" Geneva language on "outrages" or "humiliation and degradation"; the administration had sought such clarifications in order to give CIA interrogators legal protection against prosecution or civil lawsuits under the Geneva's terms as a result of harsh interrogation techniques. Instead, the agreement between the senators and the White House alters a section of the U.S. criminal code dealing with war crimes to more tightly define what kind of interrogation methods by American officials would be legal.

During the course of working out the agreement, the administration and the GOP senators reached an understanding—not explicitly laid out in the formal legal language agreed to by both sides—that the CIA would still be allowed, if it was deemed necessary, to use harsher methods than are employed by the U.S. military to question high-level terrorist detainees. However, the agreement also contains legalistic language that the sources close to the negotiations say effectively bans one of the most controversial interrogation techniques that the CIA allegedly used on at least a handful of high-level terrorists it detained in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, a practice known as "waterboarding."

As described in various media accounts, "waterboarding" involves strapping an interrogation subject to a board and then pouring water over his face until he begins to believe he is drowning. The CIA is believed to have used the tactic on at least one high-level Al Qaeda detainee—the 9/11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed—and perhaps one or two others.

However, McCain's group believed that waterboarding was clearly illegal under the Geneva Conventions and probably U.S. anti-torture legislation, too. More than a week ago, the administration had signaled via its negotiators that it intended to stop the CIA from waterboarding, though it still wanted agency interrogators to be able, in extreme cases, to use other harsh techniques not available to U.S. military interrogators. (Though these remain classified, human-rights lawyers have claimed they include various forms of slapping and exposing interrogation subjects to stressful exercise and extreme temperatures).

The agreement reached by the White House with the three senators contains coded language which a source close to the negotiations say is intended to outlaw waterboarding. The language of the agreement, which for the moment is being kept confidential, alters the U.S. criminal code to ban "serious and non-transitory mental harm (which need not be prolonged)," according to a draft of the wording made available to NEWSWEEK. This, according to the source, was clearly meant by the agreement's authors to include waterboarding, though the agreement does not use that word.

In a potentially controversial twist, the agreement also says that the proposed new language banning "mental harm" also will only begin to apply after Congress passes the overall legislation containing the new language. A source close to the negotiations said human-rights activists are likely to criticize this detail as an attempt to declare legal, after the fact, any waterboarding episodes which might have occurred before the legislation was passed. However, the source said that U.S. interrogators who might have engaged in such practices could cite secret government orders or legal opinions as legal defenses should they ever face criminal or civil charges.

A source familiar with Thursday's marathon negotiating session which led up to the new agreement said that Senators Graham, Warner and McCain all personally participated in the talks. The administration's chief negotiators were national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and Steven Bradbury, a senior Justice Department official. According to the source, the talks took place in a Senate office suite reserved for the staff of Vice President Dick Cheney. The source noted, however, that neither Cheney nor his aides, usually amongst the hardest of administration hard-liners on antiterrorism practices and legislation, were either present or visible during the critical final negotiating round.

European Faults U.S. Official For Remarks On Geneva Rules (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

PARIS, Sept. 22 — The European counterterrorism chief, Gijs de Vries, criticized a Bush administration official who suggested that the Geneva Conventions should not be considered sacrosanct, and that the legal framework for the treatment of terrorists should be amended.

The State Department's legal adviser, John B. Bellinger III, said in an interview published Thursday in The Financial Times that he questioned whether the Geneva Conventions should be "the immutable legal holy grail as to what the rules ought to be in the 21st century."

"Mr. Bellinger is suggesting that we should change the rules," Mr. de Vries, the European Union's counterterrorism coordinator, said Friday in a telephone interview. "The opinion of Europe's ministers is that respecting the rules, not bending them, is essential to our credibility and hence to our effectiveness in the fight against terrorism."

The Bush administration, which has been trying to provide a legal framework for interrogations of terrorism suspects and protection of the C.I.A. officers conducting the interviews, agreed Thursday to drop its demand that Congress redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

The move was a concession to a group of dissenting Republicans, among them Senator John McCain, of Arizona, who had expressed fears that other nations might redefine their obligations as well, and that the move could potentially endanger American troops abroad in case of capture.

In a telephone interview on Friday, Mr. Bellinger expressed "shock" that his comments had not been well received, and said he was "not suggesting that the old rules should be discarded or that they should not be followed. The U.S. is absolutely committed to our obligations under the Geneva Convention and under existing human rights treaties."

Mr. de Vries cautioned Western governments not to sacrifice their principles in the fight against terrorism.

"The purpose of terrorism is always to provoke governments, and in this case Western governments, into overreacting by undermining the rights we have pledged to uphold," Mr. de Vries said. That, he said, just creates grievances that encourage further radicalism.

"We must also prevent the recruitment of the next generation of terrorists," he said.

A Toturous Compromise (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 23, 2006

JOHN MCCAIN and two other Republican senators rebelled last week against President Bush's bid to pass rules for interrogating and trying terrorism suspects that violate the Geneva Conventions, but the senators have now agreed to a compromise that leaves the conventions on life support at best. Under the deal struck Thursday, the Geneva rules on abusive interrogations are not formally rewritten. Yet Bush -- who undercut McCain's own 2005 anti torture law with a signing statement -- is granted the right, an aide said, to permit methods that he will not have to disclose.

One of the three senators, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, says he thinks the compromise will forbid the use of ``waterboarding," or simulated drowning, but that's not certain. Unless Congress wants to set a precedent for other countries to use in mistreating US troops in future conflicts, it should insist that interrogations be conducted in accordance with the Army's field manual and that any special trial commissions use the military's court-martial procedures, which are sound.

The three senators did win one significant concession: The administration agreed not to use classified evidence that the suspects cannot see themselves. Declassified summaries of classified material would be shown both to jurors and the suspect. But even this provision might not survive negotiations with the House of Representatives, whose Republican leaders would allow the use of classified evidence a suspect cannot see.

Another point of dispute between the president and the three senators was the use in court of testimony provided under coercion. Thursday's agreement forbids evidence obtained by torture, but it would permit judges to let some coerced testimony into court.

Both the senators' bill and Bush's would deny suspects a centuries-old bulwark of due process: the right under habeas corpus to go to court to challenge continued detention.

Bush and the senators have sought to codify new procedures for detainees because the Supreme Court ruled in June that treatment of terrorism suspects must comply with US law and the Geneva Conventions. Under the conventions' Common Article 3, all detainees -- not just uniformed prisoners of war -- have the legal rights ``recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The compromise struck by Bush and the senators falls short of that standard on one count after another.

After delaying legal action against hundreds of detainees for almost five years, the administration should work with Congress to devise interrogation and trial rules that civilized peoples expect. Otherwise, there is every chance that the Supreme Court will again strike down the shortcuts favored by the election-minded leaders in the White House and Congress.

Detainee compromise closer to the mark

That was quite a dogfight this week, with GOP senators John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham tussling with President Bush over how the U.S. can try and treat detainees in the war on terror. The senators, fortunately, won on some key points, such as preventing detainees from being convicted on the basis of evidence they can't see. The White House gained some wiggle room to define in domestic law what's permissible and what's not when it comes to roughing up, er, handling detainees. But all in all, the compromise kept alive the tradition of openness in our democracy that we would like others to emulate. The House now needs to get on board.

Dallas officials are doing the right thing to want to commit more than $1 million in city and private contributions to keep the financially struggling Urban Market grocery open for the next two years. City Hall has worked long and hard to encourage downtown residential living and even longer and harder to attract a grocery. We applaud Economic Development Director Karl Zavitkovsky, Assistant City Manager Ryan Evans and other city officials for proposing a pragmatic, proactive plan to prevent the grocery store's financial problems from derailing the city's broader strategy for downtown.

Pavarotti of the plains

A great Texan and icon of traditional country music died this week. Don Walser, the guitar-picking Western swing virtuoso who won legions of young fans with his honey-rich tenor and heavenly yodeling, died at 72 after a long illness. Mr. Walser became a full-time musician after retiring from a National Guard career and was a mainstay at Austin's legendary Broken Spoke honky-tonk. Mr. Walser never abandoned his West Texas roots and was honored in Washington with a National Heritage Award in 2000.

Drug king no more

After Mexico handed over a major drug lord to the United States for the first time last weekend, President Vicente Fox made a welcome announcement: "We will extradite all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice." Extraditions are crucial in our international war against the drug trade. For too long, Mexican officials argued that suspected drug lords should face justice at home and balked at extraditing anyone facing the death penalty, which Mexico vehemently opposes.

Airports aren't the only scary places

For reasons we still don't understand, Congress has never applied the same focus to keeping terrorists out of our seaports that it has to keeping them out of our skies. Fortunately, though, the Senate passed legislation that would help at-risk ports secure themselves – particularly in detecting "dirty bombs" in containers. And Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison got money allocated to increase the number of federal agents screening goods at ports. The House has passed a similar bill, so we'd like to think Congress could iron this one out quickly and get it to the president's desk by the October recess.

Hugo's fractured theology

So Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez wants international respect? Perhaps he could start by not using the United Nations for the most vile personal attack on another head of state that the international body has possibly ever witnessed. In referring to President Bush as "El Diablo" – the devil – and in all of his other despicable antics, Mr. Chávez revealed the sort of poor judgment that is likely to diminish his influence at the U.N. and – we hope – squash his bid to get Venezuela a seat on the Security Council.

Claytie Friedman?

Kinky Friedman may be a hoot and a holler, but his gubernatorial campaign might not survive his unguarded mouth. This week, the Internet was buzzing with a video clip of the entertainer from a cable interview last year. When asked what he'd do with sex offenders, the Kinkster quipped, "Throw them in prison and throw away the key and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself." Yes, Kinky's political incorrectness is a tonic at times, and we appreciate his disdain for condescending ethnic politicking ("tamales in the barrio, bagels with the Jews," as he once put it). But Kinky, who did not disavow the line, doesn't seem to get the line between political incorrectness and obnoxiousness. When will it stop?

So, what are you hiding?

For years, candidates for the U.S. House and the White House have filed campaign finance reports electronically. Senatorial candidates, however, insist on old-fashioned paper filings, a snail-mail approach that makes it exceedingly difficult for the public to decipher the source of special-interest money. We don't buy the argument that the Senate has a right to make its own rules when it is obvious that this foot-dragging is intended to keep the public in the dark for as long as possible.

Detainee Bill Needs A Closer Look (5 Letters) (NYT)

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

To the Editor:

Re “Top Republicans Reach an Accord on Detainee Bill” (front page, Sept. 22):

There is no rush on the detainee bill even if the Republicans agree about the torture issue. There are many other matters that require careful and calm analysis.

Four years ago, President Bush rushed the Iraq war resolution through Congress with no hearings at all, and the result was a disaster.

Congress should now start hearings on the whole bill, giving the public and the legal community time to examine it and consider its implications before rushing to another judgment without careful consideration.

To the Editor:

The president insists that he did not give in on the treatment and interrogation of prisoners bill. But of course!

Congress may pass whatever bill it chooses, and the president is free to make a “signing statement” giving his interpretation of that bill.

Whether he makes a signing statement or not, he is free to disregard the bill in practice, as he has done so often in the past: democracy in action under this administration.

To the Editor:
It is difficult to fathom why Senators Lindsey Graham, John W. Warner and John McCain made whatever pathetic stand they did when it came to torture yet support a bill that will strip detainees of habeas rights.
One would have thought that the same principle that animated their concerns on the Geneva Convention rules governing interrogations — how we would expect our combatants to be treated if the shoe were on the other foot — would also cry out for guaranteeing some access to the courts to challenge one's classification as eligible for indefinite incarceration.
Can you imagine the outcry if an American citizen were simply captured and imprisoned in a country that announced that there would be no review of the American's status because that country's nationals would not receive review if they were imprisoned in America?
We should all be ashamed of the wholesale evisceration of our principles in the name of national security.

President Bush continually claims that everything changed on Sept. 11. If that is the justification for radical changes to American law and values, then why does the Republican deal protecting the C.I.A. from prosecution for detainee abuse retroactively start at 1997, four years before Sept. 11, 2001?

The results of the actions taken by the administration over the last six years, culminating in this agreement on the military tribunals bill, conform with the Osama bin Laden-Al Qaeda playbook:
Seeing the United States get mired in an unwinnable war that destroys its military while creating a breeding ground for terrorists; a thoroughly fearful American populace; and greatly increased instability in the Middle East.
Perhaps most significant is the destruction of the United States' democracy through the relentless erosion of the principles and values that made our country great and a model around the world.
It's pretty obvious who is winning this war.

An Antiterror Victory (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006
The details of this week's compromise on detainee treatment between the White House and a small group of Senators led by John McCain are complicated. But the upshot of the agreement is simple and welcome: Aggressive CIA interrogations of such high-level al Qaeda prisoners as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed will be able to continue.
The CIA program was thrown into legal limbo by the Supreme Court's June ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which said that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applies to our conflict with al Qaeda. It was a bad ruling, since Article 3 is intended to apply to civil wars. But its vague prohibitions against "humiliating" and "degrading" treatment nonetheless became the law of the land, exposing CIA interrogators to potential legal jeopardy for conduct as benign as using women to question Muslim detainees.
So the White House went to Congress asking, among other things, for help in clarifying what terms like "humiliating" and "degrading" actually mean. Senator McCain and his allies objected that this would be tantamount to "rewriting" the Geneva Conventions. But their objection wasn't very convincing, since every country in the world already interprets Article 3 and somebody in the U.S. has to do so in real-world situations; legal clarity is better than leaving that job to activist judges and lawyers. In the end, the Senators came most of the way toward the White House position.
Congress will specify what it considers "grave" breaches of Geneva -- such as torture and cruel and inhuman treatment. But it will be up to the Executive Branch -- with Congress's advance blessing -- to go ahead and issue a public Executive Order defining "non-grave" breaches. This isn't exactly the full-throated Congressional endorsement that CIA interrogators ought to be able to expect. But it is still an unprecedented acknowledgement that some forms of aggressive interrogation are both necessary and permissible in the war on terror.

To be more specific, it's a fair bet that waterboarding -- or simulated drowning, the most controversial of the CIA's reported interrogation techniques -- will not be allowed under the new White House rules. But sleep deprivation and temperature variations, to name two other methods, will likely pass muster. This is not about "torture" or even "abuse," as some Administration critics dishonestly charge, but about being able to make life uncomfortable for al Qaeda prisoners who have been trained to resist milder forms of interrogation.

We're glad Mr. McCain came around to blessing a deal that will allow interrogations to continue. But we can't say his behavior in this affair has been a profile in political courage. Since the Abu Ghraib scandal he's been vaguely and irresponsibly suggesting that the CIA was engaging in unconscionable behavior. But when offered a chance to be specific about which interrogation techniques he really rejects, he punted the ball back to the White House.

Much the same can be said about many of Mr. McCain's colleagues, who have been demanding for decades that Congress be consulted on an ever-expanding range of defense and foreign-policy issues, only to run at the first hint of controversy. Their behavior shows once again why the Founders were right to vest the majority of war-fighting powers with the executive branch.

So it will soon be up to the White House to follow through and flesh out the legal details. This won't be a politically easy task, given the way such fine lawyers as Jay Bybee and John Yoo have been slimed as "pro-torture" for grappling with these issues in the past. The ACLU and media liberals are already attacking the deal and will look for ways to block it. But President Bush understands the need for legal clarity, and we trust he'll see that the job gets done.

This will be a service to the American public and to future Presidents of both parties -- perhaps even to Mr. McCain. No matter their rhetoric now, they will surely be glad to have aggressive interrogations as one antiterror tool.

Feds Seek To Block Oregon Spying Case (AP-Y)

By William Mccall

AP, September 23, 2006

U.S. Justice Department lawyers filed an appeal Friday aimed at blocking a lawsuit by a former Islamic charity that has challenged a Bush administration secret surveillance program.

U.S. District Judge Garr M. King ruled earlier this month that a lawsuit by the defunct Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation chapter in Ashland could go forward without damaging national security.

But government lawyers argue that state secrets would be revealed if the lawsuit is allowed to proceed.

The case hinges on a classified document that U.S. Treasury officials inadvertently turned over to Al-Haramain lawyers after the charity was declared a global terrorist organization.

The charity's attorneys say the document shows that two U.S. lawyers for Al-Haramain and at least one of its officials were under electronic surveillance in 2004.

Justice Department lawyers have argued the document falls under the "state secrets privilege," allowing a judge to dismiss a lawsuit if it could damage national security by revealing state secrets.

The appeal filed with the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco said "the district court is wrongly attempting to create some form of secret adversarial proceedings, and, in doing so, is raising a serious danger of disclosure of important national security information."

Steve Goldberg, a Portland attorney representing the charity, said the appeal could delay the case by a couple of years.

He also said Judge King has been careful in handling security concerns.

"The government keeps insisting that national security will be greatly threatened if we proceed," Goldberg said.

But the judge is "being very sensitive in how the case proceeds to protect the document, so again I think the government's concerns are not justified, given the way the case is being handled," Goldberg said.

Calls to the U.S. attorney's office were not returned.

The National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program has been challenged in other federal courts since The New York Times revealed it last year.

Bond Denied Roswell Terror Suspect Prosecutors Cite E-mail Saying Man Wanted To Join Taliban (AJC)

By Moni Basu, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 23, 2006

A Roswell man accused of helping plot terrorist attacks wrote an e-mail in 2001 expressing a desire to join the Taliban in Afghanistan, prosecutors said in federal court Friday.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Gerrilyn Brill denied bond for Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, 20, who along with Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, a former Georgia Tech student, was indicted in July on charges of discussing plans for waging jihad, or holy war.

The two Atlantans are accused of traveling to Canada in 2005 to meet with two of 17 suspects arrested in a roundup earlier this year.

In making the case for keeping Sadequee behind bars, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert McBurney read from an e-mail Sadequee sent on Dec. 5, 2001 that said: "I am writing to you because I need to go to Afghanistan to join the Taliban, inshallah [God willing]."

Sadequee identified himself as a 15-year-old Bangladeshi born and raised in America. He said in the e-mail that he attended Jamiah al-Uloom al-Islamiyah, a Islamic school on the outskirts of Torornto where he memorized the Quran.

"I believe that this is a test from Allah; to see who will respond to His Invitation for Jihad...." Sadequee wrote.

McBurney said, "At the young age of 15, he's trying to join the Taliban. That's after the attacks of 9/11 and when the United States was at war with the Taliban."

McBurney described Sadequee, who appeared in court wearing a baggy, beige T-shirt and khaki pants, as a flight risk who posed a danger to society. Sadequee faces up to 60 years in jail if he is convicted.

Several members of his family, including his mother and two sisters, showed up at Friday's hearing. Sadequee displayed little emotion, looking back only once as he was handcuffed and led out of the courtroom after the hearing was over.

McBurney said Sadequee shot "casing videos" of several sites in the Washington D.C. area including the Capitol, the World Bank, a Masonic temple and a fuel tank farm. He then used a computer at the offices of Raksha, an Atlanta non-profit that offers social services to the South Asian community where one of Sadequee's sisters works, to send the video files to a British man named Younis Tsouli. Tsouli called himself "Irhabi (Arabic for terrorist) 007" and ran a Web site that taught terror tactics.

McBurney said Sadequee also provided contact information for a man named Abu Omar to his co-defendant Ahmed who went to Pakistan and met with Omar in an attempt to get into a terrorist training camp.

McBurney also said federal authorities had discovered a map of Washington and two CD roms with encrypted material.

Sadequee's defense attorneys tried to paint a picture of an "unsophisticated" and "immature" young man who has little ability to leave the country if granted bond.

Lawyer Stephanie Kearns argued that her client had no passport, not even a driver's license, and that the government had no substantial evidence against him.

She said Sadequee suffered from health problems as a child which prevented him from getting the education he would have liked. Instead, Sadequee earned a GED and was hoping to attend college one day, Kearns said.

"Mr. Sadequee is sitting right here in court so he didn't join the Taliban," Kearns said. "What the indictment does not allege...is that Mr. Sadequee himself is engaging in acts of violence."

Kearns described Sadequee's arrest as a "kidnapping." She said he was whisked away while on a shopping trip with his wife in Bangladesh in April.

Kearns said Sadequee made no secret of his trip to Bangladesh and had indicated he would stay there until his wife could obtain a visa for the United States.

Kearns likened the map that was found in Sadequee's luggage to one that any tourist might obtain at a visitor center. "It's not a map that a terrorist might use," she said.

Of the two CD roms authorities confiscated, Kearns said one contained pornography. Kearns suggested that the other might have been encrypted to shield Sadequee's mother and sisters from pronographic material.

Kearns said no guns, weapons, explosives or bomb-making manuals have been disovered in Sadequee's posessesion.

"The government said there is a secret side to him," Kearns said in presenting the court with letters written by Sadequee's friends and family describing him as a non-violent man who was very involved with family. "But this side that family sees cannot just be dismissed."

Defense lawyer Don Samuel said he would appeal the denial to grant bond. He said the new evidence presented by the government, including the e-mail about the Taliban, proved nothing.

"This reminds me of the 1950s witchhunts when actors were punished because they were sympathetic to Communism," Samuel said.

Man Pleads Guilty To Al-Qaida-linked Bomb-making Charge (AP)

AP, September 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068021

HOUSTON A man accused of offering to build and sell a bomb to an al-Qaida affiliate in Houston in exchange for help in getting custody of his children has pleaded guilty in federal court.

Authorities maintain that Ronald Allen Grecula, 70, was angry with the government over losing custody of his children in 2002, when they were 10 and 3. His indictment alleges he met a federal informant that year in Pennsylvania and discussed getting custody of the children from his estranged wife either by having her killed or setting her up on drug charges.

Grecula pleaded guilty Thursday as part of a plea deal with federal prosecutors in which he faces up to 5 years in prison without parole. He is scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 15.

Grecula, a Pennsylvania native, was accused of telling the informant he would build bombs for anti-American groups such as al-Qaida in exchange for help in getting custody back from his wife, who is from Houston.

The government recorded several telephone conversations between Grecula and the confidential source. Grecula has been in custody since his arrest at a Houston hotel in May 2005.

Man, 70, Convicted In Terror Scheme (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, September 23, 2006

Pennsylvania engineer tried to sell bomb plans to undercover officers in 2005

Ronald Allen Grecula's ability to build a superbomb using a dubious theory of fusion remains in doubt, as does his mental health, but not his intention to sell his technology to al-Qaida.

The 70-year-old mechanical engineer from Bangor, Pa., pleaded guilty in a Houston federal court Thursday to accusations that he offered to provide the terrorist organization with an explosive device that he claimed was nearly as powerful as a nuclear bomb.

As it turned out, he was dealing with undercover FBI agents and Houston police officers posing as al-Qaida members.

Grecula also admitted to offering to teach a ground school for al-Qaida pilots and to telling an undercover agent that "he had a dislike for America."

Plea bargainIn return for his guilty plea to one count of providing material assistance to a terrorist organization, Grecula will receive a five-year prison sentence. The maximum penalty is 15 years and a $250,000 fine. He is to be sentenced Dec. 16.

Prosecutors also agreed to drop a charge of conspiracy to distribute drugs.

In court Thursday, after U.S. District Judge Keith Ellison asked about his welfare, Grecula replied: "I've lost some weight, but I feel great physically, working out every day."

Ellison then asked, "What did you think you were doing?"

"I was going through a difficult situation," Grecula replied. "I chose the wrong method to get out of it."

Grecula was arrested in May 2005 after meeting the undercover officers in a Houston hotel. They said he took them to a welding supply store to show how he could fabricate the bomb with easily purchased materials.

A second grand jury indicted him in August this year on the drug charge, accusing Grecula of trying to buy heroin to plant on his estranged wife, Monique Grecula, of The Woodlands.

Grecula had discussed hiring someone to kill his wife "in a mysterious way" to avoid the appearance of murder and regain custody of their two children, according to an affidavit.

Plans make no senseExplosives experts said the bomb plans Grecula outlined to the undercover agents were unworkable. His discussion of fusion "doesn't make any sense at all," one expert said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeff Vaden said, however, that government experts determined that Grecula was capable of building a bomb, if not the superbomb he described.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Abran Martinez said two items found in Grecula's Pennsylvania workshop — a mercury switch and lithium nitrate, a chemical used in fireworks — could have been used to make a bomb.

Grecula's sanity became an issue early in the case because of his exaggerated claims. Undercover agents said he compared himself to Spartacus, a Thracian gladiator who led a slave revolt against Rome.

Feds Drop Count In Hamas Terrorism Trial (AP-Y)

By Mike Robinson

AP, September 23, 2006

Federal prosecutors Friday dropped a charge that an alleged fundraiser for the Palestinian militant group Hamas gave material support to terrorists — a move that stunned defense attorneys.

Prosecutors gave no explanation in court and declined to comment afterward.

DOJ_NMG_0068022

Muhammad Salah, 53, who has been the focus of a high-profile terrorism investigation for nine years, remains charged with racketeering conspiracy and lying by denying membership in Hamas.

The dropped charge carries a 10-year maximum sentence; conspiracy carries a maximum of life, and obstruction by lying 10 years.

But the dropping of the charge was a victory for Salah, whose 2004 indictment was announced at the Justice Department by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft.

The surprise came at a hearing after Deutsch asked U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve to press prosecutors to turn over background material on a prospective government witness, Jack Mustafa.

Deutsch asked for information about how much the FBI had paid Mustafa and whether he had an arrest record. It was then that prosecutor Joseph M. Ferguson said quietly that the government wanted to drop the charge with prejudice, meaning it cannot be reinstated.

Prosecutors also said they were withdrawing Mustafa as a witness.

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

It's amazing what a few days away from this politics-obsessed town can do for one's perspective. Seen from afar, the congressional debate over the war and terrorism comes across as a Washington event designed to show that Democrats are wimps on national security and to boost Republicans as true defenders of the homeland. Or Republicans are portrayed as clueless warmongers hell-bent on sending other people's sons and daughters into battle.

In reality, the struggle on Capitol Hill is not about terrorism. It's about gaining and holding power in the fall election. And it is a disgusting sight to behold.

Only five years after a horrifying new reality crashed into America, the political parties have lost sight of the nation's interests. Now it's all about getting elected.

So what if we are doing battle with an enemy that operates without a government behind its name? So what if it's the kind of enemy that boards an airplane containing schoolchildren and their teachers, mothers holding toddlers by the hand and other innocent civilians minding their own business? So what if it sets out to kill because the intended victims have the bad grace to live in America?

Unless I'm mistaken, the Sept. 11 hijackers didn't ask the doomed passengers if they were Democrats or Republicans. They didn't care one bit if the people strapped in their seats for takeoff were liberals, conservatives or neocons.

They made no politically correct announcements allowing women, children and people of color to leave the aircraft before the flight attendants closed the doors.

The fanatics who took the innocent to their deaths set their eyes on those three 11-year-old D.C. public school students, Rodney Dickens, Bernard Brown and Asia Cottom, and on 3-year-old Dana Falkenberg and 8-year-old Zoe Falkenberg, as they boarded American Airlines Flight 77 at Dulles.

They couldn't have missed seeing 3-year-old David Brandhorst, 2-year-old Christine Hanson and 4-year-old Juliana Valentine McCourt, who boarded United Airlines Flight 175 with their families in Boston. The enemy that day couldn't have cared less about the innocent passengers on the planes that slammed into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and the ground in Pennsylvania.

Self-regarding members of Congress, intent on keeping their jobs, have forgotten all about enemies who are so convinced of America's evil and their own righteousness that they can justify making everything in this country -- its national treasures and its people -- targets for destruction.

Listen closely to the huffing and puffing on Capitol Hill. It's all about criticizing each other on the war. They work themselves into a lather arguing about which party can best represent Americans in the hallowed halls of Washington. Watch as they strut and brag about how their party is, because of a surfeit of patriotic zeal, best able to hold terrorist-harboring countries accountable.

Each party treats the other like a malignancy on the body politic when the real cancer is the terrorists whose malignant objective is to kill and maim, to show us how vulnerable we are, to instill fear and to bring this country to its knees.

So, while members of Congress slip, slide, peep and hide in their quest for cheap political advantage, somewhere, somehow, a group not unlike those who got to us five years ago is plotting against crowded suburban shopping malls, downtown cultural centers, subway stations, football stadiums and sources of drinking water.

Their targets of opportunity are endless. So are their potential victims. That is what makes the Osama bin Ladens of this world true global menaces whom Congress and the White House ought to be joining forces to combat.

Five years after Sept. 11, the focus of Republicans and Democrats has shifted from the enemy to each other. But the forces that killed nearly 3,000 people in America still consider their enemy to be those of us who call America home. And the enemy targets this nation in the true spirit of equal opportunity -- without regard to race, creed, age, national origin, gender, sexual orientation or religion.

Congress and the White House ought to be focusing on defeating that enemy -- not each other. The puerile political nonsense on display on both sides of the Capitol dome must end.

Al-Qaeda, as has been written in this space, bleeds, too. The terrorist ilk that attacked on Sept. 11 must be broken -- not chased, harassed or condemned from a U.N. podium, but broken. That means: Take them down here, there or anywhere they're found.

Bring them before the bar of justice if possible, but by all means, and for as long as it takes, hunt them down. To do any less is to invite more strikes, more body bags, more shattered American lives.

I was looking forward to the day when I could tell my four grandsons and my granddaughter about wars that never came to our shores.

Now they have something to tell me, and not out of their young imaginations. As I noted in a column shortly after Sept. 11, the mother of one of my grandsons' classmates worked at the World Trade Center. Another playmate's father was among the second wave of firefighters to enter the towers.

My grandchildren understand war in a way that I never did at their ages.

Members of Congress, absorbed during a time of war in saving their own political skins, should be ashamed of themselves.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush's Cybersecurity Chief Quits (AP-Y)

By Ted Bridis

AP, September 23, 2006

The Bush administration's cybersecurity chief, who worked under an unusual agreement with a private university that does extensive business with the office he manages, is leaving his job.

Donald "Andy" Purdy Jr. will step down as acting director of the National Cyber Security Division, part of the Department of Homeland Security. A government spokesman, Jarrod Agen, declined to comment on Purdy's plans, but colleagues circulated an invitation to his farewell party next week.

Purdy worked at Homeland Security under a two-year contract with Carnegie Mellon University that expires Oct. 3. Under the contract, the government paid Purdy $245,481 in salary and benefits each year, not including travel reimbursements; Carnegie Mellon paid him an additional $43,320 a year.

His contract drew congressional scrutiny after The Associated Press reported in June that Purdy's cybersecurity division has paid Carnegie Mellon $19 million in contracts this year, almost one-fifth the unit's total budget.

Purdy, who controlled a budget of about $107 million and as many as 44 full-time federal employees, said at the time he was not involved in discussions over his own office's business deals with the school.

Agen said Purdy's job was being converted to a full-time federal position — which would pay an annual salary of about $130,000 — but Agen could not say whether Purdy was a candidate for that job. He said the government was in the final stages of hiring Purdy's replacement.

Earlier this week, the government announced it has selected trade industry executive Greg Garcia as the department's new assistant secretary for cybersecurity and telecommunications. He will oversee the division and the hiring of Purdy's successor. Garcia did not respond to telephone messages from the AP.

Hoekstra Warns Of European Terrorists (WT)

By Hsin-hsien Sheena Wong

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence is warning that "self-radicalized" terrorists from Europe, with no criminal records and no formal links to al Qaeda, are quietly infiltrating the United States to proselytize, raise money and possibly plan attacks.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Minnesota Republican, said that the United States has to quickly adapt to the ever-changing threat if it is going to win the global war against Islamic extremism.

Terrorists coming to the United States from Western Europe "are difficult to identify because they are self-radicalized," Mr. Hoekstra told the American Enterprise Institute (AEI) at a breakfast meeting with reporters Wednesday.

"They may have no formal association with al Qaeda, no criminal record. There's nothing in their past to draw the attention of law-enforcement officials to the individuals," he said.

He released a committee report titled, "Al Qaeda: The Many Faces of an Islamist Extremist Threat," which described how the nature of the threat has changed against the United States since the September 11 terrorist attacks.

The war is now one against entities inspired by al Qaeda, including homegrown terrorist cells composed of second- and third-generation radicalized Muslims in the United States, the report says.

"Radical Islam has changed the way that it operates," Mr. Hoekstra said. "Al Qaeda has moved into a decentralized entrepreneurial organization."

He said that by setting out a clear vision, objectives and providing resources, al Qaeda has empowered its appendages "to carry out actions independent of centralized control and then get out of the way."

"They develop a very simple message [that] is appealing to the young generation of Muslims," Mr. Hoekstra said. "They keep their message simple and they keep it consistent."

The intelligence committee chairman insisted that the United States has to overhaul its approach on the war against Islamic terrorists and learn to be as nimble and adaptable as its enemies.

AEI foreign policy analyst Michael Ledeen argued that al Qaeda is not as all-powerful as Mr. Hoekstra suggested.

"They are not 10-feet tall, and they are not that terrific," Mr. Ledeen said.

Race Is On For Security Gear (LAT)

By James Gilden, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

For a glimpse of airport security in the years to come, head to northern San Diego County.

A sea of office parks houses a handful of high-tech companies that are developing technology to ease business travelers' journeys through airport security checkpoints and on to their destinations.

Drug sniffers, bomb detectors, passenger screeners, shoe scanners, fingerprint matchers and other equipment are all under study or in initial development.

In the end, it will be the Department of Homeland Security and its Transportation Security Administration that will determine which devices will be acquired or rejected.

The TSA earmarked $72 million for emerging checkpoint technologies in 2006, up from $28 million in 2005. And Homeland Security already was evaluating 13 devices for detecting liquid explosives before the Aug. 10 London terrorist threat.

Many of those ideas come from Southern California. On a recent Friday afternoon, I drove to northern San Diego County and toured three companies that are developing this technology.

The area gets a lot of tech start-ups because it is relatively inexpensive to do business in its many industrial parks.

"There is a lot of room to grow and rents are still very reasonable up there," said Suzanne Finch, spokeswoman for the Center for Commercialization of Advanced Technology, Southern California. The center is an academic, industry and government partnership funded by the Pentagon and administered by San Diego State University and Cal State San Bernardino.

The center provides grants that help fast-track new technologies from small entrepreneurs, academic researchers and government lab scientists that have military, law enforcement and security uses, including those for airports.

It provided funding to the three companies visited.

My first stop was at Daylight Solutions, a molecular detection company tucked away in Poway. It has developed a battery-operated, hand-held laser device that, by measuring the reaction of molecules to laser light, can detect "molecules of interest" to security personnel, said Paul Larson, Daylight Solutions' president. Essentially, he is saying the device can detect molecules contained in explosives, poisonous gases and illegal drugs.

The device could be waved over and around a traveler like a wand and can even detect "molecules of interest" hidden in water bottles, Larson said, adding that eventually you might be able to point it at a box from a distance to determine whether the contents were dangerous.

If all goes according to plan, the wands could be deployed at airports by 2008, Larson said.

Tim Day, Daylight Solutions' chief executive, said that demand could be as many as 10,000 units per year, which would help keep the final cost down to about $1,000 per unit.

DOJ_NMG_0068025

Down the road about five miles is the lab for GE Infrastructure Security (formerly Quantum Magnetics), a division of General Electric Co. It is here that a kiosk developed for the TSA's oft-delayed Registered Traveler program was built.

Registered Traveler is a privately run program sponsored by the TSA that allows participants to use an expedited security lane if they pay a fee, submit their fingerprints and a scan of their iris and undergo a background check in advance.

It is currently operational only at Orlando (Fla.) International Airport, where the kiosk is being tested.

As I entered the lab, two men were assembling another one of the kiosks. It looks something like a treadmill, only without anything moving under your feet.

The kiosk is an assemblage of various technologies, some from the GE lab and others from off-the-shelf sources.

The components developed here include a shoe scanner that uses magnetic resonance to detect explosives or metallic weapons hidden in shoes while the traveler is wearing them, and the Itemiser FX, a device that can detect explosive residue on the fingertips of someone who has handled them.

Like the one in Orlando, this kiosk, which costs less than $200,000, not only checks passengers for potential threats but also verifies their identity by electronically scanning fingerprints and irises. Although the whole process takes less than a minute, it is not yet considered a viable solution to quickly screening large numbers of passengers.

Meanwhile, the shoe scanner component of the kiosk has been integrated into a separate walk-through device.

A passenger would step up to a clear plastic gate, have their shoes checked for trouble and, if all is well, the gate will open automatically about 10 seconds later allowing the traveler to pass.

The free-standing shoe scanner is a fully operational demonstration model. If ordered, it could be brought to commercial reality quickly, said Geoffrey Barrall, technology leader for GE Infrastructure Security.

My final stop was in Carlsbad at Seacoast Science Inc., where they have developed a hand-held "volatile organic chemical detector."

It can detect a range of chemicals, including mustard gas, sarin and acetone, one of the components in the bombs used in last summer's London subway bombings.

"Our biggest competition is a dog's nose," said Todd Milsna, Seacoast Science's president. "That's what we're trying to replicate."

The problems with many technologies that have been evaluated thus far have been with their performances outside the lab, said Christopher Kelly, spokesman for Homeland Security's science and technology division.

"The current technology is not operationally viable," he said. "There are shortfalls in processing speed, reliability and false alarms that need to be evaluated."

After the London terror scare Aug. 10, the department sought proposals "from nontraditional vendors to provide us with information on technology that may be out there to help with this, and received 60 submittals," Kelly said.

It may take months — and in some cases years — to properly evaluate and perhaps implement new security systems. In the meantime, we will be checking our bags and removing our shoes at security.

Schwarzenegger Vetoes Fee On Cargo Containers (LAT)

By Dan Weikel

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Siding with business and the shipping industry, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed a bill Friday that would have provided $500 million a year to improve security, expand rail networks and reduce air pollution at the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach.

The legislation by state Sen. Alan Lowenthal (D-Long Beach) called for a fee on shipping containers that pass through the ports. Had the bill been approved, owners of cargo, such as retailers and manufacturers, would have been assessed $60 for a typical 40-foot container.

Environmentalists, state regulators and local government officials viewed the measure as an effective way to fund much-needed security, transportation and air-quality improvements for the fifth-largest harbor complex in the world. Revenue from the export and import of containerized cargo would have been divided equally among the three areas.

Shipping companies and businesses that rely on marine transportation opposed the bill, contending that it was unconstitutional, difficult to implement and a tax that would discourage companies from sending their cargo through the state's ports. The California Chamber of Commerce included the legislation on its list of "job killer" bills.

Schwarzenegger said he vetoed the container fee because it could have hurt U.S. exports by raising shipping costs and did not provide for public-private partnerships that could boost funding for port and transportation projects.

"It is very important," the governor said, "that any measure to increase fees that impact exporters not have the unintended consequence of negatively impacting the sale and delivery of goods grown and manufactured in California."

Schwarzenegger said he was committed to improving the state's ports and the transportation system through an infrastructure bond issue his office had developed for the November election.

The ballot measure calls for $100 million for port security; $1 billion for improving air quality in California, which could benefit local harbors; $1 billion to solve port environmental problems; and $2.1 billion for trade infrastructure such as harbors, roads and railways.

Shipping industry groups and trade associations representing some of the nation's largest retailers praised the governor's veto Friday. More than 50 business organizations, shipping companies, marine terminal operators and retailers opposed the container fee.

Opponents said companies already paid billions of dollars in customs duties a year on goods imported through the maritime transportation system.

"Mandating additional cargo fees for the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach could have resulted in cargo being directed to other West Coast ports or even outside the U.S. altogether, damaging local communities surrounding the ports that depend on the jobs and tax revenue that the ports generate," said Sandy Kennedy, president of the Retail Industry Leaders Assn.

Lowenthal and container-fee supporters said the measure was necessary to help raise the billions of dollars needed to protect the ports, reduce air pollution in the harbor and relieve growing railway congestion throughout Southern California.

"The veto does nothing to help us," said Long Beach Mayor Bob Foster. "We still have all the problems we had before: three times the state rate of asthma, more heart disease and more respiratory disease. My constituents are paying with their health. Our kids are getting asthma so someone in Nebraska can get a cheaper TV."

Supporters of the cargo fee had said the charge was so small that it would add only pennies to the price of goods shipped by container through Los Angeles and Long Beach. Officials for the Los Angeles County Economic Development Corp. had said the diversion of cargo to other ports would be insignificant.

Lowenthal said other funding sources, such as container fees, would be required because Schwarzenegger's bond measure would not provide enough money. He said it could also fail at the polls.

State studies indicate that California's major ports — Los Angeles, Long Beach and Oakland — will need at least $20 billion in improvements in the decades ahead.

"The bond money is just a down payment," said Lowenthal, who vowed to reintroduce the container fee next year. "This is not the end of the fight…. The governor is protecting foreign factory owners at the expense of California residents."

However, Barry Sedlik, undersecretary of the state Business, Transportation and Housing Agency, said the governor was addressing long-term funding needs for goods-movement projects, including an action plan that would go before the California Transportation Commission by the end of the year.

"We are trying to come up with an overall funding plan for goods movement statewide," Sedlik said.

"We need a comprehensive solution, not a piecemeal approach that involves only two ports. We don't want to create any competitive disadvantages."

Capitol Police Were Warned Of Holes In Security (WP)

By Sari Horwitz, Mary Beth Sheridan And Carol D. Leonnig

Capitol Police officers warned their superiors this summer that the U.S. Capitol needed tighter security because of construction work, but a door was left unguarded this week, allowing the worst breach in eight years, officials said yesterday.

A drug-addled man easily drove a Chevrolet TrailBlazer through a partially blocked construction entrance to the Capitol grounds, according to officials and court testimony. The man then outran two dozen police officers into the building and went from floor to floor until a civilian employee lifted him up and literally handed him to police. The officers found a loaded pistol in the intruder's waistband.

New revelations emerged as authorities continued to investigate Monday's incident. As days go by, the officials have grudgingly admitted further blunders in one of the biggest embarrassments for the law enforcement agency in years.

No one was injured in the early morning drama, which ended in the man's arrest. But legislators are outraged that it could occur, given the $2 billion they have spent on police and equipment at the Capitol since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We have provided the [Capitol] police everything they've ever asked us for . . . from equipment to personnel. At times around here, this place looks like an armed camp," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a member of the House Appropriations Committee. "For somebody to be able to breach this kind of security is ridiculous."

The security mistakes were as basic as failing to block a construction entrance at First Street and Maryland Avenue NE, officials said. Capitol Police officers who were at that site incorrectly parked their sport-utility vehicle so it was perpendicular to the street, not blocking traffic from getting through the opening, according to police officials and testimony at a hearing for the intruder yesterday in U.S. District Court.

That allowed Carlos Greene, 20, of Silver Spring, who has a record of gun offenses, to drive through the entrance, swiping the passenger's side of the officers' SUV along the way, the officials said.

Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said in an interview that he had learned only yesterday afternoon that a group of officers recently expressed concern about security at the construction site for the Capitol Visitor Center, on the east side of the building -- and then only after a query from a Washington Post reporter.

He said that several lieutenants had put together an e-mail memo on Aug. 4 with "very solid, substantive identifications of security concerns within the Capitol building," particularly in the area where there is construction.

As construction has progressed in recent weeks, authorities have dismantled wooden fences that had blocked the Capitol steps, leaving the area more open, according to law enforcement sources.

McGaffin said the lieutenants sent their concerns to the commander of the Capitol Police Security Services Bureau, which is in charge of physical security. On Aug. 9, that bureau inspected the identified areas, the chief said.

"Corrective action" was taken in every area, "with one or two exceptions," McGaffin said. He said a report detailing the problems and solutions was provided to Assistant Chief Larry Thompson on Aug. 14 but did not go any higher until yesterday. The report also indicates that additional foot patrols would be added to help guard the area -- but it was unclear whether they materialized, McGaffin said.

No one was guarding a door at the top of the Capitol steps that the gunman ran through shortly before 8 a.m. Monday -- an entrance that was being used mostly by construction personnel. McGaffin said an officer had been at that post early in the morning but had left to assist on the Capitol periphery, apparently because of a construction delivery.

Other law enforcement officials, however, said the post had not been staffed for days, or perhaps weeks.

"Someone made a judgment call that that was a post not needed," said one source, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss results of an ongoing internal investigation.

McGaffin said he wasn't sure whether the post was continuously staffed and added that he assigned his inspector general to get to the bottom of that and other problems exposed by Monday's incident.

"This is part of the exercise we're going through with this internal investigation, to just find out: Was that decision made? Was the decision made to move a post, or move an officer, and if so, what was the basis of the decision?" he said yesterday evening, adding that he did not yet have the answers.

It was the worst security breach since July 24, 1998, when a former mental patient stormed past a magnetometer and killed Capitol Police officers Jacob J. Chestnut and John M. Gibson. The patient, Russell Eugene Weston Jr., was arrested after he was shot during gunfire with police.

The Capitol Police has about as many officers as does the city of Cleveland -- roughly 1,600. Including civilians, the department has about 2,300 personnel, an increase of about 50 percent in five years.

Its annual budget has roughly tripled during that period, reaching $257 million in 2006. In addition, hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on facilities and equipment to increase security at the Capitol, from underground bunkers to a sophisticated hazmat unit.

As the force has grown rapidly, it has dealt with an increasing range of threats that go far beyond the 200-square-block area in and around the Capitol. The Sept. 11, 2001, al-Qaeda strike and the subsequent anthrax attacks put Capitol Police on the front lines of the anti-terror fight.

Terrance W. Gainer, the former Capitol Police chief who resigned last spring, said the demands have increased so much that "we have not gotten ahead."

Still, Monday's incident showed not just potential problems with staffing levels, but also with oversight of personnel, he said. In June and July, as fences were dismantled on the East front of the Capitol to permit construction work, "there should have been a lot of dialogue about how many people you have out there and who is responsible for those folks," Gainer said.

Some officers have complained of drift in the department since Gainer left.

"We have an acting chief, an acting assistant chief. No one is willing to make a decision," said one officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

McGaffin is scheduled to retire this fall. He has blamed the security breach on human error.

Private security experts said Capitol Police should have been well prepared for an intruder charging an entrance -- a common tactic that terrorists and other would-be assailants have used for decades. In 1974, 1981 and 1984, drivers rammed gates on the White House grounds in unsuccessful efforts to reach the president's residence.

Testimony yesterday by Capitol Police Detective Nettie Watts gave the most complete account yet of how many officers and checkpoints Greene was able to evade. After the hearing, Greene was ordered to remain jailed on a weapons charge stemming from the intrusion.

He was first spotted by a Capitol Police officer about 7:40 a.m. at a security barricade at First and C streets SE, Watts told the court. Greene nearly slammed into the barricade but hit the brakes just short of doing so, nearly hitting a pedestrian, Watts testified.

Greene then backed up and sped east on C Street -- nearly striking the same pedestrian, she said. The officer at that checkpoint called in a "Priority 1" alert on Capitol Police radio warning about the fast-moving driver of a silver SUV.

Less than two minutes later, Greene got past the officer who was supposed to be guarding the entrance to the construction site, at First Street and Maryland Avenue NE. She was parked in such way that he easily could evade her and zoom onto the grounds. A pop-up barrier was not in use because of the flow of construction vehicles.

On Monday, McGaffin said Greene hit the officer's vehicle, and charging documents say he "rammed" into it, suggesting that she was blocking the entrance. But under questioning from Magistrate Judge John M. Facciola, Watts said Greene merely swiped the passenger side as he flew past.

After hitting a concrete wall around a skylight on the grounds, Greene bailed out of the SUV and ran up the Capitol steps and through the open door. Soon, he was within steps of Senate offices.

Greene continued running until he reached a basement office used to supply citizens with flags that have flown over the Capitol. He grabbed a female employee by the arm, Watts said, quoting him as saying, "I need a place to hide."

A man from the same office saw his colleague in distress and scuffled with Greene, according to Watts's testimony. But then Greene broke free and entered the flag office.

That's when a third employee emerged from a room inside that office. Greene dashed toward the man, and the ensuing fight knocked plaques and a fire extinguisher off the walls.

According to Watts, a flag room employee said Capitol Police arrived within "minutes." But Capitol Police have said they were there in seconds. As officers opened the door, the employee inside physically lifted Greene and handed him to the police.

"So he pushes him, effectively, into the officers' hands?" Facciola asked.

"Yes," Watts said.

Loaded Gun In Carry-On Brings Long Lines At BWI (WP)

By Debbi Wilgoren And Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Two concourses were evacuated for an hour yesterday morning at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport after security screeners found a loaded gun inside a carry-on bag and could not detain its owner.

The .25-caliber semiautomatic pistol was discovered at 6:40 a.m. at the security checkpoint serving concourses A and B, a spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration said. It was in one of two bags carried by a male passenger; the other bag had already been screened and cleared, spokesman Christopher White said.

The passenger abandoned the bag containing the gun and disappeared into the concourses, which exclusively serve Southwest Airlines, White said. Security officials evacuated the concourses at 7:11 a.m. and used police dogs to search the area.

The man was not found. The gun -- a loaded Raven Arms MP-25 pistol, according to Cpl. Jonathan Green, a Maryland Transportation Authority Police spokesman -- was turned over to police, along with other items that would be tested for fingerprints.

"It did not make it into the sterile area," said Kerry Harmon, a spokeswoman for the agency. "But the passenger had left the checkpoint, so out of an abundance of caution, we swept the terminal."

Authorities said the man likely left the airport. "He didn't fly anywhere," said Jonathan Dean, airport spokesman, as all outbound aircraft were emptied during the alert.

Security cameras captured video footage of the man. Officials did not release a description.

Both concourses reopened at 8:11 a.m. Several thousand passengers had to go through security checkpoints again. It was unclear how many missed their flights. A number of flights were held until passengers could get through the additional screening.

Lines yesterday morning stretched across the inside of the terminal building and along the sidewalk outside. The crowd included families traveling to be with relatives for Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, which began at sundown.

Gregory and Michelle Heelan, of LeDroit Park in Washington, were relaxed as they approached a screening table while going through security for their flight to Newport, R.I.

"We did the two-hour-early thing, like we were told," Gregory Heelan said. "We accept it all as part of the new way."

Punishing Refugees Twice (NYT)

America's excellent record of giving refuge to the persecuted is flagging — and one of the biggest barriers seems to have arisen inadvertently.

In their haste, Congressional authors of the Patriot Act and its sister Real ID provision tucked a clause into the immigration laws barring entry to anyone who has provided "material support" to a terrorist organization. Who could argue with barring people who have aided terrorists?

But the Bush administration has chosen to interpret "material support" to include people who act under duress — someone pressed at gunpoint to supply a glass of water, or forced to dig graves or pay ransom for a kidnapped child, or held hostage in her home (and thus provided shelter to terrorists). The result is to victimize these people twice.

The law's definition of a terrorist group — two or more people who take up arms against a state — also makes no allowance for motive. Members of the Vietnamese Montagnards and Cuban Alzados — groups created by the United States that remain staunch supporters — are now blocked from entry.

As a result of the material-support clause, more than 11,000 refugees are being kept out of the country for allegedly supporting terror. Religious conservatives have urged that this problem be fixed, but the Departments of Homeland Security and Justice have rebuffed efforts by the State Department to narrow the law. The administration did grant waivers to groups of Karen refugees who oppose the Myanmar government, and administration officials argue that waivers are the solution. They are not: they are too slow and cumbersome, and there are many groups that waivers legally cannot help — the duress cases, for example.

The law needs reform, and not just to make more groups eligible for waivers. Representative Joe Pitts, a conservative Republican, is sensibly proposing to shut out only members and supporters of groups that the secretary of state determines are terrorists. Mr. Pitts would also let in those coerced into helping terror groups.

The bill has bipartisan backing, but many lawmakers are frightened of being labeled soft on terrorism. To have a real chance of passage, it will need the administration's support.

Names On The Memorial (NYT)

Gov. George Pataki will have to bear the responsibility for the delays in redevelopment at ground zero over the last five years. But if he wants to improve the record of his stewardship before leaving office, one way would be to act now to help solve the emotional question of how to list the names at the planned memorial for the 2,979 victims of terrorism.

This listing of victims around the pools marking the site of the twin towers has turned into an intensely emotional impasse that threatens the entire memorial project. Michael Arad, the memorial's designer, planned to list the names randomly, with victims' stories told in detail at the museum and visitors center. Some victims' family members and former co-workers have demanded that they be grouped by job or family, or in some other way that would better define who they were and where they died.

We continue to believe that the best and fairest solution for all the victims is Mr. Arad's. But because this issue is delaying the fund-raising and building of the memorial — that centerpiece of the restoration at the site — it is time to figure out another way to move forward, and search for a compromise. Grouping the victims could easily leave people out or make one group of victims appear more important than others. A better idea might be for the names alone to be listed alphabetically — the same way that they have been read aloud so movingly at the site each Sept. 11 morning since 2001.

The governor should work with Mayor Michael Bloomberg to establish a small but representative committee, including Mr. Arad and a representative of the families and co-workers. Their task should be to quickly come up with a suitable compromise that eases family concerns and still maintains the highest design standards for this memorial.

FEMA Underestimated Katrina Repair Costs (AP-Y)

By Michelle Roberts

AP, September 23, 2006

Many initial estimates by the Federal Emergency Management Agency of the cost of repairing thousands of water-logged buildings, cracked pipes and crumbling streets in hurricane-staggered Louisiana were way too low — and some reconstruction projects are being held up because of it.

Some local governments say they cannot legally or financially hire contractors and get on with the work, because they fear they will be saddled with repair costs that won't be reimbursed by Washington.

The FEMA estimates were made as part of a federal program under which local governments make repairs at their own expense, then ask for reimbursement from the federal government.

The low-ball estimates were done by sometimes-inexperienced estimators hurriedly hired and trained by FEMA in the aftermath of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, which struck last summer and fall. Often, the estimates were based on the much-cheaper, pre-storm costs of labor and equipment.

"We want our fair share," said Cary Grant, New Orleans' assistant chief administrative officer for budget. "We're grossly underfunded."

Statewide, local and state officials have identified 17,000 projects that could be eligible for federal reimbursement. State officials said many of the initial estimates on those projects are way off.

In many cases, the disparities are staggering. At one recreation center in New Orleans, for example, FEMA estimated repairs would cost $312,000; the city says it actually will cost more like $1.4 million.

The few bids St. Bernard Parish have received for repair work have come back two or three times higher than FEMA's estimates, said Chris Merkl, the parish's public works director.

FEMA officials acknowledge some estimates may be too low, but do not believe the problem is widespread, said FEMA spokesman James McIntyre. Cities, parishes, sewer boards and other government entities can appeal to FEMA for higher reimbursement.

"If we need to look at 17,000 appeals, we'll look at 17,000 appeals," he said, though he maintained that will not be necessary. FEMA officials plan to meet with state and local leaders to discuss the issue in coming days, McIntyre said.

Grant and other New Orleans officials said that in smaller disasters or with estimates closer to reality, the city could afford to hire workers and sort out the differences with FEMA later. But the sheer number of projects and the steep differences make that impossible for all but a few high-priority projects.

"The citizens of New Orleans don't understand the process. They're like, `The lights should be fixed at the park. Why is the city not fixing this and that?'" said New Orleans interim recreation director Larry Barabino Jr. "They want everything yesterday. They don't want to hear no excuses."

Grant said most of the city's 860 pending projects should be re-examined by FEMA, even though such a review could cost considerable time and money. In a few cases, he said, FEMA may be able to look at the paperwork and re-estimate based on updated labor and material costs without doing site inspections. But Grant said many new inspections will probably have to be done.

"That's what my great fear is: the actual man-hours it would take to crawl on your knees and go floor by floor," Grants said.

Most of the low-ball estimates by FEMA workers and contractors resulted from dramatic increases in labor and material costs in a region where the demand for construction workers to do such things as gut buildings, replace roofs and lay tile outstrips supply, according to local officials.

But other low estimates resulted when inexperienced FEMA contractors included, for example, only the cost of fixing a hole in a roof and not the damage done when a temporary tarp was installed to cover the hole, said Grant and other New Orleans officials.

FEMA engineers working in the region are trying to take rising costs for supplies and labor into account, McIntyre said.

"I'm not trying to downplay it," McIntyre said of the complaints. But "we are bound by law to ensure that we are using taxpayers' dollars properly."

Lower 9th Plan: Start 'From Scratch' (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Residents of the New Orleans neighborhood will hear results of a consultant's study today. But it's not the only proposal in town.

NEW ORLEANS — A consulting firm hired by the New Orleans City Council to devise a plan for the city's most storm-damaged neighborhoods will recommend rebuilding the Lower 9th Ward — considered by many "ground zero" of the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina — "from scratch."

Miami-based urban planner and housing consultant Paul Lambert, along with other urban planning groups, met with Lower 9th Ward residents and incorporated their ideas into a proposal to change the area's street pattern to create a new "town center." That idea is part of a report he is to present to residents today.

In some 300 community meetings and workshops over the last five months, residents of most New Orleans neighborhoods have told a variety of urban design and planning sub-consulting firms that they want their old neighborhoods rebuilt as they were. "But that's different in the Lower 9th Ward … because of the destruction," said Lambert, whose firm is co-managing the neighborhood planning process. "It was so decimated that you're really rebuilding the entire neighborhood from scratch."

Lower 9th Ward residents were adamant that their neighborhood not be razed and left fallow or taken over by developers.

"The idea is that [the area] will come back in its entirety," Lambert said.

The city is expected to receive the official report by October.

Across 49 neighborhoods, wish lists include repair of streets and sidewalks; school reconstruction; revitalization of parks, community centers and libraries; and the reopening of shops. "Every neighborhood just wants the grocery store back, just wants the pharmacy back, just wants a sit-down restaurant," Lambert said. "Retail consistently shows up in terms of what people want."

The report is part of the city's broader neighborhood rebuilding process.

Meanwhile, another initiative — the Unified New Orleans Neighborhood Plan, which encompasses all neighborhoods, not just those damaged by Katrina — is financed in large part by the Rockefeller Foundation and is managed by a nonprofit created for the purpose. And the Unified plan has strong support from the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which is charged with directing billions of dollars in federal Katrina aid.

The plan for the most damaged neighborhoods has no funding source. It may be folded into the Unified plan.

But some people have grown impatient. Lambert has publicly criticized the pace of the Unified process, saying the plan has delayed release of federal recovery aid to the city.

The head of Concordia, the New Orleans firm coordinating the Unified planning process, said orientation sessions had been held and the first public meeting would be Oct. 14, with final recommendations — incorporating many ideas from Lambert's plan — expected by the end of the year.

"We are all anxious to get to the finish," Concordia President Steven B. Bingler said. "We just know that the finish is not partial plans. It's a unified plan for the whole city." And, he added, that's what the Louisiana Recovery Authority requires.

New Orleans Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis, whose constituency includes the Lower 9th Ward, called for "a sense of urgency" to move beyond planning to implementation.

"We cannot be stuck in a malaise of planning," she said.

Residents are also frustrated, and confused.

"There are too many hands in the pot," said Cory Turner, a fair-housing and criminal-justice activist. "There are too many planning groups. The Unified plan was meant to unify, but it's not doing that. Six months from now, we're going to be in the very same spot, arguing about what plan to use — that's my fear."

Bywater neighborhood resident Elizabeth Cook said she doubted some proposals would ever be implemented because they were unrealistic and too grandiose.

"This is pie in the sky," she said. "They're stringing people along. A lot of it is fluff … to give the illusion of reconstruction."

Other residents, however, said they welcomed such recommendations as more bike lanes, parks and beaches, because they were fed up with the devastation and needed to be able to dream of better days ahead.

For the Lambert-managed plan, neighborhoods such as suburban New Orleans East have asked for a reduction in the density of low- to-moderate income rental housing, and for the lakefront beach and entertainment district to be restored.

In upscale Lakeview, residents' priority is maintaining property values, Lambert said, and homeowners are keen to have first dibs on a neighboring property where the owner has decided to sell.

"This gives them the opportunity to expand their home, or rebuild for another family member," Lambert said. "This is a way of keeping the wealth in the community" and ensuring properties comply with the area's codes and zoning regulations.

Lambert acknowledged that much work remained to finalize a vision for certain neighborhoods but said the recommendations are "an important step into the future of this city."

Evacuees Must Say Goodbye To Katrina Aid (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

The crisis lines have shut down. The furniture donations, free apartments and gift cards have dwindled. The Red Cross has moved on.

And, now, so will Robin Gilmore.

For nearly 12 months, the Fairfax County social worker has helped 176 evacuees from Hurricane Katrina who came to the county after last year's storm.

But late last month, she told them that the program for evacuees, funded by the county and local charities, would close at the end of September.

"After September 30, my job ends," she told 30 evacuees gathered for a potluck dinner to commemorate the first anniversary of the epic hurricane that upended their lives.

Although many evacuees who landed in the Washington area have moved on, almost 10,000 households are still registered with the Federal Emergency Management Agency in the District, Virginia and Maryland.

But the special services for them, funded by donors and local governments, are mostly gone.

"They're not getting any special treatment anymore," said Katie Miller-Holland, manager of Lutheran Social Services' Katrina Family Advocate Program. The program will operate until next October but has room for only 400 households. "For many of these folks, it's 'get in line with everyone else.' "

Catholic Community Services ended its program in June. The local Salvation Army's $311,000 in Katrina aid is gone and so is the Jewish Federation's $1 million fund. The Archdiocese of Arlington's Partners in New Hope program closed Aug. 29. The Prince George's Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund is down to its last $5,000. And $345,000 raised by the Community Foundation for the National Capital Region and disbursed to 10 nonprofit groups has mostly been spent.

At United Community Ministries last month, Gilmore coated her news with reassurance. She is moving to a new job at the agency, but a part-time intern will be available for the evacuees.

"We will continue as long as we can and then you can come through the doors as a UCM client," she told evacuees as they finished up plates of jambalaya and fried chicken as a boom box spilled tinny Cajun music. "We are here."

But for the evacuees in southern Fairfax, it is Gilmore who has been their anchor during a stormy year.

Dozens started showing up at United Community Ministries' offices in mid-September last year, asking for help.

When it became clear that more than 1,000 Katrina evacuees would arrive in Fairfax, county agencies, businesses and nonprofit groups formed Fairfax Families Care and raised nearly $90,000. The county kicked in $276,000 to hire social workers to work with the families and hired UCM and two other Fairfax County nonprofit groups, Northern Virginia Family Service and Reston Interfaith. Those groups in turn received thousands in additional charitable donations for the evacuees.

Gilmore was named case manager for UCM's Katrina effort and found herself pitched into the disaster that she had watched on TV.

Since then, she has spent hundreds of hours pestering agencies for housing vouchers, landlords for apartments and government offices for missing documents. She has called dentists to replace false teeth that had been abandoned on bedside tables when the floodwaters approached. At night, she coached clients through phone calls with FEMA.

"I still get choked up when I remember those early months," said Gilmore. Her throaty voice grew huskier. "That vicarious trauma. You hear it, you hear it, and you experience it as well."

At home, the divorced mother of four gathered crucial family documents -- copies of children's birth certificates, her social worker's license, bank statements -- in a file to grab if disaster strikes and her own family has to escape.

"I've seen how difficult it is to start over," she said, "when you have to prove who you say you are."

For many, starting over is a monumental challenge, but the help they have received was never meant to last indefinitely. The goal is for them to become self-sufficient.

Some have achieved it.

"I am one of the blessed ones," said Marie McCoy, 54. She, her husband and her teenage daughter have settled into an apartment in the Fair Oaks area after fleeing their New Orleans home. McCoy and her husband, Gerald, are working again.

Still, it has been an enormous struggle, Marie McCoy said.

"When I first came here, I could not believe the prices when I went to the grocery store," she said. "And the apartment [rents] up here? Somebody must be stealing .' " But for others, the climb back to normalcy is even steeper.

Those with few skills who could make it in a minimum-wage job in New Orleans are finding that such work barely dents the high cost of life in Fairfax County.

"Here, people have to get help that they never needed before," said Meredith McKeen, manager of group services and outreach for Northern Virginia Family Services. It has enough private donations to continue Katrina assistance until December. Then its program, too, shuts down.

Barbara and Gerald Warren, whose home in Metairie, La., was flooded, now live in a subsidized apartment in the Alexandria section of Fairfax County that Gilmore helped them secure. A church helps them cover their utility bills, and UCM has paid for medication and other essentials.

Without Gilmore, the couple couldn't have made it, Barbara Warren, 54, said. "She helped us a whole lot," she said. "She is so good."

After the dinner last weekend, Gilmore wrapped her arms around Maggie Viteri, 72. Viteri and husband Telmo, 77, are worried about the cost of their $2,000-a-month apartment. It had been underwritten by area charities, but now the couple must pay for it out of their dwindling resources.

Gilmore reassured Viteri that she could continue to call her. She promised to keep looking for help for the couple.

"I know how hard you've worked and how far you've come," she told them all.

New Orleans A Celebration At Superdome (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

The New Orleans Saints return to their home field at the Louisiana Superdome on Monday night for the first time since Hurricane Katrina. It's a potent symbol of the city's rebuilding effort since the Superdome, where thousands gathered after the storm and were stranded for days in increasingly miserable conditions, became a potent symbol of the bungled rescue effort.

A massive celebration rivaling all six of the Super Bowls that have been played at the stadium is planned. The night will kick off with pregame performances by the Goo Goo Dolls, Green Day and U2. The national anthem will be sung by Irma Thomas and Allen Toussaint, two icons of the New Orleans soul and rhythm-and-blues scene whose houses were swamped by Katrina when it struck in August 2005.

Impressively, the refurbished 72,000-seat Superdome is sold out for the season -- a first in Saints history. Asking prices for tickets for Monday's game against the Atlanta Falcons had soared to $3,450 as of midafternoon Friday on a ticket-resale Web site used by the Saints.

Even the doormat football team, with just seven winning seasons since 1967, has been playing along with the tragedy-to-triumph story line. For the first time, the Saints started their season by winning two away games -- though they are listed as about a three-point underdog to the Falcons, which also are undefeated.

For many local residents, though, the celebratory event will be tinged with pain. Blackie Campo, 88 years old, had missed just one home game in Saints history before his house and hugely popular marina in St. Bernard Parish were wrecked by the storm. On Monday night, he will be sitting on the 50-yard line as usual, but with three seats instead of eight because he couldn't locate some of his friends before the season-ticket deadline passed.

"They got scattered all over the country, and they didn't know where I was and I didn't know where they were," says Mr. Campo, now living in a Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer. "The only things we had were fishing and football."

And while the Superdome's comeback, broadcast on prime-time television, will send a message about the city's resilience, the everyday slog of post-Katrina life continues, with its jarring juxtapositions of recovery and ruin. For example, the Hyatt Regency New Orleans hotel -- within sight of the Superdome -- hasn't yet reopened. Enough storm and structural debris remains in the city to fill the Superdome roughly seven times, city officials estimated in late August.

More than 800 devastated homes remain on a list seeking free gutting from Operation Nehemiah, a volunteer effort run by Carrollton Avenue Church of Christ, which had $12,000 in the bank and no flood insurance when Katrina hit. Though it could take a year to finish the job, organizer Fred Franke says he has no thoughts of giving up. "We've got a strong group of people that want the city to come back," he says.

Restoring the Superdome cost about $130 million in federal and state funds, which were used to replace the 9.7-acre roof, artificial-turf field, 500,000 square feet of ceiling tile and nearly everything else trashed by the storm. Snazzier scoreboards and other improvements, some unfinished, will push the total cost to $185 million. The stadium wasn't expected to reopen until at least November, but Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco suspended some contract requirements, accelerating construction. Outside roof work was interrupted by only five days of bad weather.

"This was Ground Zero for New Orleans. It's what the nation saw ... and now we have an opportunity to change all that," says Doug Thornton, regional vice president of SMG, the Philadelphia company that manages the Superdome. He oversaw the project even though he was unable to move back into his flooded house until April.

As soon as the game ends, the Superdome will start getting ready for another homecoming. Next Saturday, Tulane University's football team will play there, too, ending its streak of 14 straight road games in 12 different stadiums.

WAR NEWS:

U.S.: More Iraq Troops Needed In Baghdad (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

The U.S. needs 3,000 more Iraqi forces to join the battle in Baghdad, but requests have not been met because Iraqi soldiers are reluctant to leave their home regions, the commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad said Friday.

Maj. Gen. James Thurman said that while the U.S. has 15,000 troops in Baghdad — which military leaders say is the priority battlefront in Iraq — only about 9,000 Iraqi soldiers are there. That is just a fraction of the 128,000 Iraqi Army troops that the U.S. says are now trained and equipped.

His comments came as the sectarian violence in Baghdad continued unabated. Gunmen opened fire on Sunni mosques and homes in the religiously mixed neighborhood of Hurriya, killing four people in an attack that drew the condemnation of Sunni leaders across the city.

In east Baghdad, meanwhile, police found the blindfolded and bound bodies of nine men from a Sunni tribe who had been dragged out of a wedding dinner the night before by men dressed in Iraqi army uniforms, police Maj. Mahir Hamad Mussa said. Four other bound and blindfolded bodies were found in other parts of the capital.

The U.S. military said an American soldier was killed when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb late Thursday.

Getting more Iraqi troops involved in the operation has been hampered by the fact that Iraqi soldiers generally join battalions in their geographic regions. And Thurman said that "due to the distance, (they) did not want to travel into Baghdad." He said the Iraqi minister of defense is working on the problem.

"I'm confident that they're going to meet that requirement here within the next few weeks, but it's going to take a little time," he said.

Thurman said he asked for the additional Iraqi forces — a total of six battalions — early on in the Baghdad campaign, which began in June. He added, "I don't think putting more coalition (troops) in here is the right answer."

As an example, Thurman said that he has one U.S. battalion working with Iraqi Army and police in Baghdad's predominantly Shiite al-Baya neighborhood and the mixed southern neighborhood of Dora.

But, he said, "I felt like we needed more Iraqi Army in there to work side-by-side with the police and the national police, because those have been bad areas. And we're clearing the enemy out of there and we don't want them to come back."

There are a total of 302,000 Iraqi security forces, which include the army, national and local police. About 12,000 national police and 22,000 local police are serving in Baghdad, Thurman said.

Asked if he is disappointed by the Iraqis' failure to send the additional troops, Thurman said no, because he has seen the security forces improve and he understands that there are competing security demands across the country.

He said U.S. trainers are working with the Iraqi forces to make them more mobile. He added, "I think the government is trying to come to grips with the security needs, and we have a determined enemy out there that's trying to disrupt this government."

U.S. military leaders have repeatedly stressed that Baghdad is the top priority in Iraq right now, as forces try to stabilize the capital city so the government can progress.

Attacks against the security forces have increased since the Baghdad operation began, from about 36 attacks a day to about 42 attacks a day, said Thurman. He said about six of those daily attacks result in injuries to U.S. troops or damage to equipment.

Overall, Thurman said attacks against Iraqi civilians have decreased, and that sectarian violence has dropped in the neighborhoods where the military has focused its efforts.

As he visits those areas, he said, "I find more people trying to get on with their lives. I see more shops opening and more people in the streets. ... As we clean up the streets, we find a city capable of starting to function properly."

In other developments in Iraq on Friday, 3,000 people demonstrated outside a mosque in Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, demanding the return of the former dictator to power, organizers said. Saddam is on trial in Baghdad on genocide charges.

Many Iraqi Troops Are No-Shows In Baghdad (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The U.S. asked for an extra 4,000 soldiers to shore up security. Only 1,000 reported, and the violence continues in and around the capital.

BAGHDAD — Only a quarter of the Iraqi army forces that had been designated more than a month ago to work on security improvements in the capital have arrived, a sign of continuing problems with the Iraqi government's ability to command and move its troops.

U.S. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, who is in charge of military forces in Baghdad, said Friday that he had requested 4,000 additional Iraqi troops to help secure Baghdad and had received only 1,000 of them.

"Some of these battalions, when they were formed, were formed regionally," Thurman said in a video news conference with reporters at the Pentagon. "And some of the soldiers, due to the distance, did not want to travel into Baghdad."

Thurman's comments came on a day of continued violence in the country, including the execution-style slayings of nine Sunni Arabs dragged from a wedding dinner east of Baghdad by armed men who reportedly were wearing Iraqi uniforms.

"Three civilian cars and one minibus came to our house with armed men wearing Iraqi army uniforms," the groom's father, Mohammed Dulaimi, 61, told police. "They raided the house and asked to take some of the guests for routine investigations."

Police later found the bodies of nine wedding guests on Baghdad's outskirts. Each had been shot several times.

In all, at least 27 bodies were discovered in Baghdad on Friday. At least 15 other people, including a U.S. soldier who was killed by a roadside bomb in the capital, were slain in Iraq.

While in the U.S., Talabani met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other foreign ministers to urge them to make good on billions of dollars in reconstruction aid pledges.

"We are hopeful that the international community fulfills its obligations by providing the required resources to deal with the key priorities," he said.

After the establishment of Iraq's permanent government in May, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki announced a security plan aimed at controlling the sectarian violence that has destabilized Baghdad.

In July, U.S. officials said that despite the new measures, violence had worsened in the capital.

In August, U.S. and Iraqi officials announced a new plan to secure the city, saying they would bring in 4,000 Iraqi soldiers and 4,000 additional Americans. The U.S. contingent was beefed up in a move that proved controversial for the Pentagon: Officials extended the deployment of the 172nd Stryker Brigade and moved it from Mosul to Baghdad. The extension drew complaints from relatives of members of the Alaska-based unit.

But Thurman made it clear Friday that bringing in the Iraqi soldiers had proved even more difficult. Soldiers with the 1st Brigade of the 9th Division of the Iraqi army had been moved from Taji within 72 hours, Thurman said. But deploying the remainder of the force has been more challenging, with soldiers refusing orders to relocate to Baghdad.

Iraqi army units have refused deployment orders before, sometimes complaining of the travel involved and sometimes expressing concern that they would be thrust into uncomfortable sectarian confrontations.

In August, 100 soldiers in southern Maysan province refused to go to Baghdad. U.S. officials explained at the time that the unit's Shiite leaders said the troops were needed in Maysan. They also objected to being sent to the capital, where they believed they would have to fight Shiite militias.

U.S. officials also said Kurdish units had refused to be deployed from northern Iraq to Ramadi, in violent Al Anbar province.

But the problems may go beyond mere regional or sectarian loyalty and could reflect readiness problems.

The Iraqi army is not considered highly mobile; it lacks the armored transport vehicles or planes that would allow officials to quickly deploy large numbers of troops around the country.

Thurman said he was confident the Defense Ministry would obtain the additional soldiers in the next few weeks. He suggested that the lack of Iraqi troops was complicating operations in two Baghdad neighborhoods, Baya and Dura. Thurman said he wanted to put more Iraqi soldiers in those areas to work with the American battalion there.

"I felt like we needed more Iraqi security forces in those areas, and that's what I have told my superior commanders that I felt like we needed," he said.

There are 15,000 U.S. troops and 9,000 Iraqi troops in Baghdad, as well as 12,000 members of the Iraqi national police and 22,000 local police, Thurman said.

Asked how the Iraqi military could take control of the nation's security needs if it was unable to move troops around the country, Thurman said some of the units were able to quickly deploy — including the 1st Brigade of the 9th Division — while others were still being developed and trained.

"I wouldn't say it's not going well," Thurman said. "What I would tell you is I think the government is trying to come to grips with the security needs, and we have a determined enemy out there that's trying to disrupt this government, a democratic form of government. And we're here assisting them to work through these tough security issues."

Thurman said attacks had increased in the last week, and that they were mostly against U.S. and Iraqi military and police forces.

The wedding attack occurred at a party being held by the Dulaimi tribe, a large and powerful Sunni clan that probably will seek reprisals, police said. All of the kidnapped guests were men, including three brothers, who farmed and raised cattle in the agricultural areas ringing the capital.

A police source, who said the father reported the kidnappings at a local station, said officers were unlikely to investigate, because they fear that Sunni insurgents operate in the area.

In west Baghdad, Shiite militiamen set fire to two buildings occupied by two prominent Sunni political parties and ordered all Sunnis out of the neighborhood.

Responding firetrucks were turned away by militiamen who fired assault rifles in the air. The Associated Press reported that four people were killed in the confrontation.

"Today we are living under exceptional circumstances. Today we live in violence of all kinds," Sheik Mahmoud Sumaidaie said in his Friday sermon at Umm Qura, a leading Sunni mosque in Baghdad.

"There are people who are destroying, people who are forcing others to leave their houses, there are [Shiite clerics] keeping silent, some decent people are keeping silent. The state is keeping silent."

In ousted President Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, north of Baghdad, a local association of Sunni clerics organized at least 1,000 protesters to carry posters of Hussein and demand he be restored to power. The protesters demanded the release of 20,000 detainees, an end to military raids on Sunni neighborhoods and denounced Pope Benedict XVI's recent statements about Islam.

A ruptured pipeline struck by insurgents Thursday continued to burn southwest of Samarra, also north of Baghdad. A spokesman for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said he was unaware of the breach.

Friday prayers and exhortations for peace during the coming Ramadan period of fasting gave way to stormy political speeches at some mosques. While Sunni clerics called on the government to protect them from Shiite militias and U.S. assaults, Shiite holy men called for harsher measures against insurgents.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan "said that Iraq is on the brink of a civil war," Qubanchi said.

"But we have another reading for the situation. We believe that Iraqis are heading toward the elimination of terrorism rather than civil war."

The cleric said that the Iraqi government was being too soft on the insurgents and that the violence persisted because of "the absence of punishment." He demanded that Hussein receive the death penalty.

"Execution! Execution!" hundreds of worshipers chanted.

The Boston Globe, September 23, 2006

THE SAME White House that trashed generals and bean counters for saying it would take hundreds of thousands of more troops and billions more dollars to secure Iraq is now blaming the puppet government for not securing the country.

The blame is arriving through one of those ``senior-administration-official-speaking-on-background" whisper campaigns. One such official told The New York Times that President Bush is peeved at Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki of Iraq. ``The thing you hear the most is that he never makes any decisions," the official said. ``And that drives Bush crazy. He doesn't take well to anyone who talks about getting something accomplished and then refuses to take the first step."

In the Los Angeles Times, a Bush official said that the White House is getting ``frustrated. . . . There is a little bit of impatience." Another official said Maliki's get-tough-on-violence ``rhetoric has to be matched by concrete action . . . acting on the ground on its own behalf."

While his minions cut the knees out from under Maliki, Bush himself acts like the general manager of a sports team who declares he has full confidence in the coach during a losing season. Bush said on CNN, ``I'm impressed by President Maliki. I've talked to him. I've seen the decision-making process that he's put in place." White House press secretary Tony Snow continues to declare that reports of Bush losing faith in Maliki are ``absolutely false."

This shell game of responsibility was all but inevitable in a war launched both under false pretenses and with undermanned and underequipped forces. It was inevitable in an occupation where the White House brags about a duly elected government while it still has 138,000 troops there.

This week, General John Abizaid, the US Central Command chief, ended any illusions of major troop withdraw anytime soon. He said troop levels must be ``sustained through the spring" because ``the secular tensions, if left unchecked, could be fatal to Iraq." In a cryptic response to a reporter's question as to whether the United States is winning the war and occupation, Abizaid said, ``Given unlimited time and unlimited support, we're winning the war."

Abizaid said the occupation is so murky that ``Baghdad is not going to clarify itself in my mind militarily for a couple months." To punctuate that point, the United Nations issued a report this week that at least 6,600 people were killed and 4,300 people were wounded in Iraq in July and August, far more than previously estimated.

But while Abizaid is talking about needing unlimited time and unlimited resources, a bipartisan study group headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former US representative Lee Hamilton declared that ``the next three months are critical" for the government of Iraq ``to show its own citizens soon and the citizens of the United States that it is deserving of continued support."

So the US military deserves unlimited time but Maliki deserves just three months?

That sure begs the question of whose country it is. The mixed messages smell of how the United States alternately propped up, manipulated, ignored, and ultimately abandoned South Vietnam's president, Nguyen Van Thieu. Thieu was elected in 1967 and reelected in 1971 under questionable, US-backed circumstances. He was widely acknowledged to be corrupt, but US meddling did not help.

By many accounts, he became a pawn between the lame-duck Johnson administration and the Nixon presidential campaign on whether to halt the bombing of North Vietnam. He was essentially ignored by Nixon over the 1973 ``peace accords" that left North Vietnamese soldiers in position to overrun South Vietnam. That eventually happened and Thieu fled the country.

Thieu eventually died in obscurity in Boston in 2001. Upon his death, Vietnam historian Stanley Karnow told National Public Radio, ``The short answer is that he was not terribly effective, but it's doubtful anybody would have been effective. Thieu came into office amid a lot of political turmoil in Saigon. . . . The situation began to get so hopeless in a way that finally President Johnson put in American combat troops in the summer of 1965 as about the only way to bolster up the government in Saigon."

Karnow added, ``and so what you had in Vietnam was a kind of facade of a client government, an allied government, which in fact didn't amount to very much."

Four decades later, there is a new facade of a client government. Bush officials whisper that it is not amounting to very much. That is to cover up the fact that the US invasion and occupation has amounted to even less.

The Troops Stay On (WP)

AT THE BEGINNING of this year it was an open secret that the Bush administration hoped to substantially reduce the number of U.S. troops in both Iraq and Afghanistan by this fall. Reports said it was aiming for 100,000 troops in Iraq, compared with 165,000 at the end of 2005. In Afghanistan, the force level was to drop below 15,000 as more NATO forces were deployed. In part, the plans reflected the administration's optimistic assumptions about the progress that would be made in both countries. But it was hard to ignore the fact that the reductions were to come just in time for November's midterm election.

As the good news failed to materialize in either theater, we, among others, worried that Mr. Bush would pressure his military commanders to go ahead with the drawdowns. That didn't happen. This week several senior military commanders, including Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, stated publicly that the troop levels would remain where they are well into next year. The force level in Iraq, 145,000, is higher than it was this summer, while the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan, at about 20,000, is well above the 16,500 reported at the end of last year.

Mr. Bush deserves some credit for being true to his word: He said that in deciding on troop reductions, he would be guided by conditions in the two countries and his commanders' recommendations rather than by the political calendar -- and he has been. The administration put this news out weeks before the election, even though the failure to bring troops home will add to the negative pull Iraq already exerts on Republicans in many congressional races.

The president's steadfastness would be much more impressive if it seemed to be attached to a winning strategy. Sadly, the events of the past several weeks suggest otherwise, at least in Iraq. Gen. Abizaid candidly described the progress of a U.S. military campaign in Baghdad, where additional American forces have been concentrated in the hope of stopping rampant sectarian bloodshed, as slight. Asked by reporters if the war could be won, he replied, "Given unlimited time and unlimited support, we're winning the war."

The problem, as both Gen. Abizaid and Mr. Bush well know, is that neither time nor resources are unlimited. Reports in several newspapers yesterday said the continuing heavy deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan had prompted commanders to discuss whether to call up more National Guard units at the expense of breaking rules about how often they are deployed.

The same day Gen. Abizaid spoke, the chairmen of a bipartisan Iraq study group set up by Congress delivered a blunt message to the four-month-old Iraqi coalition government, which has been slow to take desperately needed steps toward national reconciliation. "The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon, and the citizens of the United States, that it is deserving of continuing support," said former representative Lee H. Hamilton, who chairs the group along with former secretary of state James A. Baker III.

Unless that message is heeded, the sacrifice involved in holding U.S. troop levels steady for another six months -- in lives, above all -- is likely to be wasted.

War Price On U.S. Lives Equal To 9/11 (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, September 23, 2006

Now the death toll is 9/11 times two. U.S. military deaths from Iraq and Afghanistan now surpass those of the most devastating terrorist attack in America's history, the trigger for what came next.

The latest milestone for a country at war came Friday without commemoration. It came without the precision of knowing who was the 2,974th to die in conflict. The terrorist attacks killed 2,973 victims in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

An Associated Press count of the U.S. death toll in Iraq rose to 2,696. Combined with 278 U.S. deaths in and around Afghanistan, the 9/11 toll was reached, then topped, the same day. The Pentagon reported Friday the latest death from Iraq, an as-yet unidentified soldier killed a day earlier after his vehicle was hit by a roadside bombing in eastern Baghdad.

Not for the first time, war that was started to answer death has resulted in at least as much death for the country that was first attacked, quite apart from the higher numbers of enemy and civilians killed.

Historians note that this grim accounting is not how the success or failure of warfare is measured, and that the reasons for conflict are broader than what served as the spark.

The body count from World War II was far higher for Allied troops than for the crushed Axis. Americans lost more men in each of a succession of Pacific battles than the 2,390 people who died at Pearl Harbor in the attack that made the U.S. declare war on Japan. The U.S. lost 405,399 in the theaters of World War II.

Despite a death toll that pales next to that of the great wars, one casualty milestone after another has been observed and reflected upon this time, especially in Iraq.

There was the benchmark of seeing more U.S. troops die in the occupation than in the swift and successful invasion. And the benchmarks of 1,000 dead, 2,000, 2,500.

Now this.

"There's never a good war but if the war's going well and the overall mission remains powerful, these numbers are not what people are focusing on," said Julian Zelizer, a political historian at Boston University. "If this becomes the subject, then something's gone wrong."

Beyond the tribulations of the moment and the now-rampant doubts about the justification and course of the Iraq war, Zelizer said Americans have lost firsthand knowledge of the costs of war that existed keenly up to the 1960s, when people remembered two world wars and Korea, and faced Vietnam.

"A kind of numbness comes from that," he said. "We're not that country anymore — more bothered, more nervous. This isn't a country that's used to ground wars anymore."

Almost 10 times more Americans have died in Iraq than in Afghanistan, where U.S. casualties have been remarkably light by any historical standard, although climbing in recent months in the face of a resurgent Taliban.

The Pentagon reports 56 military deaths and one civilian Defense Department death in other parts of the world from Operation Enduring Freedom, the anti-terrorism war distinct from Iraq.

Altogether, 3,031 have died abroad since Sept. 11, 2001.

The toll among Iraqi civilians hit a record high in the summer, with 6,599 violent deaths reported in July and August alone, the United Nations said this week.

Among the latest U.S. deaths identified by the armed forces:

_Army 2nd Lt. Emily J.T. Perez, 23, Fort Washington, Md., who died Sept. 12 in Kifl, Iraq, from an explosive device detonated near her vehicle. A former high school sprinter who sang in her West Point gospel choir, she was assigned to the 204th Support Battalion, 2nd Brigade, 4th Infantry Division, Fort Hood, Texas.

_Marine Sgt. Christopher M. Zimmerman, 28, Stephenville, Texas, killed Wednesday in Anbar province, Iraq. He was assigned to 2nd Reconnaissance Battalion, 2nd Marine Division, II Marine Expeditionary Force, Camp Lejeune, N.C.

A new study on the war dead and where they come from suggests that the notion of "rich man's war, poor man's fight" has become a little truer over time.

Among the Americans killed in the Iraq war, 34 percent have come from communities reporting the lowest levels of family income. Half come from middle income communities and only 17 percent from the highest income level.

That's a change from World War II, when all income groups were represented about equally. In Korea, Vietnam and Iraq, the poor have made up a progressively larger share of casualties, by this analysis.

Eye-for-an-eye vengeance was not the sole motivator for what happened after the 2001 attacks any more than Pearl Harbor alone was responsible for all that followed. But Pearl Harbor caught the U.S. in the middle of mobilization, debate, rising tensions with looming enemies and a European war already in progress. Historians doubt anyone paid much attention to sad milestones once America threw itself into the fight.

In contrast, the United States had no imminent war intentions against anyone on Sept. 10, 2001. One bloody day later, it did.

Iraq Leader Warns Of Spreading Violence (AP-Y)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

Iraq's president said Friday that terrorist forces are using his country as "a stepping stone" for spreading violence and that military action alone won't stop them.

President Jalal Talabani also told the U.N. General Assembly that the government will not talk about a timetable for withdrawing U.S.-led forces until the Iraqi armed forces are capable of ending terrorism and maintaining security.

He said the government is committed to a national reconciliation plan that hopefully will provide the protection and conditions needed to ensure security for the Iraqi people. At the same time, he said, efforts to build the Iraqi armed forces are making progress, but U.S.-led coalition troops are still needed.

"They are essential for us in the present circumstances while accomplishing the mission of building our armed forces that are capable of ending terrorism and maintaining stability and security," Talabani said. "Only then will it be possible to talk about a timetable for the withdrawal of the multinational force from Iraq."

Addressing another conflict, China's Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing called for patience on restarting stalled international talks aimed at ridding North Korea of its nuclear weapons.

Li said the only way to resume the six-nation talks, which the North has boycotted since November, is for the participants to "meet each other halfway and work together."

"We hope the parties involved will be cool-headed and more flexible," Li said in a speech at the General Assembly.

The talks involve China, the Korea, the United States, Japan and Russia. But China, which is the North's major ally and a key economic lifeline, is viewed as crucial to getting the North to return.

Talabani said that as Iraqi forces are able to meet the necessary requirements to take over, they will gradually replace coalition forces.

But he warned that the rampant violence in Iraq was a threat to regional stability.

"We must emphasize that the forces of extremism, those who oppose democracy and humanitarian values are intent on making Iraq a stepping stone for reaching other goals, for even more destruction," Talabani said. "They are composed of regional and Arab elements that export their crises ... and fight their battles on Iraq's territory and among the people of my country."

Speaking to reporters after the speech, U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad also urged other countries to offer support.

"I believe that Iraq will succeed," he said. "But Iraq does need assistance from not only the coalition but from its neighbors and from the international community as a whole."

Talabani also called on the Security Council to dissolve the U.N. weapons inspection agency known as UNMOVIC, saying it has been proven that Iraq is free of weapons of mass destruction.

"The status of this commission in its current form and its financing, using Iraqi accounts, squanders Iraq's money," he said. "Our people are in desperate need of these funds."

The U.N. has been using money from the defunct oil-for-food program to fund the activities of the U.N. Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission.

U.N. inspectors left Iraq just before the U.S.-led war started in March 2003 and the United States has barred them from returning. They have continued to work, compiling a detailed database and using commercial satellite photos to keep track of equipment with dual civilian and military uses, which they had been monitoring on the ground.

Talabani's address came four days after foreign ministers from several countries, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, met on the eve of the General Assembly to discuss the implementation of the Compact for Iraq, a five-year plan to ensure Iraq's government has funds to survive and enact key political and economic reforms.

"We are hopeful that the international community fulfills its obligations by providing the required resources to deal with the key priorities," he said.

He also thanked President Bush "for his leadership of the campaign to liberate Iraq from tyranny and opening the doors for a new, democratic, pluralistic and federal Iraq that is at peace with itself and the world."

"This historic mission has served the people of Iraq and peace and security in the region," Talabani said.

The praise was a change in tone, as Bush has faced fiery words of criticism in speeches by Iranian leader Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Blasts In Western Baghdad Damage Mosque And Homes (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

BAGHDAD, Sept. 22 — Attackers severely damaged a Sunni mosque in western Baghdad before noon on Friday, and the resulting blaze set fire to eight nearby homes and a bakery, a United States military official said.

The explosion struck the Bakara al-Rahman mosque in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood, the official said. It apparently occurred before the start of Friday Prayer, but details were sketchy. Gunmen attacked homes in the area before the blast, and then after the bombing fired on Iraqi Army troops who responded to calls for help, the official added.

Another military official, Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a spokesman in Baghdad, said that there was “one mosque that appears to have been destroyed” in western Baghdad, but he said he did not have any details.

The commander of United States forces in Baghdad said Friday that he needs 3,000 more Iraqi troops to patrol the city, but that he is having trouble getting them because they do not want to leave their home regions.

“What I still need in here in terms of battalions from the Iraqi Army that I would like to see is approximately six battalions, and the government is working to do that,” Maj. Gen. James Thurman, the commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, told reporters in a briefing in Baghdad.

“Some of these battalions, when they were formed, were formed regionally,” he said. “And some of the soldiers, due to the distance, did not want to travel into Baghdad.”

The military says American and Iraqi forces are working jointly in a large operation that has drawn United States troops from other parts of the country to sweep through Baghdad neighborhoods in an effort to bring down the capital’s soaring murder and execution rate.

An Iraqi battalion has roughly 500 soldiers, General Thurman said. Currently, he said, there are 15,000 American and coalition troops in the capital, 9,000 Iraqi combat troops, 12,000 national police officers and 22,000 local police officers.

General Thurman said attacks have risen in Baghdad in the past week, most of them against American and Iraqi troops. Earlier this week, United Nations human rights officials reported that 2,222 people in Baghdad were killed violently last month, a 23 percent decline from July.

The United Nations said the decline, which followed what it described as “unprecedented” violence in July, may be the result of the increased American and Iraqi military operations. Yet it also said the trend in the number of killings appeared to be increasing toward the end of August.

Underscoring the limitations of the Iraqi military, the president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, said in a speech at the United Nations on Friday that it is too early to even talk about setting a timetable for the eventual withdrawal of American and British forces.

American troops are essential until Iraqi security forces “are capable of putting an end to terrorism and maintaining stability and security,” Mr. Talabani said. “Only then will it be possible to talk about a timetable for the withdrawal of the multinational forces from Iraq.”

The military said a soldier was killed late Thursday night in eastern Baghdad when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb.

The mosque bombing and related attacks on Friday happened near Hurriya, west of the Shiite enclave of Khadamiya. They were likely the work of roving militiamen, said Abdul Karim al-Samarraie, a Sunni member of Parliament. He said the attackers used rocket-propelled grenades and machine guns against several mosques in Hurriya, and that 15 homes were also set on fire.

Iraqi soldiers in the Hurriya area are sympathetic to the militias and not eager to put a stop to militia attacks, he said, adding, "The government is not serious enough about solving this problem."

The Associated Press quoted a police lieutenant, Maithem Abdel-Razzaq, as saying that about 20 gunmen attacked several houses and set two on fire, and then opened fire on two mosques, damaging buildings but not causing casualties. The news agency reported that at least four people were killed in the attacks.

Iraqi officials say that insurgents and militia fighters have been employing new tactics in their attacks. According to the Defense Ministry, there have been cases recently of gunmen kidnapping drivers, loading their cars with hidden explosives unknown to the driver, then releasing the driver only to detonate their vehicles by remote control when they reach a checkpoint.

The Boston Globe/AP, September 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq --A bomb blew up a kerosene tanker truck in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood on Saturday, killing at least 32 people, police said.

Another 38 people were wounded by the 10 a.m. blast in the sprawling Shiite slum. People frantically carried survivors from the narrow muddy street to ambulances, and hauled away bodies in blankets.

The bomb was hidden in a barrel near the tanker truck, where scores of people were waiting to buy fuel, said police Col. Saad Abdul-Sada.

There were more people on hand than usual as families sought to stock up on fuel for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, he said.

Seventeen women were among the dead, Abdul-Sada said, adding that casualties were expected to rise.

Sadr City is home to more than two million people and a stronghold of the Mahdi army -- a Shiite militia loyal to radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

AP, September 23, 2006

U.S. and Iraqi forces have captured a leader of Ansar al-Sunnah, the group behind the 2004 attack on a U.S. military mess hall that killed 22 people, the prime minister's office said Saturday.

Muntasir Hamoud Ileiwi al-Jubouri and two of his aides were arrested in Al-Taeyh, about 50 miles northeast of Baghdad, said Brig. Qassim al-Mussawi, spokesman for the General Command of the Armed Forces — the prime minister's military office. He did not say when the arrest was made.

The Sunni militant group has claimed responsibility for numerous suicide attacks, the August 2004 execution of 12 Nepalese hostages and a December 2004 explosion at a U.S. military mess hall in Mosul that killed 22 people. It is believed to be an offshoot of another group, Ansar Al-Islam.

That group is made up mostly of Kurds with close links to al-Qaida in Iraq. It has been blamed for a number of attacks, including assassination attempts against Kurdish officials.

Ansar al-Sunna is part of the Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups — including al-Qaida in Iraq — that was co-founded by the late Jordanian-born terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Berming Baghdad (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, September 23, 2006

At first blush it sounded like a resort to medieval siege warfare. An Iraqi Interior Ministry official announced that the government was going to build trenches around Baghdad, a circumference of 60 miles embracing a metropolis of 5 million people. Other officials here quickly denied there was such a plan, but then at a press conference in Washington, President Bush announced that U.S. and Iraqi officials had a plan to put a barricade around the city. "The enemy is changing tactics," the president said, "and we're adapting. So they're building a berm around the city to make it harder for people to come in with explosive devices, for example." Now that the cat's out of the bag, the Iraqi government is expected to announce it officially tomorrow, national-security adviser Mowaffaq al-Rubaie confirmed here in an interview today.

Officials were somewhat defensive about how to describe the measure. When the new Interior Ministry spokesman, Gen. Abdul Karim al-Kinani, called it a trench, there were inevitable comparisons to a moat. (Then he was peremptorily yanked from his first press conference by higher-ups, sparking speculation he had said too much.) Rubaie rejected descriptions of it as a wall or a berm—a centuries-old method of dirt-walling a city—instead describing it as "a physical barrier of water and soil combined with a restricted number of entries to Baghdad." Other officials, however, have described it informally as "the berming of Baghdad." Actually, U.S. and Iraqi officials say, it's a combination of trench digging, natural obstacles and berms, piles of dirt pushed in place by bulldozers, high enough to prevent vehicles from crossing. The barriers, in whatever form, will leave only 28 entrances to the city, all of which will have Iraqi police and army checkpoints to control who gets in and out.

"It certainly is happening," said U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, in Baghdad. "We're working with the Iraqi government to make it happen, mostly using terrain features, irrigation canals and so forth, tying them in with berms and trenches and other features." The purpose, he said, was "to help stem the flow both into and out of the city in order to help control movement of illegal weapons, IED materials and anybody such as kidnapping victims who might be taken out of the city." It's not the first time the method has been tried in the Iraq war; several smaller communities have been bermed, and even neighborhoods in Baghdad have been blockaded to force residents through single checkpoints. After the U.S. Marines invaded Fallujah, that small city was surrounded by an extensive network of berms, particularly on minor roads.

The plan reflects a growing concern by officials at the rise in violence in the capital despite two months of the Baghdad Security Plan, which involved a large increase in U.S. and Iraqi troops and police in the city. Last month, the Americans deployed an additional 5,000 troops, most from the Stryker Brigade, to the city to cope with rising sectarian violence. U.S. troop levels in Iraq are now at the highest level, 147,000, since 2003, and are not expected to come down until next February at the earliest, Gen. John Abizaid, head of the U.S. Army's Central Command, said Tuesday. Iraqi officials want the berming to be in place in time for Ramadan, which is about to begin. Since 2003, the Muslim holy month of fasting has traditionally seen a spike in violence in Iraq.

Sectarian strife has become so severe that on Wednesday, the top U.S. military spokesman here, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said that "most Baghdad residents do not feel safe traveling outside of their neighborhoods because of the current security situation." In addition, there has been a marked increase in attacks against American soldiers, with combat deaths averaging 2.5 a day in the first three weeks of September—compared to 1.5 a day in July, according to U.S. Department of Defense figures. Military officials are concerned that this may be related to an edict issued Sept. 7 by the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir. He called for all Sunnis "to kill at least one American within the next 15 days by sniper, or bomb or suicidal operation as the battlefield requires." After a decline in recent months, there's been a serious increase in the terrorists' most effective weapon, suicide car bombings, especially in Baghdad. Rubaie said the greatest utility of the barrier will be "controlling the cars and material coming in to make the entry of these VBIEDs difficult." VBIED stands for Vehicle-Borne Improvised Explosive Device, the U.S. military's acronym for car bombs. "We believe most of the VBIEDs have been manufactured in the suburbs of Baghdad."

Reports of the barrier have been greeted skeptically in Baghdad, partly because of the government's initial denials. “They’re trying to change Baghdad into a big Green Zone,” said Saleh Matleq, the head of the moderate Sunni-dominated National Consensus Front. “But the violence isn’t only from outside Baghdad, it’s inside as well.” And Muslim Scholars spokesman Abdul Salam al-Qubeisi, a hard-line Sunni, scoffed that "it may turn out to be a prison for the government troops, and a good benefit for the resistance. Meantime, it's just a big operation to steal Iraqi money."

Whether it helps the government control the Sunni-based insurgency and affiliated terrorist groups like Al Qaeda, the Baghdad berm isn't likely to address the city's biggest problem: its rampaging death squads. While recent figures are hard to get due to controversies around their release, murders in Baghdad were averaging 60 a day as of last month, and most observers believe the trend has continued or worsened this month. "This past week," Caldwell said Wednesday, "there was a spike in execution-style murders in Baghdad ... We believe death squads and other illegal armed groups are responsible for this type of violence." Most of the victims are found bound and shot execution style, often after torture. While there are both Sunnis and Shia death squads, the Shia ones are far more numerous, and often operate without interference from the Shia-dominated police—or even sometimes in concert with them. For the most part, death squads operate in city neighborhoods, so are unlikely to be affected by a citywide barrier.

The idea of a barrier around Baghdad, nonetheless, is a venerable one, Rubaie said. Much of the construction for it had in fact already been completed long before Iraqi officials came up with the idea. "It was there in the old regime, it was used by Saddam," he said. "We've never used it until now." Pictures of the project aren’t readily available because photographers risk being shot if they take pictures near Baghdad defense-construction crews. But there were signs Friday that parts of it were already in place, with huge checkpoints set up and searching every car on highways leading into the city from the southern outskirts of Yusufiyah and Mahmudiya, insurgent troublespots. The result was monumental traffic jams—something neither Saddam, nor his medieval counterparts, had to worry about.

Secrets In The Mountains Of Afghanistan (LAT)

By Kevin Sack And Craig Pyes

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The concealed deaths of two detainees at Gardez paints a troubling picture of abuse by U.S. Special Forces units there.

First of two parts

GARDEZ, Afghanistan — After completing their deployment to this remote firebase, the Green Berets of ODA 2021 left for home covered in glory.

The 10-member Special Forces team, part of the Alabama National Guard, returned to their families in the spring of 2003 with tales to tell of frenzied firefights and narrow escapes.

Its commander had nominated each of his men — as well as himself — for medals for valor. The team's performance was heralded as evidence that the Guard could play as equals with the regular Army in the war on terrorism.

But the team also had come home with secrets.

Apparently unknown to Army officials, two detainees had died in the team's custody in separate incidents during the unit's final month in eastern Afghanistan. Several other detainees allege that they were badly beaten or tortured while held at the base in Gardez.

One victim, an unarmed peasant, was shot to death while being held for questioning after a fierce firefight. The other, an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit, died after being interrogated at the firebase. Descriptions of his injuries were consistent with severe beatings and other abuse.

A member of the Special Forces team told The Times his unit held a meeting after the teen's death to coordinate their stories should an investigation arise.

"Everybody on the team had knowledge of it," the soldier said, insisting on anonymity. "You just don't talk about that stuff in the Special Forces community. What happens downrange stays downrange.... Nobody wants to get anybody in trouble. Just sit back, and hope it will go away."

What distinguishes these two fatalities from scores of other questionable deaths in U.S. custody is that they were successfully concealed — not just from the American public but from the military's chain of command and legal authorities.

The deaths came to light only after an investigation by The Times and a nonprofit educational organization, the Crimes of War Project, led the Army to open criminal inquiries on the incidents. Two years later, the cases remain under investigation and no charges have been filed.

The Times has since reviewed thousands of pages of internal military records showing that prisoner abuse by Special Forces units was more common in Afghanistan than previously acknowledged.

More than a year before the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal broke in Iraq, top officers worried that harsh treatment and excessive detentions could lead to criminal prosecutions.

In one November 2002 correspondence, a high-ranking Special Operations official said military police were detecting "an extremely high level of physical abuse" of detainees transferred from Special Forces field bases to a prison in Bagram.

An operations officer with the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force, the command supervising Special Forces teams in Afghanistan, complained in a memo that prisoners were being held for so long without charges that it "may be implied as kidnapping, a federal crime."

Early in 2003, the chief Special Forces intelligence officer in Afghanistan warned in a note to the task force commander, Col. James G. "Greg" Champion, and his top aides: "As you are all aware, alleged assaults and kidnapping [have] been occurring for quite some time. Again, I want to emphasize, this is not isolated."

The same officer reported another improper detention less than two weeks later, notifying Champion's staff in a memo that reflected his exasperation. "Today is Day 5 of this hostage crisis," wrote the intelligence officer, Maj. David Davis. He said that such unauthorized detentions amounted to "criminal conduct in my book."

There also were early warnings from outside sources about prisoner mistreatment.

In a series of meetings that began in late 2002, officials with the International Committee of the Red Cross told top U.S. commanders in Afghanistan that they had fielded a rash of detainee abuse reports involving at least five Special Forces firebases, according to previously undisclosed military documents.

The Red Cross representatives protested that the bases had, in effect, become short-term detention centers, without adequately trained personnel or effective monitoring, said several U.S. officials with knowledge of the meetings.

Most of the bases singled out by the agency were under the control of National Guardsmen with the Alabama-based 20th Special Forces Group. The compound at Gardez, then occupied by ODA 2021, was portrayed as one of the worst. Detainees there alleged they were beaten, kicked, doused with cold water and deprived of sleep for days at a time.

The Army declined to comment on the cases involving ODA 2021 or more generally on allegations of detainee abuse.

Special Forces firebases in Afghanistan — often the first stop in a detainee's journey to a holding facility and possibly on to the prison at Guantanamo Bay — operated largely beyond the reach of human rights monitors, journalists and, at times, the military chain of command.

Because of their clandestine nature, Special Forces operations have been a concern to some in Congress and the State Department who worry that human rights violations could be occurring under a cloak of secrecy.

The handling of detainees in Afghanistan became a murky area after President Bush declared early in the war, launched in October 2001, that the Geneva Convention would not be applied to Al Qaeda, and Taliban captives would not be treated as prisoners of war. Instead, detainees were to be treated "humanely," according to a February 2002 White House directive.

The internal military records show that although senior U.S. commanders in Afghanistan issued warnings and distributed rules consistent with the Army field manual and Geneva Convention, those procedures were routinely ignored.

"You have so much freedom and authority over there," one member of ODA 2021 said. "It kind of makes you feel like God when you're out there in cowboy and Indian country."

The documents also show that in 2003 the leadership of ODA 2021 was repeatedly criticized by its superiors. One 20th Group officer said the Gardez ODA (for Operational Detachment Alpha) was "the most troubled" field team among nearly a dozen in Afghanistan. Another senior officer expressed concern in a note that the team was gaining a reputation as "a rogue unit."

That a small Special Forces detachment could be tied to two detainee deaths and two apparent cover-ups in less than two weeks reflected an almost perfect confluence of circumstances. They included the personality of the team, the unaccountability of its leadership, the evolution of U.S. policy on detentions, the failure of United Nations officials to report abuses, and the complicity of Afghan officials.

The story of the team's deployment, like the five-year American campaign in Afghanistan itself, is a tale of high-stakes but often conflicting goals. For the men of ODA 2021, it would be a place and time in which questionable deaths and unquestionable daring were all part of the same mission.

Hotel Gardez

The shooting war was supposedly over when about 300 National Guardsmen of the 20th Group's 1st Battalion arrived in Afghanistan nine months after U.S.-led coalition forces' December 2001 ouster of the Taliban regime. Nonetheless, it was a dangerous and chaotic time.

Al Qaeda and the Taliban were in flight, but not vanquished. The new government was trying to stand up, but it was still wobbly. And, much like today, the U.S. military struggled to balance the sometimes incompatible missions of combat and reconstruction.

As this latest rotation of U.S. Special Forces hit the ground, much of the countryside remained beyond the control of the newly installed government of interim President Hamid Karzai.

It would fall to Special Forces teams such as ODA 2021 to root out Al Qaeda and Taliban stragglers and unearth caches of weapons. In Paktia, the province that includes Gardez, the task was complicated by byzantine local politics.

Tribal warlords and bandits had skirmished for centuries over the inhospitable terrain along the porous border with Pakistan. They had only been emboldened by the power vacuums and shifting alliances created after the U.S.-led invasion.

As in centuries past, power and wealth in the region flowed to those who controlled the trade routes. In 2002, that meant controlling 17 longtime checkpoints along about 50 miles of dusty mountain road between the provincial capitals of Khowst and Gardez. Both of the detainee deaths linked to ODA 2021 came as a consequence of efforts to pacify that perilous route.

For the Americans, securing the checkpoints would help them detect militants' movements and ensure the free passage of troops and supplies. For the warlords, who were regularly accused of extorting cash or produce from truck drivers, the checkpoints afforded a means to pay and feed their militias.

The Green Berets were prepared to remove illegally operated checkpoints by force, but Pentagon planners regarded the problem as a local political dispute that should be handled by the Afghans. Besides, the U.S. military was under pressure to move from combat operations to a reconstruction phase aimed at winning hearts and minds.

The stakes could not have been higher for Col. Champion, commander of the 20th Special Forces Group. Not only was the Army counting on his National Guard troops to perform like active-duty professionals, but Champion also had been placed in charge of the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force.

It was the first time since the Korean War that a National Guard unit held command over all U.S. Special Forces in wartime. If Champion succeeded, a general's star awaited his lapel.

The 20th, with about 1,600 members, is one of the Army's seven active Special Forces groups, and one of only two consisting of National Guard troops. ODA 2021 belonged to the 1st Battalion, based in Huntsville, Ala., and its 10 members came from five Southern states.

The team leader, Capt. Michael M. May, 35, was a decorated Kentucky state trooper who had a cop's respect for procedure and the chain of command. A father of two, he was cautious and regarded the Special Forces as ambassadors who were helping the Afghans reclaim their country. Though some of his men were eager to round up bad guys, May focused on the team's broader mission of training Afghan troops.

"I'm going to be the one to write the letter to your kids if you get hurt or killed," he would tell his teammates.

Some clearly felt May was too passive, especially as conditions in the area deteriorated. They "wanted [us] to grab our guns and drive out the door and go do it," one team member recalled.

In Gardez, the dusty provincial capital nearly a mile and a half above sea level, the ODA settled into an adobe fort the size of a football field. They called it Hotel Gardez. It was surrounded by 25-foot mud walls and had an elevated latrine accessible only by ladder.

The region was endlessly brown, parched by drought. Being stationed there, one U.S. soldier said, was like "living in a gravel pit."

The fortress came under regular attack, most often by Taliban loyalists lobbing missiles from a pair of nearby hilltops. One day, a shell exploded in a cemetery behind the fort and the soldiers watched dogs fight over the bones of unearthed remains.

Army regulations at the base were relaxed. The Guardsmen wore bushy beards and civilian clothing, a look intended to ease their approach to locals. They also adorned the grill of a red Toyota truck with a James Brown doll, thrilling local children when, at the press of a button, it sang out: "Whoa! I feel good!"

The Warlord

From their earliest days in Gardez, the members of ODA 2021 bristled at being kept on a short leash. They were particularly eager to mount an offensive against their primary nemesis, a renegade warlord named Pacha Khan Zadran.

In an assessment sent to headquarters shortly after its arrival, the team's leaders labeled the warlord "a thug" and asked permission "to take a much stronger stance" against him.

As the leader of the Zadran tribe, he commanded 300 to 600 armed men and, with American backing, had helped fight the Taliban. He also controlled various checkpoints along the Khowst road.

CIA and Special Forces operatives who dealt with Pacha Khan (or PKZ, as they called him), described him as brutish, mercurial and unstable. "I thought he was a windbag and a bully and just out for the money," said one U.S. intelligence analyst.

But Pacha Khan's stature grew when he became one of the signatories to the December 2001 Bonn agreement that formed the transitional Afghan government. Karzai rewarded his support by naming him governor of Paktia, then rescinded the decision after Afghan military commanders in Gardez refused to cede power to the warlord.

Pacha Khan responded by furiously bombarding Gardez in the spring of 2002. American forces were caught in the middle of the rocket attacks and the policy confusion over how to deal with the warlord.

CIA operatives and Special Forces tacticians hatched a number of plans to capture and imprison him, but senior officials in Washington always resisted. The havoc he wrought was exactly the kind of intra-Afghan dispute that the Defense Department insisted should be dealt with by the Karzai government.

Denied its preferred option, the CIA tried intimidation. As Pacha Khan was leaving a confrontational meeting at the Gardez firebase, intelligence officials arranged for three jets to buzz the compound in a display of American might. The low-level flyover sent the warlord diving beneath his car, toppling his turban, according to a witness.

Then U.S. officials embraced a plan by Gen. Atiqullah Lodin, an Afghan military commander, to pay Pacha Khan's checkpoint commanders to defect to the government. Lodin said in an interview that the CIA put up the cash. Military correspondence shows that the agency contributed at least $100,000.

One who defected for dollars was the commander of the strategic Sato Kandaw checkpoint, Ahmad Naseer, who told The Times the CIA gave him $3,000 and a pickup truck. He said an agent photographed him accepting the payoff.

By November, however, ODA 2021 had begun receiving reports that the checkpoint shakedowns had resumed.

The team's patience was already wearing thin when, on the morning of Nov. 27, 2002, a unit convoy was ambushed while passing through a steep draw on the Khowst road. The soldiers had just picked up the 1st Battalion commander, Lt. Col. Steven W. Duff, who was headed to Gardez for a Thanksgiving visit despite warnings about security along the road.

"We told him if he wants to come see us, take a helicopter — don't come down the Khowst road," a team member recalled. But Duff insisted. As his red Toyota sped through the kill zone, a sniper round slammed through Duff's left thigh.

Dan Smith and Sgt. 1st Class Jason Howard ran off the snipers, and Duff was evacuated by helicopter. Indebted to the team, he recommended Smith and Howard, the team's senior medic, for the Bronze Star.

The team took it personally that its battalion commander had been wounded while in its care. After Pacha Khan quickly emerged as the prime suspect, the ODA redoubled its efforts to have him listed as a high-value target.

But the warlord was considered "a pseudo political figure" -- untouchable unless they could tie him to the Taliban or Al Qaeda, according to an official of the Special Operations task force. If they could, he wrote, "the ballgame changes completely."

He concluded: "We do not want to get in the middle of Afghan politics, even if he is a shithead who deserves to spend a decade or two at Gitmo."

'Smear Campaign'

Five days after Duff was shot, a commando task force made an unexpected visit to the Gardez firebase in pursuit of a top-tier target believed to be in the area.

The complex mission called for ODA 2021 to join the operation, but no one had bothered to inform the team. The team's commander, Capt. May, refused to go along because of inadequate planning, according to several 20th Group officials and documents reviewed by The Times.

May's refusal infuriated the Delta Force officer in charge of the commando task force, the officials said. A month later, on his way out of the country, the officer delivered a four-page memo to Special Operations officials, in effect accusing May of cowardice and dereliction of duty.

At Champion's request, Duff looked into the accusations. Though he ultimately dismissed them as unfounded and "a smear campaign," he learned that many on May's team considered him a tentative leader, more focused on bringing his men home alive than on attacking the enemy. Duff reassigned May to the battalion's operations center in neighboring Uzbekistan.

Though Duff insisted that the transfer was unrelated to the criticism, May saw the reassignment as "a career-ending thing," said one 20th Group colleague. "Mike was stressed about this," the colleague said. He "was devastated."

In an interview, Duff said he had intended to transfer May anyway to season him for promotion. May, who referred requests for an interview to the 20th Group public affairs office, was in fact promoted to major and given a company command after returning to the U.S.

May's removal heartened those on the team who wanted to conduct more "posse operations" in the manner of the Army's Delta Force and the Navy's SEALs.

"This was an aggressive, door-kicking bunch," said one 20th Group official, "and Mike May was the control rod."

Bamian Mutiny

More than 100 miles to the northwest, in Bamian, another Green Beret team was having its own leadership problems. For many in ODA 2015, Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, their team commander, was too hungry for a fight and had a habit of planning risky missions without their input.

Waller was not a weekend warrior but a full-time National Guardsman. He worked at 20th Group headquarters in Birmingham and was perceived by many to be Col. Champion's "golden child." He declined to be interviewed for this article.

Late in November 2002, Waller's team discovered a large cache of weapons in the nearby Kahmard Valley. They linked it to a warlord suspected of supporting Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden.

Waller carried the news directly to Champion's command, bypassing his 1st Battalion superiors. He argued for a full assault on the area, peppering his entreaties with reminders of 9/11 and imploring commanders to "think war."

His end runs, and his flamboyant prose, incensed Waller's superiors at headquarters. They were so annoyed by his tendency to act on his own that they marked his periodic sightings on a wall map, calling the exercise "Where's Waller?"

The team leader had trouble within his own ranks as well. The Bamian unit's senior noncommissioned officer, Master Sgt. Pasquale "Jim" Russo, sent a defiant note to battalion officials in December openly challenging Waller's proposal to raid an area that was thick with enemy fighters. "I can't think of many more principles of combat that we have not violated," Russo said of the plan.

The operation was temporarily scrubbed, redesigned and its planning assigned to a different team.

Not long after Russo's complaint, a sizable contingent of the 2015 team let battalion leaders know they preferred not to serve under Waller, several members said. It was an almost unthinkable act of mutiny.

After Maj. Tony Wheeler, a top 1st Battalion official, arrived in Bamian in early January to head the provincial reconstruction team there, he reported to Duff that the trust between Waller and his men had deteriorated beyond repair. "The team seems to see Ken as a loose canon [sic] who might get them killed for no reason," he wrote.

Duff relieved Waller of his command in Bamian and ordered him to Gardez as Capt. May's replacement. Champion signed off on the transfer. However, Duff acknowledged making the decision over the warnings of his own staff. His aides cautioned that

Waller would be even less controllable in Gardez and that inserting him into the conflict with Pacha Khan might make things combustible.

"It was like throwing a match into gasoline," one Special Forces official said.

Chaotic Mission

Back in Gardez, ODA 2021 was between commanders on the night of Feb. 6, 2003, when the team set out on a "snatch mission." The plan was to swoop into the nearby village of Neknam and seize two men suspected of having ties to the Taliban.

The first was taken without incident. But before team members could grab the second, they came under intense fire that left two soldiers pinned against a wall. The team responded with small arms and hand grenades.

Because the leaderless team had failed to file proper operational plans, headquarters had no idea who was in command on the ground. To those monitoring radio communications from the scene, it appeared that U.S. forces might be attacking one another in the dark. That also made it unsafe to call in airstrikes to help end the battle.

Both suspects were finally captured, but almost immediately the team was blistered with high-level criticism.

"As you can imagine, this makes everyone in this unit look like amateurs and incompetent as well," Lt. Col. Robert E. Biller, a top Special Operations task force official, wrote to 20th Group counterparts. Biller characterized the chaotic mission as a "goatscrew."

Col. Champion promptly confined the team to its base. Then he and his staff set out to control the damage. Champion personally briefed Lt. Gen. Dan McNeill, commander of U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan. Champion's aides later reported he had succeeded in stressing the intelligence value of the captured detainees rather than the team's blunders.

"Things have died down," Maj. Jeff Pounding, a Special Operations task force official, wrote to subordinates in the 1st Battalion the following day. "We turned the emphasis of operation of a 'rogue team' to a 'time-sensitive PUC operation.' " PUC, or "person under U.S. control," was shorthand for detainee.

But the missteps continued. Two days after the raid, the team in Gardez transferred two detainees to the Bagram Collection Point, a U.S. holding facility. The detainees arrived "bagged," their mouths taped and hoods secured around their necks, according to military documents.

"As you well know," Pounding wrote to battalion officials, "this is a significant violation of the PUC handling procedures. Bagram detention facility may be doing an investigation."

Red Cross Warnings

There should have been little confusion over detainee policy among members of the 20th Special Forces Group. Champion had distributed the Army's guidelines when the 20th deployed to Afghanistan, and they had been reissued when reports of abuse first made their way to headquarters.

Only detainees found to meet Pentagon criteria for prolonged imprisonment, such as those with clear ties to Al Qaeda or the Taliban, were to be transferred to Bagram. Fearing that innocents might wind up at Guantanamo, Gen. McNeill had stressed to subordinates that he wanted terrorists, not truck drivers and farmers, said a civilian military advisor.

But it wasn't always easy for soldiers to tell the difference. Given the constant threat of ambush, their instinct often was to detain first and ask questions later. The Pentagon criteria provided plenty of latitude, allowing the detention of any suspects "who pose a threat" or "who may have intelligence value."

There was supposed to be a 96-hour limit on battlefield detentions. Sometimes prisoner transfers to Bagram were delayed because helicopters weren't available. But at other times, one 20th Group official said, Special Forces teams extended their prisoners' stays in hopes of extracting better intelligence.

State Department officials in Afghanistan said the teams seemed not to care that their door-kicking roundups and prolonged detentions might stoke local resentment even as the Army was trying to build bridges.

"They felt ... there was carte blanche to carry out actions and there would be little repercussion if they made tactical mistakes," said a State Department official who asked not to be named.

By the end of 2002, the Red Cross had relayed early complaints of prisoner mistreatment to top U.S. military officials in Afghanistan. On Jan. 10, 2003, officials of the organization met with Gen. McNeill's staff, describing the 20th Group's firebases as some of the worst offenders.

Two weeks after the Red Cross meeting in Afghanistan, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld convened a working group in Washington to recommend whether the list of approved anti-terrorism interrogation methods should be expanded. McNeill asked his various intelligence-gathering units to assess the techniques that were in use in Afghanistan.

Despite the Red Cross allegations, the 1st Battalion's chief intelligence officer reported back that there were no problems. "I have not witnessed any abuse or maltreatment of PUCs," Capt. Steven D. Perry wrote. "When they detain a person, I have faith that it is for a very good reason."

On Jan. 24, 2003, McNeill's command reported on its interrogation techniques in a memo to the Pentagon. The list conformed to the Army field manual's approved battlefield methods, but the memo also requested approval of "more aggressive, creative and flexible techniques."

The wish list included food deprivation for up to 24 hours, sensory overload through loud music and extreme temperature changes and the use of muzzled dogs to create "controlled fear." Some of the requested procedures might need to be assessed for compliance with Pentagon rules for humane treatment, the memo acknowledged.

However, according to the Red Cross, many of the more coercive techniques were already being used at some of the firebases.

Blood and Grudge

ODA 2021's new commander took charge in Gardez on Feb. 7 as recriminations were still flying from the "time-sensitive PUC operation" in Neknam. For a team chafing at the second-guessing of its missions, Ken Waller's arrival was a welcome relief.

"He wanted to be aggressive," said one team member. "We knew he had problems with his other team, but he fit right in with us."

Another team member said Waller quickly won respect. "He seemed very competent and certainly wasn't afraid in combat," he said. In mid-February, only 12 days after he had taken command, Waller and his team were returning from patrol along a road blanketed with 5 inches of snow. The red Toyota — the same truck Duff had been shot in — rumbled along in the middle of a five-vehicle convoy.

Staff Sgt. Mark "Marco" Deliz, a team engineer from Oneonta, Ala., tried to steer precisely through the tread marks carved by the two vehicles ahead. But his front right tire strayed a few inches and hit a land mine.

The explosion blew the truck 6 feet into the air, military reports said. Watching in horror from the vehicle behind, Waller could not imagine that anyone had survived.

With blood streaming down his face, Deliz stumbled out the driver's door, brushing the remains of a foot from his lap. It belonged to his teammate and passenger, Scott Barkalow, the 40-year-old intelligence sergeant from Burns, Tenn.

Deliz determined that Barkalow was still alive and gestured for someone to radio for a helicopter. Staff Sgt. Philip S. Abdow, a junior medic who had joined the team six weeks earlier, wrapped what remained of Barkalow's right leg.

After the unnerving incident, the medic accompanied Barkalow on his helicopter evacuation. Abdow reportedly acted so frantically during the flight, barking orders and cursing, that the copter crew later complained to Special Operations officials.

He was recalled to battalion headquarters for evaluation before being cleared to return to the field, according to a 20th Group officer familiar with the incident. Abdow did not respond to requests for an interview.

By several accounts, the attack had a profoundly sobering effect on the team. Before the explosion, members had merely been frustrated by political constraints on their activities. Now they shared Barkalow's loss — and some nursed an abiding grudge.

"You get mad when you see your buddies blown up," one team member said. "You stay pissed off about it."

About this series

"Firebase Gardez" examines the deployment to Afghanistan of a decorated Alabama National Guard unit. It is the result of a yearlong investigation in the U.S. and Afghanistan by Times staff writer Kevin Sack and freelance investigative journalist Craig Pyes. It was written by Sack.

Pyes, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner and frequent contributor to the newspaper, reported from Afghanistan jointly for The Times and the Crimes of War Project, a Washington-based nonprofit that describes itself as "a collaboration of journalists, lawyers and scholars dedicated to raising public awareness of the laws of war." In 2004, the group provided The Times with the first evidence of an unreported Afghan death in U.S. custody and joined with the newspaper to investigate further. That led to a military inquiry by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command that continues today.

The Times reviewed thousands of pages of internal military documents that include the period when a 10-member Special Forces combat team called ODA 2021 (for Operational Detachment Alpha) was assigned to the firebase at Gardez.

Every member of the team was contacted. Most declined to be interviewed or referred reporters to public affairs officers. The Army and all of its subordinate commands — the U.S. Central Command, U.S. Special Operations Command, Army Special Forces Command, 20th Special Forces Group and the Alabama National Guard — declined to comment.

UN Report Details Human Rights Violations In Iraq (MCT)

By Mark Brunswick

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - A new report on human rights violations in Iraq documents how devastatingly easy it is to die here - and how increasingly difficult it is to live.

The report, prepared by the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, said a breakdown of law and order threatens the fabric of life. Militias, death squads, organized crime and people who are "taking the law into their own hands" are filling the vacuum left by a central government incapable of providing stability.

Women are particularly vulnerable. Strict Islamic groups limit women's freedom of movement outside their homes and restrict their access to health care and education. In addition, there are reports of women facing threats and death when they're accused of damaging the honor of their families by having sex outside marriage or leaving home without permission.

In northern Iraq, for instance, "burning" was listed as the cause of death for half of the 112 women killed in Irbil and two-thirds of the 163 killed in Sulaimaniyah in the first six months of 2006. Several women's rights activists have told the United Nations that "fire accidents" often cover up "honor" crimes committed by the family.

During July and August, a record-high 6,599 people were killed in Iraq, including 5,106 in Baghdad, according to the report. Bodies showing up at the Baghdad morgue were missing teeth, skin and eyes and had burns from acid.

In an earlier report, at least 12 men were reported killed this year for being homosexuals. Extremist groups reportedly have said they would begin killing family members unless the men are turned over to them or killed.

Members of the Sabean-Mandean minority, whose religion combines Babylonian, pre-Islamic, Persian and Christian beliefs, are in danger of extinction in Iraq, where their history goes back thousands of years, because so many have been killed or forced to emigrate, the latest U.N. report said.

People taken hostage by gangs wearing police or Special Forces uniforms are being sold to other gangs. There are unconfirmed reports that many of those who have disappeared are being kept in illegal detention centers.

Many residents have reported receiving letters telling them to evacuate their homes, with instructions not to sell or rent the properties they'll leave behind. One man reported that he'd been beaten by members of a Sunni Muslim extremist group using electrical cables and iron bars to force him to tell his religious affiliation.

"The inability of state institutions to bring perpetrators of human rights violations to justice, and the resulting recourse of ordinary citizens to seek private retributive justice, risk polarizing Iraqi society to a previously unknown degree," the report said.

U.S. forces have made a crackdown on sectarian violence in Baghdad their priority in an operation with Iraqi forces called Operation Together Forward.

The U.S. general in charge of coalition forces in the city, Maj. Gen. James Thurman, said Friday that when the operation began in June, he asked the Iraqi Defense Ministry for a brigade, or about 3,000 troops. It so far has provided two battalions, or about 1,000 troops.

Thurman said the ministry was working on the problem and he expected he would get the additional troops within the next few weeks.

There are 15,000 U.S. troops in Baghdad and 54,000 Iraqi troops.

In Iraq, A Journalist In Limbo (WP)

By Tom Curley

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi photographer who helped the Associated Press win a Pulitzer Prize last year, is now in his sixth month in a U.S. Army prison in Iraq. He doesn't understand why he's there, and neither do his AP colleagues.

The Army says it thinks Bilal has too many contacts among insurgents. He has taken pictures the Army thinks could have been made only with the connivance of insurgents. So Bilal himself must be one, too, or at least a sympathizer.

It is a measure of just how dangerous and disorienting Iraq has become that suspicions such as these are considered adequate grounds for locking up a man and throwing away the key.

After more than five months of trying to bring Bilal's case into the daylight, AP is now convinced the Army doesn't care whether Bilal is or isn't an insurgent. The Army doesn't have to care. Bilal is off the street, and the military says it doesn't consider itself accountable to any judicial authority that could question his guilt.

But Bilal's incarceration delivers a further bonus. He is no longer free to circulate in his native Fallujah or in Ramadi, taking photographs that coalition commanders would prefer not to see published.

Anbar province is a hot zone in a hot country. Violence and lawlessness there have been a special problem for U.S. forces nearly since they arrived in Iraq, which means the flow of breaking news has been continuous, much of it bad.

U.S. journalists are severely limited in their ability to move safely, make themselves understood and develop sources in such areas. AP has learned to overcome those limitations, using techniques honed over decades of covering sectarian confrontation and bloodshed in the Middle East.

It has long been AP practice to hire and train local people in the agency's permanent international bureaus. Many become highly skilled career journalists who remain with the Associated Press for decades. Several are second-generation staffers. Their work has never been more important to the Associated Press and the global audience that relies on our reporting.

Without their access and insight into what is happening in their countries and communities, our understanding of the history being made there every day would be shallow and one-dimensional. It would also be far more vulnerable to control and spin by "official" sources.

Both official and unofficial parties on every side of a conflict try to discredit or silence news they don't like. That is certainly the case in Iraq, where journalists are routinely harassed, defamed, beaten and kidnapped. At last count, 80 had been killed.

Bilal Hussein is part of the latest generation of Associated Press hires in the Middle East. He was a shopkeeper in Fallujah, selling mobile phones and computers. Although he had a degree from the Baghdad Institute of Technology, it was the best opportunity available in the fractured Iraqi economy.

AP first hired him as a translator and driver. He proved smart and trustworthy, and was already comfortable with the phones, laptops and cameras that are tools of the journalist's trade. Within months, he was taking professional-quality pictures, including one of insurgents engaged with coalition forces that was part of AP's Pulitzer Prize-winning photography entry last year.

Bilal has shared the hardships of all Iraqis in disputed areas -- hardships that are worse for journalists, whose job is to get as close as they can to places where guns and bombs are being used. His home has been riddled with gunfire. His family has fled. At least once he had to ditch his camera equipment to run for his life.

He faces what may be greater dangers now. From prison, he has told his attorneys that he fears he is a marked man among the detainees, who now know he is a journalist working for a Western news service. Meanwhile, agents of the most powerful country on Earth have labeled him an enemy. They say they have evidence to satisfy themselves, and don't need to prove it to anyone else.

As the organization that handed Bilal the camera that helped put him where he is today, the Associated Press cannot turn its back on him. We cannot dismiss Bilal's insistence that he is not an insurgent solely on the strength of the unexamined suspicions offered by the U.S. military.

If Bilal has done something wrong, the Iraqi courts stand ready to try him. Iraqi authorities have asked more than once that he and other Iraqi citizens in prolonged U.S. military custody be turned over to them for due process. We ask the same.

Army Corps Faked Budget Entries (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Funds for Iraq work, set to expire, were stashed. It's called improper, but not criminal.

WASHINGTON — The Army Corps of Engineers improperly created fake entries in government ledgers to maintain control over hundreds of millions of dollars in spending for the reconstruction of Iraq, according to a federal audit released Friday.

Corps officials listed $362 million in potential contracts for a nonexistent contractor labeled "Dummy Vendor" in a government database, an accounting trick to preserve funds due to expire at the end of this fiscal year, the audit said.

"They took this money and parked it to use later," said one senior U.S. official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to elaborate on the audit.

Corps officials acknowledged Friday that the technique was improper but said that there was no intent to deceive. They said that the entries were designed to ensure that the government had enough money on hand to pay contractors already at work in Iraq.

After being confronted with the audit's findings, corps officials changed the entries in the database to reflect that the money was being used to close down existing contracts in Iraq, the agency said.

"It wasn't the proper bookkeeping way to do this," said Suzanne Fournier, the corps' chief spokeswoman. "Apparently someone didn't understand that."

The audit by the Special Inspector General for the Reconstruction of Iraq is the latest to raise questions about accounting for the multibillion-dollar program, which has been plagued by accusations of waste, fraud and corruption.

At issue is $18 billion in funding approved by Congress in November 2003 to build new schools, power stations and sewage treatment plants in Iraq. At the time, Congress ordered that the funds be spent by Sept. 30.

Iraq's violence and continually shifting government priorities bogged down the pace of the rebuilding effort, leaving the corps with nearly $1 billion still to spend.

To prevent the money from reverting back to the Treasury, Corps officials in Iraq listed the "Dummy Vendor" as receiving 96 different contracts to build infrastructure for oil, electricity and other sectors, the audit said.

The U.S. Special Operations Command, based in Tampa, Fla., was accused of "parking" $20 million in 2003, leading to language in this year's Defense Department budget to criminalize the practice.

That bill has yet to pass, and the inspector general for Iraq, Stuart Bowen, found no criminal wrongdoing involved in the corps' use of the dummy vendor. "We do not believe … there was any attempt to mislead on the true status" of the contracting process, the audit said. Bowen was in Iraq and unavailable for comment.

The audit marks the second time in recent months that a government agency has been charged with accounting improprieties.

The U.S. Agency for International Development was accused in June of resorting to accounting tricks in an effort to hide the spiraling costs of a children's hospital in Iraq, a project that received special backing from First Lady Laura Bush.

San Francisco-based Bechtel, the chief contractor, was removed from the project after the inspector general determined that the cost to finish the hospital had soared from $50 million to almost $170 million.

Judge Dismisses Halliburton Suit (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

A federal judge in Texas yesterday threw out a lawsuit against Halliburton Co. that had been brought by survivors and the families of those killed when a fuel convoy was assaulted by insurgents outside Baghdad in April 2004.

The suit had claimed Halliburton bore responsibility because the company knew the proposed route was the scene of a pitched battle but decided to send the drivers anyway. U.S. District Judge Gray H. Miller ruled that the Army had played a key role in sending the convoy and that it was not his place to second-guess that decision.

"The contracts show that the Army, not the defendants, was responsible for the security of the convoys," he wrote.

Miller, appointed by President Bush, added that the court "cannot try a case set on a battlefield during war-time without an impermissible intrusion into powers expressly granted to the Executive by the Constitution."

T. Scott Allen Jr., who represented the plaintiffs in the case, said that logic gives Halliburton carte blanche in Iraq, where it has been the United States' largest contractor.

"We disagree with the court's decision and intend to appeal," Allen said. "The way I read this decision, anything Halliburton does in Iraq is not subject to oversight or review."

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who held a Democratic Policy Committee hearing on the truck drivers' claims on Monday, said he had similar concerns. "This appears to give very broad immunity to the contractor," Dorgan said. "That's an unfortunate result from the standpoint of the rights you would expect an American citizen to have. It's very troubling."

Halliburton denied wrongdoing in the case, and it had argued it could not be sued because it was operating under orders from the Army. The company issued a statement yesterday pointing to language in the ruling saying that the court could not hear the case because it "would have to substitute its judgment for that of the Army."

Since the war began, Halliburton has been the target of frequent criticism by Democrats, who feel the company benefited unfairly from its connections to the Bush administration. Much of that criticism has focused on charges that the firm, which was once run by Vice President Cheney, has earned lucrative profits in Iraq at the expense of taxpayers and soldiers.

The truck drivers' case was among the first to raise the question of whether Halliburton and its subsidiary KBR Inc. are doing enough to protect employees. KBR and its subcontractors have lost 91 employees to violence in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait.

This case revolved around an incident on April 9, 2004, when insurgents attacked a KBR fuel convoy, killing seven civilians and injuring at least seven more. Drivers who survived the attack, as well as other former Halliburton employees, later said the company should have known the convoy would face extreme danger because of intense fighting along the convoy route over the previous two days. Sean A. Larvenz, who was in a different Halliburton convoy that day, said he had warned his bosses about the fighting but that they sent the doomed convoy anyway.

"As long as trucks rolled," he told senators this week, "they got paid."

Afghanistan: Successes And Setbacks 5 Years Later (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

The Taliban: From 2002 to 2005, Taliban activity was relatively low. But in recent months Taliban and other insurgents have stepped up attacks, targeting U.S. and NATO troops and deploying new tactics. Last year, there were about 15 suicide attacks, compared with four in 2004, according to the State Department.

Public support for the Taliban appears low. Last year, 8% of Afghans said they had a favorable opinion of the Taliban, down from 13% the year before, according to Charney Research, New York.

Opium: Since the fall of the Taliban, annual opium production has reached record levels. This year more than 400,000 acres of Afghan land have been cultivated for opium poppy, up from 20,000 acres in 2001, according to the U.N.

While the government recognizes poppy production as a problem, it has been unwilling to unleash a campaign to eradicate the fields lest it go to war with the estimated 2.9 million people -- 12.6% of the population -- involved in opium cultivation.

FACTS

About 5.2 million Afghan children -- half the total number -- attend school, up from 800,000 in 2001. Of those, about 525,000 are girls, up from nearly zero in 2001.

Opium sales are expected to generate about $3 billion this year -- equivalent to about 35% of Afghanistan's GDP. This year a record 6,100 tons of opium have been produced -- 92% of world supply. That's up from 4,100 last year.

Afghanistan is one of the world's most heavily mined countries. It has as many as seven million mines. In 2004, there were 878 deaths from land mines, second behind Cambodia, according to Landmine Monitor.

Al Qaeda and Taliban in Afghanistan have been known to hide in a network of caves -- some up to 100 feet deep. Most were dug during the Soviet invasion in the 1980s.

More than 3,400 Iranian law-enforcement officers have died in clashes with armed drug traffickers along the Afghanistan-Iran border over the past 20 years, according to the U.S. State Department. Iran spends as much as $800 million every year on drug interdiction.

Afghanistan's military expenditures amount to about 12% of its GDP, according to the World Bank. Pakistan and the U.S. both spend about 4% of their GDP on the military. There are about 33,000 soldiers in the Afghan National Army, compared with about 619,000 in the Pakistan army.

POINTS OF VIEW

"Over the past year, our efforts to build Afghanistan into a stable, prosperous and democratic polity have encountered setbacks. We have seen terrorism rebounding as terrorists have infiltrated our borders to step up their murderous campaign against our people."

"If Afghanistan does not complete its democratic evolution and become a stable state, it's going to come back to haunt us."

--Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice

"It is clear that some of the terrorists, the spoilers think they can win in the south. They are wrong. Because they cannot win, they will not win."

--NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer

"I don't see a danger of NATO or the U.S. losing control entirely, but it's clear we're in for a prolonged struggle against the Taliban. If we're not ready for that, it's going to be a problem."

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 22 -- Insurgents ambushed a bus carrying construction workers in the country's volatile south Friday, killing 19 of the laborers, and Afghan and NATO forces said they killed 35 Taliban guerrillas in two firefights.

DOJ_NMG_0068053

The attack on the bus in Kandahar province began when a roadside bomb exploded near the vehicle, said Zemeri Bashary, the Interior Ministry spokesman. Some laborers may have been killed by the bomb, while others were shot by gunmen who subsequently opened fire, he said.

The attack occurred in Shorabak district, a remote area of Kandahar province that borders Pakistan about 110 miles south of Kandahar city. Southern Afghanistan has experienced a surge of violence this year, fueled by a resurgent Taliban and a growing drug trade.

In neighboring Uruzgan province, police officers killed 25 Taliban fighters in a battle in Chorah district, about 200 miles southwest of Kabul, according to the provincial police chief, Gen. Kasam Khan. One policeman was killed.

NATO forces and Afghan police officers also fought Taliban insurgents in nearby Helmand province, killing 10 of them, NATO said. One Afghan policeman was killed, said Ghulam Rasool, the Garmser district police chief.

Karzai Makes Appeal To Canadian Public (WP)

By Doug Struck

TORONTO, Sept. 22 -- Afghan President Hamid Karzai made a forceful argument Friday for keeping Canadian troops in his country, appealing to a Canadian public wavering over growing casualties and the rise in fighting there.

Speaking to a joint session of Parliament in Ottawa, Karzai repeated his call to take the fight to the border areas of Pakistan, where he said Taliban leaders have received money, assistance and shelter since being ousted from power in Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

"Unless we go to the roots of terrorism, to where they are trained, where they are equipped, where they get inspiration, the world will not be a safer place for all of us, Afghanistan nor any other country," he said.

Canada's 2,200 troops have taken the lead among NATO forces fighting the Taliban in southern Afghanistan. Thirty-six Canadian soldiers have been killed, and public support for Canada's role has dropped steadily. The public was stunned this week by the deaths of four soldiers targeted by a suicide bomber as they gave candy to children.

"There's a real, growing sense of futility and hopelessness that our best efforts in Afghanistan may not produce a positive result," said Frank Graves, president of EKOS Research in Ottawa. "Canadians are very gloomy about the mission."

More Canadians now oppose their country's military involvement there than support it, according to a poll conducted by EKOS for the Toronto Star. Five years ago, 62 percent of Canadians supported the mission. By last week, that figure had dropped to 38 percent in favor and 49 percent opposed, according to EKOS.

Karzai met on Friday with families of soldiers, and he repeatedly thanked Canadians for their help.

"They have sacrificed so we in Afghanistan may have security, and they have sacrificed to ensure the continued safety of their fellow Canadians from terrorism," he said of the fallen soldiers.

"The tragedy of September 11 showed in a terrible way the flaws of the argument against helping Afghanistan," he said. "It showed that the cost of ignoring Afghanistan was far higher than the cost of helping it."

Opponents of the military mission say that the Canadian people had expected a peacekeeping role in Afghanistan for their troops, who now find themselves in direct warfare for the first time since the Korean War.

"Something is fundamentally wrong with this mission," Jack Layton, head of the opposition New Democratic Party, said in an interview from Ottawa. "The path we are on right now does not seem to be working and does not seem to have any particular end in sight."

Layton's party has called for a withdrawal of Canadian troops by the end of February. Other opposition parties in Canada have demanded that the minority government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper devote less effort to the war and more to rebuilding Afghanistan.

Harper is not backing down. He said Friday that Canadian troops must honor a commitment to stay until at least 2009, and perhaps longer. "We never will leave until the work is done," Harper told a rally of supporters on Parliament Hill. He spent much of his maiden speech to the U.N. General Assembly on Thursday appealing for more help in the fight against the Afghan insurgents.

"The success of this mission is vital to the health and future of this organization," he said in New York. "This is the United Nations' strongest mission and therefore our greatest test. Our collective will and credibility are being judged."

Despite appeals by the United Nations and top NATO commanders for additional forces, other NATO countries have been slow to pledge help for the effort.

Afghan Girls, Back In The Shadows (WP)

By Pamela Constable

DOJ_NMG_0068054

SHEIKHABAD, Afghanistan -- In a small, sunlit parlor last week, 20 little girls seated on rush mats sketched a flower drawn on the blackboard. In a darker interior room, 15 slightly older girls memorized passages from the Koran, reciting aloud. Upstairs was a class of teenage girls, hidden from public view.

The location of the mud-walled home school is semi-secret. Its students include five girls who once attended another home school nearby that was torched three months ago. The very existence of home-based classes is a direct challenge to anti-government insurgents who have attacked dozens of schools across Afghanistan in the past year, especially those that teach girls.

"We are scared. All the home schools are scared. If I even hear a dog bark, I don't open the gate. I go up on the roof to see who is there," said Mohammed Sulieman, 49, who operates home schools for girls in several villages in the Sheikhabad district of Wardak province.

Children's education was once touted as an exceptional success in this struggling new democracy. Within two years of the 2001 overthrow of the Taliban, an extremist Islamic movement that banned girls' education and emphasized Islamic studies for boys, officials boasted that 5.1 million children of both sexes were enrolled in public schools. These included hundreds of village tent-schools erected by UNICEF.

Now that positive tide has come to a halt in several provinces where Taliban insurgents are aggressively battling NATO and U.S. troops, and has slowed dramatically in many other parts of the country. President Hamid Karzai told audiences in New York this week that about 200,000 Afghan children had been forced out of school this year by threats and physical attacks.

According to UNICEF, 106 attacks or threats against schools occurred from January to August, with incidents in 31 Afghan provinces. They included one missile attack, 11 explosions, 50 burnings and 37 threats. In the four southern provinces under serious assault by Taliban forces, UNICEF said, nearly half of the 748 schools have stopped operating.

"With all that the children of Afghanistan have gone through, to expose them to this kind of violence is appalling," Bernt Aasen, the UNICEF representative here, said in a recent statement. He warned that the country's progress in education could be reversed, adding that the attacks "undermine the very fabric of the future of Afghan society."

In the southern province of Kandahar, all schools are now closed in five districts. Attackers have thrown hand grenades through school windows and threatened to throw acid on girls who attend school. In neighboring Helmand province, a high school principal was beheaded, a teacher was killed by gunmen on motorbikes, and half a dozen schools were burned by arsonists. Three districts in the province have closed all their schools.

During the 1990s, a decade of civil conflict and religious repression, education stagnated across Afghanistan. Many teachers fled the country, and many middle-class families educated their children abroad. For those who remained behind, especially in rural areas, public education became virtually inaccessible, especially for girls. In some areas, female literacy fell to less than 1 percent.

Today, most Afghans appear eager to make up for lost time. Their thirst for knowledge is strong, although public education remains controversial for girls in many rural areas, especially once they reach puberty and are barred by custom from mixing socially with boys. In northern provinces, where the Taliban threat is minimal and tribal customs tend to be more modern, many communities have welcomed foreign offers to build schools for girls.

One such community is the tiny village of Mollai in Parwan province, a lush but impoverished region of rushing streams and green, terraced fields. This summer, the U.S. Army built an eight-room elementary school for 300 girls in Mollai -- the first ever in the area. During a recent visit by a reporter to the third-grade class, every student in the room said she was the first girl in her family to attend public school.

"There are still a few parents who don't want their daughters to come, but we keep talking to them until we satisfy them," said the teacher, Mahmad Agul, 25. "We lack everything here -- paved roads, electrical power, deep wells, clinics. But this school was our highest priority."

Gul Khanum, 11, said her parents were farmers who could not read, but that she hoped one day to become a doctor. Nazia, 10, stood to recite in Pashto a poem about nature, speaking nervously but without a hitch. Afterward, she said she had learned to read at home but had not attended school before.

"Before, we were just sitting in the dust," she said. "Now we have desks and chairs and a roof. This is much better."

In the remote and rugged northwest provinces, the international nonprofit agency Save the Children has been working closely with education officials to promote schooling for girls. Its field workers sponsor mobile lending libraries and meet with parents to talk about the benefits of having girls stay in school, delay marriage and produce fewer children.

"Every kid in Afghanistan has been affected by conflict, but you still have to try and educate them. It can't just stop," said Leslie Wilson, who directs the Afghan office of Save the Children. In Sar-e Pol province, she said, there are three times more girls in school than there were three years ago. "It's still a drop in the bucket, but it's progress," she said.

Where public schools are either too distant or too dangerous for girls to attend, hundreds of communities have turned to private home schools, many of them sponsored by the nonprofit Swedish Committee for Afghanistan. During the Taliban era, the committee operated inconspicuous home schools in many provinces. With the revival of the Taliban threat, they are again becoming an important alternative.

In the central province of Wardak, the main highway was crowded last week with boys on bicycles traveling back and forth to a large high school. But school officials said not even they were safe from attack now. In one village hidden among the brown, rocky hills, the only boys' school was heavily damaged by a bomb six months ago, and teachers said some students had stopped attending.

"It happened at three in the morning," said Syed Hassan, 46, a math teacher. "When we came running, the windows were all shattered and the pages of books were scattered on the ground, even our holy Korans.

"If our people do not get educated, it will be a disaster for our country," he added. "We see how far ahead other countries are getting, and we are just falling farther behind."

To keep girls in class, many villages in Wardak have opened home schools, but despite security precautions, some of them have come under attack. Sulieman, who is also the headmaster of a boys' high school, took a journalist to visit several home schools where girls were studying Pashto, Islamic subjects, art and math.

In one village, a three-room home school was crammed with students, but another had recently closed after being attacked by arsonists. Officials said five girls had switched to the first school but the others had stopped attending altogether.

Sulieman said the arson was not necessarily the work of insurgents, noting that there are intense rivalries for contracts to run home schools now and that sometimes "personal enmities" lead to violence.

But he said the Taliban threat also existed and that he had used various strategies to keep his home school safe.

"Once I was walking late in my village, when three Taliban came along and warned me to stop educating girls," he said. "I told them the Koran says girls should be educated as well as boys, and that my school was teaching young girls to memorize the Koran and pray five times a day. They seemed convinced, and went on their way."

Operation Medusa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

In the war on terror, few battles are as clear and decisive as the one fought these last few weeks in southern Afghanistan. Six thousand Canadian, British, American and other NATO troops trounced resurgent Taliban fighters who dared to fight in the open. "Operation Medusa" dislodged insurgents from trenches and tunnels near Kandahar, killing a thousand or more.

The intensity of the fighting surprised some NATO allies, who this summer took over the lead in southern Afghanistan from the U.S. More tests are to come. The insurgents will surely regroup, shun direct engagements with Western troops and resort to the ad hoc terrorism perfected in Iraq. To adapt NATO's nomenclature, the Medusa was injured but the snakes are very much alive.

The battle in the south is not a sign, as some would have it, that Afghanistan has been lost. With U.S. forces tracking al Qaeda along the border with Pakistan and the Kabul government slow to assert itself, a security and political vacuum emerged in that region. In stepped drug lords, former Taliban fighters and tribal chiefs who have little in common except a large stake in continued instability.

Narcotics money and lax Pakistani border control let the Taliban rearm and recruit new fighters. Some schools for girls, a great achievement in post-Taliban Afghanistan, were forced to close. Local chiefs backed the Taliban, while a population who had high expectations for the future turned against Kabul and the West.

In response, NATO this summer doubled the number of troops in country -- to 20,000 -- and moved in. Their first task was to reclaim the ground. In tribal societies, local people want to know who's going to win before choosing sides. Many Afghans questioned NATO's stomach for the fight. The conclusion of Medusa goes a way to ease those doubts.

Afghanistan will take patience and commitment, neither of which is abundant in Western capitals. Yet one feels compelled to counter prevailing fatalism and state the obvious: This is a success story. After 30 years of war that sent Afghanistan back to the Middle Ages, most of the country is now at peace. President Hamid Karzai is widely popular and the government democratically elected. More than four million people forced from their homes by war are back since the U.S. toppled the Taliban in late 2001. The economy grew 14% in 2005. Six million children are in school and 50 independent parties are registered.

These achievements are real, but not irreversible. The troubles in the south highlight the threat to the authority of the central government from rising narco-terrorism. Local mob bosses and warlords want to control chunks of the country, seeing Pakistan's unruly tribal regions as a model. In league with the drug mafia, which wants Kabul out of their way, a small number of people with money can buy a lot of trouble. Marine General James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, estimates the number of core Taliban fighters at up to 4,000. But many of those killed in the last weeks were bodies for hire.

The booming drug trade, notes General Jones, is "at the core of everything that can go wrong in Afghanistan." It's hard to argue with his analysis. Half the country's national wealth is estimated to come from drugs; nine-tenths, and rising, of the world's illegal opium supply originates in Afghanistan. Any sensible response would begin with better-paid police deployed in higher numbers in the hinterlands, backed up by less-corrupt local government directly answerable to Kabul. Past experience in Latin America suggests that any crackdown, aided by foreign troops in country, is better focused on drug kingpins rather than poor subsistence farmers.

Changes come slowly in a country this big and backward. "The situation is not lost by any means," Ashraf Ghani, former finance minister and a candidate to become U.N. Secretary-General, told us yesterday. "But it requires a commitment of five to 15 years" -- which seems like an eternity to Western politicians focused on the next election. Bear in mind that the nation-building project in Bosnia is about to enter its 12th year. The world spends $679 a year per Bosnian, versus $57 in Afghanistan -- a bargain.

This month's southern campaign was the first extended ground battle in NATO's 57 years. The 1999 Kosovo war was limited to the air; even then the alliance barely held together. Afghanistan is sure to be harder. Canada has already lost 28 soldiers this year. As Internet and TV consumers, al Qaeda and the Taliban know our weak spots: Their attacks are intended to sour publics and force democratic politicians to bring the troops home.

The Canadians, Danes and British aren't budging, but some others are spooked. With the battle raging in the south, Germany and France refused to allow their troops stationed elsewhere in Afghanistan to lend a hand. In response, General Jones made a remarkable plea for 2,500 reinforcements and equipment.

More troops are on the way, thanks to contributions from recent NATO members Poland and Romania. Skimpy European defense budgets make it harder to find the 18 helicopters and three C-130 transport planes the general wants. Afghans of all stripes will be watching next week's NATO defense ministers' meeting in Slovenia, which will formally take up this request, for signs of the Alliance's staying power. More than Afghanistan's future is on the line. So is the credibility of the world's oldest political-military bloc.

Rumsfeld Favors A New Africa Command (AFP)

AFP, September 23, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he favors setting up a separate command to oversee US military operations and relations in Africa.

"Pete and I are for it," Rumsfeld said, referring to General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"We've been pushing and pushing for six months and trying to get the system to come up with the details as to how it would be done," he said.

One key decision that is yet to be made is whether the command would be on par with other combatant commands for Europe, the Middle East, Asia Pacific, Latin America and North America.

Pace, who joined Rumsfeld at a meeting with Pentagon employees, said another alternative was to set it up under the US European Command, which currently has responsibility for most of Africa as well as Europe.

The US military has given greater attention to Africa in recent years amid concerns that extremist groups are seeking to exploit areas outside governments' control.

More War Veterans Suffering From Stress (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press

AP, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- More than one-third of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans seeking medical treatment from the Veterans Health Administration report symptoms of stress or other mental disorders -- a tenfold increase in the last 18 months, according to an agency study.

The dramatic jump in cases -- coming as more troops face multiple tours in Iraq and Afghanistan -- has triggered concern among some veterans groups that the agency may not be able to meet the demand. They say veterans have had to deal with long waits for doctor appointments, staffing shortages and lack of equipment at medical centers run by the Veterans Affairs Department.

Contributing to the higher levels of stress are the long and often repeated tours in Iraq and Afghanistan. In Iraq, troops also face unpredictable daily attacks and roadside bombings as they battle the stubborn insurgency.

Veterans and Defense Department officials said the increase in soldiers complaining of stress or mental disorder symptoms also may suggest that efforts to reduce the stigma of such problems are working and that commanders and medical personnel are more adept at recognizing symptoms.

"It's definitely better than it was in past generations," said Paul Rieckhoff, executive director of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America.

Veterans Affairs officials say they have increased funding for mental health services, have hired at least 100 more counselors and are not overwhelmed by the rising demands.

"We're not aware that people are having trouble getting services from us in any consistent way or pattern around the country," said Dr. Michael Kussman, acting undersecretary for health and top doctor at the VA.

Nearly 64,000 of the more than 184,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans who have sought VA health care were diagnosed with potential symptoms of post-traumatic stress, drug abuse or other mental disorders as of the end of June, according to the latest report by the Veterans Health Administration.

Of those, close to 30,000 had possible post-traumatic stress disorder, said the report.

The Government Accountability Office reported in February 2005 that just 6,400 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans had been treated for stress disorders. The office is an investigative agency of Congress.

Kussman said the numbers of people reporting symptoms of stress probably represent a "gross overestimation" of those actually suffering from a mental health disorder. Most of the troops who return from Iraq have "normal reactions to abnormal situations," such as flashbacks or trouble sleeping, Kussman said.

He said the returning Iraq and Afghanistan veterans represent just 3.5 percent of the more than 5 million people seen by the VA each year.

The VA, he said, has targeted $300 million for post-traumatic stress disorders for 2005-06, and is seeking another $300 million for 2007.

VA facilities largely serve veterans who have ended their military service, but some National Guard and Reserve members returning from the war are using VA facilities because they are closer to their homes.

While veterans groups don't have data on the number of veterans encountering problems with the VA, they said veterans are reporting long delays for appointments at the agency's medical centers.

"If they're going to keep recruiting anywhere near where they need to be, they'd better take care of the young vets, because everyone is watching," Rieckhoff said.

One soldier in Virginia Beach, Va., said he was having a hard time sleeping after he returned from Iraq, and was told he'd have to wait two-and-a-half months for an appointment at the VA facility, said Rieckhoff.

Rieckhoff said the Buffalo, N.Y., veterans medical center gave his organization a "wish list" of needed supplies and other expenses, including wheelchairs, rehabilitation equipment and medical monitors.

"If the VA is going to see 30 percent of the 1.5 million U.S. service members who have deployed to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the VA may expect a total of 450,000 veteran patients from these two wars," said Paul Sullivan, director of programs for the Vietnam Veterans of America Foundation. "This is a very ominous trend, indicating a tidal wave of new patients coming in, and the numbers could go up."

The Defense Department has made mental health assessments and education programs mandatory for active-duty service members returning from the war. There are several dozen combat stress teams working with military units to prevent and identify stress or other mental health issues.

The department has also put a self-assessment screening on the Internet so military members can evaluate their symptoms.

Dr. Joyce Adkins, the Pentagon's director of stress management programs, said there has been a slight increase in the number of service members reporting mental health problems or symptoms.

"We've done a lot of education for service members at multiple times, to help them understand ... the common problems associated with deployment, the symptoms they might experience and what that might mean," she said.

New York City's Reservists Are Asked To Return Iraq Pay (NYT)

By Andy Newman

When they were called up for military service in the wake of 9/11, hundreds of uniformed city workers in the Reserves faced the suspension of their city health and pension benefits. The city offered them an option: it would keep paying their salaries and continue their benefits, but when they returned they would have to repay the city their city salary or their military pay, whichever was less.

On its face, the offer made sense. And many reservists had only a few days to get their affairs together before shipping out — hardly enough time to consult accountants. Nearly all took the deal. As the war dragged on, more than 1,600 city employees, mostly police officers, signed up for the benefits program.

Now the bills from the city are coming due, for far more than many veterans imagined they would have to pay — as much as $200,000 — and often for more money than they ever received.

The city is demanding that the veterans repay their gross salaries, even though they never saw about a third of the money, which went for taxes and other deductions. The commissioner of administrative services, Martha K. Hirst, said veterans should be able to get back the difference between gross and take-home pay by amending their tax returns. But several tax accountants said the city had created an accounting quagmire.

David Gitel, a tax accountant in Manhattan, said that if the employees paid the money back over several years — which many will have to do — rather than in a lump sum, they could lose thousands of dollars in income-tax and social security payments.

"It's an interesting experience," Mr. Gitel said.

For now, the Police Department, which waited as much as four years to begin asking for the money back in the spring, is stepping up its collection efforts. On Thursday, hundreds of officers received letters in their pay envelopes threatening legal action if they did not make repayment arrangements within 15 days.

A city official, who was unwilling to be identified lest he incur his colleagues' anger, gave an explanation for the delay. "People have been talking about it here for some time, about getting around to doing it," he said. "It's probably the hero thing. Why make a top priority of telling somebody to give back money when they just went off to war?"

Under the terms of the deal, nontaxable military housing and food allowances also count as military pay. Those allowances can nearly double military pay, in some cases making it more than city pay. Many veterans who did not read the fine print said they thought they would have to repay only their modest military take-home base salary.

On Monday, the City Council will consider a resolution to ask Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg to stop counting military allowances as income.

Assistant Police Chief Michael Collins said that after the letters went out on Thursday, many officers contacted the department to begin repayment. The department hopes to recover more than $15 million, he said.

Other officers said the system needed to be overhauled. "We have to change it," Detective David Goodman, treasurer of the Police Department post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said at a gathering on Tuesday of about 50 officers at the Army base at Fort Hamilton in Brooklyn, "so that when you come back you're not paying money for having gone to war for your country."

Detective Goodman added that since the war effort relies increasingly on reservists, it behooved the city to make enlistment attractive.

Ms. Hirst said the city was "looking at" the possibility of not counting military stipends as income, but she thought that in any case the benefits program was an excellent one.

"The city works out very, very friendly repayment agreements," she said.

Many officers said the four-year delay had reinforced their impression that the city did not intend to come after them for the money at all.

Officer Jake Marino, a five-year police veteran who was in the Military Police in Iraq in 2004, recalled that while he was preparing to go, his contact in the department's military-leave office told him, "As far as paying back the money, I don't think you have anything to worry about."

Many officers put one of their two salaries right in the bank, and some used it to make up for the loss of overtime pay. Others who started out saving the excess began to spend it when they did not hear from the city as time went by.

"Like most middle-class Americans," said Michael Donohue, a police sergeant, "you get a windfall, you fix the roof and the sidewalk and pay off credit-card debt." Sergeant Donohue, a command sergeant major in the Army Reserves who spent much of last year at Abu Ghraib, estimated that he owed the city $100,000.

The benefits plan was intended to let employees keep the larger of the two salaries. An officer paid $80,000 by the city and $60,000 by the military would owe the city $60,000 upon his return. And an employee paid $80,000 by the military and $60,000 by the city would also owe the city $60,000.

Administrative Services officials said that employees who pay the money back in a lump sum get an amended federal W2 tax form for the year they drew two salaries and would be able to get a full refund of the excess taxes they paid.

Employees who pay the money back by payroll deduction, though, could deduct the money from their income only in the year in which they pay it back, officials said.

This causes two problems, said Mr. Gitel, the tax accountant. One is that an employee would probably be in a higher tax bracket during the year she drew two salaries than when she paid the money back. The other problem, Mr. Gitel said, was that there was no way for the employee to get back the extra Medicare and Social Security contributions she made while drawing two salaries. These shortfalls could easily total $10,000, he said.

An Administrative Services official said last night that the city had just obtained commitments from accounting firms to provide free advice to veterans.

The city could have set its plan up differently. The state has a similar plan for its employees, but it pays them the difference, if any, between their military and state salaries, so they do not have to pay anything back. The state employees' contributions to their pension accounts are not made while they are on leave, but the much larger state contribution is still made.

Laurence A. Levy, deputy counsel to Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani in 2001, said the city's method seemed a better way to protect the employees' benefits. "In Operation Desert Storm, many of the families didn't get health benefits, and it caused tremendous financial hardship," he said. "We wanted to keep them whole."

Sergeant Donohue said he appreciated the city's good intentions. "We're not asking for a pity party or a handout," he said. "But maybe there's a little more reasonable way for them to be approaching this."

Aide To Attorney General Is Interim U.S. Attorney (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

The Justice Department yesterday appointed Jeffrey A. Taylor, the counselor to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, to be U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

Taylor succeeds Kenneth L. Wainstein in running the largest U.S. attorney's office in the country. For now, Taylor will be interim U.S. attorney; President Bush can nominate him to take the job, subject to Senate confirmation.

Wainstein was confirmed by the Senate on Thursday to a new post in the Justice Department, assistant attorney general for national security, after his nomination had been held up for months by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). Levin had been seeking FBI documents relating to its agents' concerns about mistreatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay while Wainstein was a top aide to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

Taylor could begin his new job as early as next week.

Before working for Gonzales in the Justice Department, Taylor was counsel to the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee from 1999 to 2002, working on such issues as criminal law, terrorism and national security. Previously, he was federal prosecutor in San Diego from 1995 to 1999. Several prosecutors in Washington said they looked forward to working with him because of his reputation and his line prosecutor experience.

"Jeff is a dedicated public servant and a valued advisor," Gonzales said in a statement released by the Justice Department. "He will continue to be an asset to the Department of Justice in his new capacity as U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia."

In an internal memo to the staff at the U.S. attorney's office, Wainstein yesterday hailed Taylor as "the real deal -- a proven and strong prosecutor."

Taylor was a law clerk for Chief Justice John C. Mowbray of the Supreme Court of Nevada from 1991 to 1992 and then worked for three years in private practice. He graduated from Harvard Law School and received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Chairman Out At HP; CEO Takes Position (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi, Washington Post Staff Writers

Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia C. Dunn resigned yesterday and was replaced by chief executive Mark V. Hurd, who apologized for what he called "very disturbing" improprieties in an internal media leak probe that has prompted criminal and congressional investigations.

In an eight-minute statement, Hurd for the first time tried to explain his role in the scandal while taking responsibility to "set it right." He offered few details of his personal knowledge of the internal investigation .

Hurd said nothing about the use of false pretenses to obtain personal phone records. He said he was aware of a bogus e-mail sent to a reporter, but did not recall approving the use of software to trace where that message was sent subsequently.

Hurd, whose voice cracked several times, acknowledged that a report summarizing the probe was addressed to him, but said he did not read it. "I could have, and I should have," he said at a news conference at HP's Palo Alto, Calif., headquarters.

Hurd said he had hired a law firm to conduct "a more comprehensive investigation" and report directly to him on what occurred in the HP probe that started in 2005 and focused on identifying who was leaking company secrets to the news media.

Hurd, who took no questions, said he would voluntarily join Dunn in testifying about the leak probe before the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee on Thursday. The panel is looking into HP's investigative tactics, which documents have shown included plans to plant spies in newsrooms, trail reporters and board members, and obtain personal phone records using the Social Security numbers of journalists and directors. Company e-mails obtained by The Washington Post this week showed that Hurd was aware of and approved elements of a plan to give phony information to a reporter to try to identify her anonymous source for articles about HP.

The revelations have tarnished the Silicon Valley computer company's reputation and worried analysts who monitor its business prospects. California's attorney general has said he has enough evidence to file criminal complaints on people inside and outside Hewlett-Packard. The FBI also is investigating the case.

Dunn said earlier this month that she would resign as chairman in January and would remain on the board of directors. But yesterday she was forced out and left the board entirely. "I continue to have the best interests of HP at heart and thus I have accepted the board's request to resign," Dunn said in a written statement.

Analysts said Hurd's challenge in the face of the widening scandal was to reassure the business community that he could remain an effective leader even as the company cooperates with two criminal investigations and a congressional probe. Analysts were divided on whether he pulled it off at the news conference.

"The overall tenor of the discussion was, 'I am in charge,' " said Tim Bajarin, president of Creative Strategies Inc. Hurd will likely face stiff questioning next week by the congressional subcommittee, which is eager to learn how much Hurd knew of the leak probe and when he knew it, analysts said.

Hurd said he "understood there was an investigation into leaks from the board" and that in July 2005, he attended "a brief portion of a meeting" at which results from the first phase of the leak probe were discussed. In January 2006, Hurd said Dunn asked "to use HP resources to investigate the leaks."

"In, I believe, February 2006, I was informed by the investigation team that they intended to send an e-mail containing false information in an effort to identify the source of the leaks," he said. "I was asked to, and did approve the naming convention that was used in the content of that e-mail."

He continued: "I do not recall seeing, nor do I recall approving, the use of tracer technology," he said, referring to the plan by HP's investigators to embed tracing technology in the e-mail to track where the reporter subsequently sent the message.

A lawyer retained by HP to review the leak probe also mentioned the e-mail tracer. "The concept of sending the misinformation to the reporter and the content of the misinformation to be contained in the message . . . was approved by Mark Hurd," said Michael J. Holston of the San Francisco law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP, who also attended the news conference. "We have found no evidence that he was asked to approve the use of the tracer."

Computer crime law has not caught up with technology, legal experts said, and it is unclear whether embedding tracer technology in an e-mail message is a crime.

"As of today, we still do not have all the facts," Hurd said. "I also cannot guarantee that we will ever be able to obtain all of the information . . . due to its complexity and number of people involved."

He said that the probe in 2005 yielded no results. HP started another leak investigation in January.

"While many of the right processes were in place, they unfortunately broke down and no one in the management chain, including me, caught them," Hurd said.

Hurd, 49, was brought on in April 2005 after another HP imbroglio involving then-chairman Carly Fiorina, who clashed with the board after HP's tumultuous merger with Compaq Computer Corp., resulting in her ouster. Hurd, the former chief executive at NCR Corp., moved quickly to establish himself as a leader, slashing expenses and eliminating more than 15,000 jobs.

On Sept. 8, Hurd hired Morgan, Lewis & Bockius to review the HP leak probe. Morgan Lewis lawyer Holston said yesterday that he has collected more than 1 million pages of documents.

Holston said those involved in HP's leak probe had "provided assurances" to HP senior investigators early this year that the investigative techniques being used were legal. He said those providing assurances included Kevin Hunsaker, HP's senior counsel and ethics director, and a Boston firm hired by HP.

He said in February, outside investigators "may have conducted a search of individuals' trash." But at this time, he said, "we do not know who the targets of these efforts were."

Dawn Kawamoto, the CNet.com reporter who was sent the e-mail with tracer technology, expressed anger at the firm. "At first I was stunned," she said, when she was alerted by California investigators that her phone records may have been obtained by subterfuge. "When it was confirmed, I was furious."

"It's like the golden rule," she said. "Had we journalists in general done the same thing to the executives, the directors of HP, I'm sure they would have gone ballistic."

At the news conference, Hurd addressed all the targets of HP's surveillance. "On behalf of HP, I extend my sincere apologies to those journalists who were investigated and everyone who was impacted."

Leak Proof H-P's Hurd Admits 'Disturbing' Tactics Were Used In Probe (WSJ)

CEO Says He Is Accountable, But Big Questions Remain; Chairman Dunn Resigns Two Employees to Leave Firm

See Corrections & Amplifications item below.

PALO ALTO, Calif. -- In an admission remarkable in the annals of U.S business, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Mark Hurd described how the respected Silicon Valley titan employed a series of tawdry tactics in its effort to trace leaks from its board.

Making his first extensive public remarks since the H-P leak scandal broke more than two weeks ago, Mr. Hurd on Friday also said Chairman Patricia Dunn, who had launched and overseen the probe, had resigned and left the board. Mr. Hurd, who had planned to inherit her title in January, assumed the title. A person familiar with the matter said two other employees closely associated with the probe are leaving the company.

But Mr. Hurd, who took no questions during brief remarks to journalists at H-P's suburban-office-park headquarters, also left many issues unaddressed. While acknowledging that investigators used "disturbing" tactics, he failed to explain how the company had let the probe veer so far off track.

He offered apologies to H-P board members, journalists and others for violating their privacy, but confirmed only a few details about the tactics employed and when he knew them. The investigation to plug the leaks used a range of extraordinary tactics, including obtaining private phone records using false pretenses and tailing both a director and a reporter for The Wall Street Journal. Another reporter, for CNET News.com, was sent a doctored email by H-P investigators that could provide the sender information about where it was sent.

While taking responsibility for the matter, Mr. Hurd also depicted himself as playing a limited role in a probe run by Ms. Dunn and the board. He admitted to attending only a brief portion of a July 2005 meeting on the probe and said he was aware of a plan to plant a phony news tip in an email to a reporter in 2006, though he said he did not approve the use of email "tracer" technology that could show if the document was forwarded to a source.

He said that in March 2006 he received a verbal and written summary of the probe. But, he said, "I did not read it. I could have, and I should have."

Mr. Hurd's appearance was partly aimed at getting ahead of a hearing Thursday before the House Energy and Commerce committee, which is investigating the H-P probe. He, Ms. Dunn and others are scheduled to testify, and are likely to face intense questioning on the many unanswered questions.

Mr. Hurd also reiterated a point he has made all along: that board leaks are harmful, and that it was Ms. Dunn's job to expose them. "The intent of the investigation was absolutely proper and appropriate," he said. But the "tactics do not reflect the values of H-P." H-P's code of conduct, he said, "unfortunately broke down, and no one in the management chain, including me, caught it."

"What began with an investigation with the best intentions," he said, "has ended up turning in a direction we could not have possibly anticipated."

After Mr. Hurd spoke, Michael J. Holston, of the law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP, provided new details of the prominent role played in the leak investigation by H-P subcontractors. But while identifying some of the employees who were involved -- including general counsel Ann Baskins -- he left their involvement and fates unclear.

Mr. Hurd said Morgan Lewis was hired on Sept. 8 to conduct an independent review of its leak probe. By hiring the firm -- which Mr. Hurd stressed reported to him, not H-P's board of directors -- the H-P CEO seemed to be distancing himself from the board and from the company's longtime outside counsel, Larry Sonsini, with the firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. H-P had said in an earlier public filing that its board retained Wilson Sonsini to investigate the leak probe. A spokeswoman said Mr. Sonsini was unavailable for comment.

The revelations -- and Ms. Dunn's resignation -- capped a week in which it increasingly became clear that H-P had lost control of its crisis management. Its shares, which have risen sharply under Mr. Hurd's tenure and had been unaffected through much of the crisis, fell more than 5% Thursday as investors fretted that H-P's CEO could be dragged deeper into the scandal.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange trading Friday, shares were up 24 cents at $35.11. In after-hours trading, H-P shares rose 32 cents, to $35.43. Mr. Hurd spoke after markets closed.

While praising Ms. Dunn, Mr. Hurd made it clear he viewed her resignation as necessary given facts about the investigation that are coming to light. Mr. Holston, in one new development, said Ms. Dunn for the first month or so of the probe worked directly with an outside private investigator, without involving H-P's security or legal departments.

In a statement, Ms. Dunn said she followed "proper processes" by seeking the assistance of H-P security personnel. "I did not select the people who conducted the investigation, which was undertaken after consultation with board members," she said.

She said she did not propose the specific methods of the investigation, noting she was a subject of the probe and had her own phone records examined. "Unfortunately, the people H-P relied upon to conduct this type of investigation let me and the company down," she said.

Her attorney, Jim Brosnahan, said Ms. Dunn had earlier "said that, if at any time the board felt that she should resign, she would do it....There came a time when the board thought she should step down." He said her resignation didn't indicate she did anything wrong.

H-P had hoped to resolve the mounting crisis on Sept. 12 by mollifying two directors aggrieved by the snooping: longtime H-P director George Keyworth and Thomas Perkins, the prominent venture capitalist who quit the board in May in protest over the leak investigation. In a complex agreement brokered in marathon meetings, Mr. Keyworth resigned from the board, while Ms. Dunn agreed to give up the chairmanship to Mr. Hurd in January but remain a director.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer discusses13 the ongoing H-P probe, saying there is no evidence yet that links CEO Mark Hurd to the alleged crimes but the investigation continues.

But the air didn't clear as the media provided further information about H-P's leak investigation. The company said little. Media reports suggested H-P executives were more involved in the leak probe than H-P indicated and that H-P employees had warned that the probe's methods might be illegal. This past week, more focus was given to the role of Mr. Hurd, who had largely appeared above the fray, as internal emails revealed that he played an active role in the investigation.

Mr. Hurd's role stirred concern among investors because he is widely credited with leading a turnaround in H-P's fortunes. "I can't tell you I feel any more confident that he will or won't be [implicated]," said one of those investors, Peter Goldman, portfolio manager with Chicago Asset Management Co., on Friday. Mr. Goldman said that he was encouraged that company owned up to its actions, but he felt as if H-P said all the things investors already knew. "I think it's sad, because it's a good story," he said. "I hope Mark stays."

Late Friday, Mr. Perkins, the former director, issued a statement saying, "I would like to thank Pattie Dunn for stepping aside, allowing Mark Hurd to lead and HP to move on."

According to Messrs. Hurd and Holston, H-P began investigating suspected leaks by directors after a January 2005 article in the Journal that disclosed the board was unhappy with then-CEO Carly Fiorina. The board ousted her in February, naming Ms. Dunn chairman.

Ms. Dunn, Mr. Holston said Friday, contacted an outside contractor near Boston, a security firm named Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. run by Ronald R. DeLia, with which H-P had a longstanding contractual relationship. Ms. Dunn dealt directly with Mr. Delia, Mr. Holston said, to seek the source of leaks to the Journal, Business Week and The New York Times. H-P's own security officials two months later joined the probe, which was inconclusive, Mr. Holston said.

The now-controversial tactics have been documented most clearly in 2006 with a new phase of the investigation. Security Outsourcing began gathering private phone records of directors and reporters through false pretenses, called "pretexting," said Mr. Holston. The pretexting was the subject of a Sept. 6 story in the Journal, after which H-P came under criminal investigation by federal and California authorities.

Mr. Holston said Security Outsourcing was responsible for conducting surveillance on an unnamed H-P board member and journalist, as well as arranging to acquire phone call and fax records for two current H-P employees, seven current or former board members or their family members and nine journalists.

The phone records were obtained through pretexting, he said. To obtain the phone record information, Mr. Holston said SOS acquired social-security numbers of H-P employees. But he didn't explain who obtained those numbers. He also said he found no evidence any H-P employee authorized pretexting.

SOS gave the social security numbers to another firm, Action Research Group, in Melbourne, Fla., Mr. Holston said. Mr. DeLia didn't return a telephone call seeking comment. Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research, said this past week his attorney had instructed him not to speak to the news media.

According to Mr. Holston, SOS arranged to have investigators in January tail a board member to see if the person met up with a journalist. Investigators later followed the board member to Boulder, Colo., in early 2006, and conducted surveillance on the board member's family back in California.

Investigators also conducted "feasibility studies" of placing undercover operatives in the San Francisco offices of the Journal and CNET to gather information, Mr. Holston said. But H-P said there is no indication the plan was carried out.

Mr. Hurd and Mr. Holston's presentation made no mention of what would happen to the people who carried out the probe. That probe, internally code-named KONA, involved H-P employees Tony Gentilucci, manager of its global security investigation unit; Kevin Hunsaker, H-P's ethics lawyer; Jim Fairbaugh, H-P's director of global security; Vincent Nye, a member of the global-security unit; and Ms. Baskins.

A person familiar with the matter said Mr. Gentilucci and Mr. Hunsaker "are in the process of leaving the company." Ms. Baskins relied on the legal opinions provided her by Mr. Hunsaker, a lawyer, this person said. Mr. Gentilucci did not return calls seeking comment. Mr. Hunsaker could not be reached.

Mr. Hurd said H-P has appointed Bart M. Schwartz, a former U.S. prosecutor, as counsel to perform an independent review of investigative methods and to make future recommendations for implementing best practices. He will report to Mr. Hurd and to Bob Wayman, H-P's chief financial officer. As part of the changes, H-P said director Richard Hackborn will immediately become independent lead director, accelerating a move that was to have taken place in January.

The pretexting activities have left H-P and some employees and contractors open to possible criminal and civil actions under federal and state laws, said attorneys and other legal experts. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said that his agency's investigation of pretexting at H-P has turned up enough evidence to charge individuals inside and outside of the company with crimes. No one has yet been charged.

Chairwoman Leaves Hewlett In Spying Furor (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Matt Richtel

PALO ALTO, Calif., Sept. 22 — The furor over Hewlett-Packard's spying operation claimed its highest-ranking victim on Friday with the immediate resignation of its chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn.

The move was announced by Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, who will now succeed her. But even as he offered an account of an investigation gone awry, and offered apologies to those whose privacy was invaded, he made it clear that many questions had yet to be answered.

His voice shaking, Mr. Hurd said a review of the means used to trace leaks from the company's board had produced "very disturbing" findings. He also conceded that "I could have, and I should have," read a report prepared for him while the operation was under way.

The investigators' zeal led them into a shadowy world of surveillance, and in the end the giant computer company was embarrassed by its own use of technology.

Two executives who supervised the effort were also reported to be leaving.

In addition to direct surveillance, the operation entailed the use of possibly illegal methods to obtain phone records of board members, journalists and others; an attempt to place software on a reporter's computer to track e-mail; and a study of the use of clerical workers and cleaners to infiltrate two news organizations.

At a news conference at Hewlett-Packard's headquarters here, Mr. Hurd said it had been proper and necessary for Ms. Dunn to try to stem leaks of confidential information. But he added, "While many of the right processes were in place, they unfortunately broke down, and no one in the management chain, including me, caught them."

It was the company's first public discussion of the revelations that have engulfed it for more than two weeks. Mr. Hurd took no questions, with the company saying he did not want to pre-empt his testimony next week to a House subcommittee looking into the Hewlett-Packard affair.

In a statement provided by Hewlett-Packard, Ms. Dunn said she had resigned at the request of the board. But she said that while she had the responsibility to identify the source of leaks, "I did not propose the specific methods," and those who performed the investigation "let me and the company down."

According to people briefed on Mr. Hurd's plans, Kevin T. Hunsaker, its senior counsel and director of ethics, and Anthony R. Gentilucci, its Boston-based manager of global investigations, will leave the company. Mr. Hurd did not speak to this issue, and the company declined to comment.

Some industry analysts had expected Hewlett-Packard to announce more directly who it felt was responsible, inside or outside the company.

"A lot of us thought there was going to be a lot more," said Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, senior associate dean of the Yale School of Management. But he added that Mr. Hurd apparently felt he needed more time to understand all that occurred.

The initial reaction of investors appeared favorable. In after-hours trading, Hewlett-Packard's stock was up more than 1 percent.

The effort to find the source of the boardroom leak began in early 2005, around the time of Carleton S. Fiorina's dismissal as chairwoman and chief executive, and yielded inconclusive results that year. A second phase began in January 2006, as an account of a senior management meeting was being prepared by the online technology news service CNET.

By May, the investigative efforts had identified one board member, George A. Keyworth II, as a source of unauthorized disclosures. He refused an initial request to resign, but another director, Thomas J. Perkins, quit over the investigation. It was Mr. Perkins's attempt to get the company to acknowledge the reasons for his resignation that brought the entire operation — and deep animosities within the board — into public view early this month.

On Sept. 12, a week after the initial disclosures, Ms. Dunn said she would step down as chairwoman effective in January, to be succeeded by Mr. Hurd. Mr. Keyworth, her antagonist, then agreed to resign.

The moves by Hewlett-Packard on Friday were an attempt to get ahead of the torrent of daily disclosures about the spying operation and an acknowledgment of the irresponsibility, if not illegality, of the methods.

State and federal prosecutors are exploring whether any laws were broken by anyone inside the company or those hired in an investigative chain extending to Boston, Florida and the Midwest. A central element was the use of pretexting, which involved impersonating someone to obtain that person's calling records from a phone company.

Mr. Hunsaker, the lawyer and ethics officer, directed the 2006 phase of the investigation. Mr. Gentilucci, the Boston-based investigations officer, was involved in both the 2005 and 2006 phases of the investigation.

Mr. Hurd said that on Sept. 8 he retained a law firm, Morgan Lewis, which has concluded that the investigation team led by Mr. Hunsaker provided regular updates to Ms. Dunn, and to a lesser extent to the general counsel, Ann O. Baskins.

"Some of the findings that Morgan Lewis has uncovered are very disturbing to me," Mr. Hurd said.

Michael J. Holston, a partner in the firm, laid out some evidence to reporters Friday after Mr. Hurd's comments. While noting that the firm's review was not complete, he said Ms. Dunn had personally contacted and engaged Security Outsourcing Solutions, a tiny Boston-area investigative firm operated by Ronald R. DeLia, in the 2005 phase.

"For the first month or so of the investigation, Ms. Dunn worked directly with Ron DeLia from S.O.S.," Mr. Holston said, and it was only two months later that the company's own detectives were brought in.

In an interview two weeks ago, Ms. Dunn said she had turned to the head of security to handle that investigation. Ms. Dunn's lawyer, James J. Brosnahan, reiterated that claim Friday. "She went to the right people, and she was assured that what they were doing was legal," he said.

Mr. Hurd was briefed on the first phase of the investigation, called Kona I, on July 22, 2005, Mr. Holston said. But he said Mr. Hurd attended only a portion of that meeting, which included Ms. Dunn, Ms. Baskins, Mr. DeLia, Mr. Gentilucci and Jim Fairbaugh, the head of global security. The participants were told the investigation was inconclusive, and by late summer it was inactive.

Kona II, the phase that began in January of this year, was far more energetic. "Over the next three months, regular updates were provided by members of the investigation team to Ms. Dunn and, to a lesser extent, to Ms. Baskins," Mr. Holston said.

A crucial document was a March 2006 report prepared by the company's investigators and Mr. DeLia under the supervision of Mr. Hunsaker, a senior company lawyer. Mr. Hurd was given a copy of that report, but he said he did not read it. "I could have, and I should have," he said.

The report identified the source of the leaks and outlined techniques used to get that information, including pretexting. It was also sent to the company's outside counsel, the powerful Silicon Valley firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, for review and comment, Mr. Holston said.

Mr. Holston noted that the Kona II report claimed that the techniques were legal. But as e-mail messages disclosed this week have shown, Mr. Hunsaker suspected early this year that the techniques might not be above-board. When he asked Mr. Gentilucci about the legality, he was told that it was "on the edge," and Mr. Hunsaker replied: "I shouldn't have asked."

Despite those assurances, Mr. Hunsaker never obtained a written legal opinion, according to people briefed on the company's review of its investigation.

Mr. Holston also discussed other aspects of the operation, including the use of surveillance software surreptitiously sent to the computer of a CNET reporter.

Mr. Holston said the program had been designed to determine whether the reporter would forward a misleading e-mail message, purporting to offer inside information about the company, to her source on the Hewlett-Packard board for confirmation.

The scheme did not work, Mr. Holston said, noting that the investigation team never received an indication that the misleading message had been forwarded.

Mr. Hurd affirmed that he had been informed of the plan to send a bogus message and had approved of the "naming convention" that was used. But he said he did not recall knowing or approving of the tracking technology. Neither Mr. Hurd nor Mr. Holston indicated why the chief executive did not raise questions about the way the scheme was to be carried out.

HP Chair Resigns Amid Probe Fallout (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

(AP) - PALO ALTO, Calif.-Hewlett-Packard Co. shoved Chairwoman Patricia Dunn off its board Friday, severing its ties to a leader whose efforts to plug a media leak morphed into a spying scandal that has spawned criminal and congressional investigations.

The Palo Alto, Calif.-based company will turn the chairmanship over to its chief executive, Mark Hurd, who was supposed to take over that job in January as part of changes announced two weeks ago.

But things have changed since then amid a wave of leaked documents revealing how deeply HP's investigators intruded into the personal lives of seven directors, nine journalists, two employees and family members of those targeted individuals. Dunn authorized the investigation and received regular updates, although she said she didn't realize HP's investigators were going to such extremes.

"Now that we know the depth of what has transpired, I take full accountability to drive the actions to set it right," Hurd said at a Friday news conference to announce Dunn's departure as well as review what the company has learned about its spying program.

Dunn had previously planned to remain an HP director after relinquishing the chairmanship in January, but now she is leaving the board entirely.

"I continue to have the best interests of HP at heart and thus I have accepted the board's request to resign," Dunn said in a Friday statement.

Dunn, 53, continued to defend her decision to initiate the probe to identify the boardroom leak and reiterated her intention to appear Thursday before a congressional panel looking into HP's spying spree.

Determined to protect confidential board discussions, Dunn hired investigators who impersonated board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records. The detectives also surveilled an HP director and concocted an e-mail sting to dupe a reporter for CNet Networks Inc.'s News.com, an online technology site.

Hurd on Friday acknowledged authorizing the bogus e-mail, but said he didn't recall approving the use of software to trace the reporter's computer.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer and several federal agencies are investigating whether HP and its executives broke any laws in their crusade.

Hurd so far isn't among the group of HP insiders that Lockyer expects to charge, spokesman Tom Dresslar said Friday. But the attorney general is still examining Hurd's role in the scandal. "We are not ruling anybody out in terms of criminal culpability, Dresslar said.

Hurd also said Friday he plans to appear at the hearing being held by the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins, who also played a central role in the spying program, previously accepted the panel's invitation to appear.

DUNN GONE (SJMN)

By Pete Carey And Therese Poletti

San Jose Mercury News, September 23, 2006

Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd announced the immediate resignation of board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn on Friday at a crowded press conference at HP's Palo Alto headquarters in which he said he would lead the charge to correct problems arising from a boardroom-leak investigation gone wrong.

The company's investigation, which spied on board members, employees and reporters to determine who was leaking boardroom information, has drawn two criminal investigations and a congressional probe.

Hurd takes over immediately as chairman of HP's troubled board, while retaining his post as chief executive. He promised to ``get to the bottom'' of the leak fiasco and take corrective action.

``What began with best intentions has ended up turning in a direction we could not have possibly anticipated,'' Hurd said. ``The people of HP don't deserve this nor do any of the people who were impacted. I take full accountability to drive the actions to get this right.''

Dunn issued a statement saying she was resigning ``in the best interests'' of HP and blaming the fiasco on the investigators the company used, saying she didn't select them. She said she ``followed the proper processes'' but that the investigators ``let me and the company down.''

The company announced on Sept. 12 that Dunn would step down as chairwoman in January but remain on the board, with Hurd taking over as chairman. Friday's announcment moves up that date and removes Dunn from the board altogether.

Hurd, in his first public meeting with the news media since HP's controversial leak investigation became front-page news across the country, portrayed the investigation as an appropriate anti-leak measure gone terribly astray.

Hurd said HP has appointed former federal prosecutor Bart M. Schwartz to perform an independent review of the company's investigative methods and make recommendations.

The press conference was the first sign that HP has finally decided to get out in front of the scandal, but reporters were not permitted to ask questions and no television cameras were allowed. HP has been silent for weeks as reports of schemes and plots hatched by its anti-leak squad leaked out in the media.

``I think they are just hemorrhaging everywhere with this story,'' said James Post, a Boston University School of Management professor and expert on corporate governance and business ethics.

`Emotional' meeting

Dunn's resignation came after the HP board met Thursday. An attorney representing her, James Brosnahan, said the meeting was described to him as ``emotional'' but that other board members showed Dunn ``respect and admiration'' and even affection after she agreed to step down. The board members did not think Dunn did anything illegal, Brosnahan said.

Apart from Dunn's resignation, two other HP employees are apparently leaving their jobs. Kevin Hunsaker, HP's lawyer who helped handle the probe into boardroom leaks, and Anthony Gentilucci, HP's security manager on the investigation, are still at HP, but a source familiar with the situation said Friday, ``They are likely on their way out.''

HP had one ray of good news from California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, who said there is no evidence yet that Hurd himself committed any crimes. But Lockyer's spokesman Tom Dresslar added, ``We're not ruling anybody out. We'll go where the evidence leads.''

At the news conference, Hurd offered his version of a question that has been increasingly asked in the past few days: What did he know and when did he know it?

He said he ``briefly'' attended a meeting in the summer of 2005 at which the results of HP's first boardroom-leak investigation were presented by HP security and a Boston area private investigator.

What he OK'd, didn't OK

He acknowledged approving a plot earlier this year to trick a CNet reporter into revealing her sources by having an investigator e-mail her, posing as a disgruntled HP employee. But he said he didn't recall approving another gambit: e-mailing the reporter a purported HP document containing hidden spyware to trace her sources.

And he admitted he was given a report in March detailing the methods used by investigators, as well as the results. ``I understand there is also a written report of the investigation addressed to me and others, but I did not read it. I could have, and I should have,'' he said.

The Mercury News disclosed Thursday that the report outlined the use of spyware on the CNet reporter, surveillance of board members and journalists, and the obtaining of third-party private phone records of reporters, HP employees and board members.

Hurd said the ``trigger for me'' that something was wrong came in the form of an e-mail he received after a May board meeting. At that point, he retained the law firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius to do ``a more comprehensive investigation,'' he said.

A Morgan Lewis lawyer followed up Hurd's comments at the news conference with a summary of the law firm's investigation of the HP leak investigations. Those two internal leak probes, in 2005 and 2006, have now spawned a half-dozen other investigations, including ones by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, the Justice Department, the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Trade Commission and the California attorney general, who says crimes were committed.

The House committee is investigating the use of ``pretexting'' by private contractors and investigators to obtain personal phone records of other people through deception.

Hearing next week

Hurd will testify before the House committee's investigations subcommittee Thursday. Testimony has also been invited from Dunn, HP General Counsel Ann O. Baskins, Hunsaker and two HP security managers including Gentilucci. Ronald DeLia, president of a small private investigative firm near Boston called Security Outsourcing Solutions, and a Florida private investigator whom DeLia used have also been called as witnesses.

Mike Holston, a Morgan Lewis lawyer, said that in 2005 Dunn contacted DeLia's company and worked directly with him for ``the first month or so'' of the investigation. Two months into the investigation, HP's global security department was brought in.

The second phase in January 2006 was done by Security Outsourcing Solutions and HP security. There were updates to Dunn, and ``to a lesser extent,'' General Counsel Baskins.

Although Hurd approved the concept of a phony disgruntled employee contacting CNet via e-mail, Holston said, the law firm has found no evidence he was asked to approve the use of the e-mail tracer. There is no evidence keystrokes were recorded by any spyware, he said.

Gentilucci provided one HP employee's Social Security number to Security Outsourcing Solutions, which also gathered other numbers and forwarded them to Action Research Group, a data and investigation company in Melbourne, Fla.

Using impostors

And finally, Holston said, so far there's no information that one of the most bizarre of the investigators' schemes was ever implemented -- planting undercover operatives, posing as clerks or cleaning people, in the San Francisco newsrooms of CNet and the Wall Street Journal.

U.S. Prosecutors Drop Charge Against An Ex-NYSE Trader (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

In the latest setback in the New York Stock Exchange trading-abuses case, prosecutors dropped a securities-fraud charge against a former NYSE floor trader who worked for a Bear Stearns Cos. unit.

Kevin M. Fee, 38, was indicted in April 2005 and scheduled to go to trial next month. But the U.S. attorney in Manhattan, Michael Garcia, decided not to proceed with the case, "based on a review of the evidence" and "information pertaining to this defendant subsequent to the filing of the indictment," according to a federal court filing Friday.

The U.S. attorney's office has been prosecuting 15 former NYSE elite traders known as specialists. In the past two months, juries found two former specialists not guilty of securities fraud. Earlier, the government secured guilty pleas from two specialists and convinced juries to find two others guilty of a securities-fraud count.

"Kevin was a great specialist and an innocent man," said Lawrence Robbins, Mr. Fee's attorney. "We're gratified the government agrees."

Specialists at the Big Board, now part of NYSE Group Inc., oversee trading in individual stocks, putting buyers and sellers together and keeping prices orderly in return for the privilege of being able to trade on the floor.

Mr. Fee joined Bear Wagner Specialists LLC, majority-owned by Bear Stearns, in 1996. He traded companies including Texas Instruments Inc. and became a managing director of the firm and one of four "super captains" overseeing other traders.

The government alleged Mr. Fee, from 2000 to 2003, interfered with or traded ahead of customers more than 2,400 times, resulting in more than $900,000 in improper profit or customer harm. Bear Wagner and the other specialist firms didn't face criminal charges but settled Securities and Exchange Commission civil charges.

Recent cases show the difficulty of proving specialists were intentionally harming customers. Testimony from other floor officials hasn't been as strong as some expected. And Mr. Fee's trades represented only 0.1% of his overall volume, according to Mr. Robbins. The next specialist case, against former Fleet Specialist Inc. trader David Finnerty, is scheduled to go to trial Oct. 10.

Enron Victims Given Chance To Speak At Fastow Sentencing (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, Associated Press

AP, September 23, 2006

The court of public opinion will have one more chance to pass judgment on former Enron Corp. chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, whose complex schemes helped lead to the company's downfall.

Fastow was set to be sentenced on Tuesday to 10 years in prison, under an agreement he made with prosecutors leading up to his 2004 guilty plea. Fastow's cooperation and testimony helped pave the way for the convictions of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling.

The drama Tuesday is expected not to come from the handing down of Fastow's sentence but from ex-Enron workers and others hurt by the company's financial collapse who will be given the chance to speak at the court hearing.

Under a two-year-old federal law that enhances the rights of victims of federal crimes, Hoyt is allowing Enron's victims to speak about how the company's financial implosion hurt them.

"I really think you will hear some gut wrenching stories from people who are going to say that this ruined their lives, their savings, their retirement," said Steve Cron, a criminal defense attorney in Santa Monica, Calif.

Fastow was originally indicted on 98 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading, money laundering and others. He pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy, admitting to running various schemes to hide Enron debt and inflate profits while enriching himself. As part of the agreement, he surrendered nearly $30 million in cash and property.

Charles Prestwood, 68, a former pipeline operator who retired from Enron in 2000 and then lost $1.3 million in retirement savings a year later, said he is grateful Hoyt is allowing victims to face Fastow one last time.

"It's good that we can be heard because normally that don't happen," he said. "It gets a load off of (victims') shoulders."

Prestwood, who has heart problems, said he'll skip Fastow's hearing so he can save his strength and speak out at Skilling's Oct. 23 sentencing.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud. Lay's attorneys are working to erase his convictions since his July 5 death from heart disease.

During four days of brutal testimony and cross examination, Fastow, 44, testified Lay and Skilling knew he and his staff engineered fraudulent financial structures. Fastow also shed tears when he recounted how he roped his wife, Lea, into helping him hide ill-gotten gains from his schemes.

Lea Fastow pleaded guilty in 2004 to a misdemeanor tax crime and served a year in prison.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make flailing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Eric Eden, 38, who lost his job running Enron's computer-drafting department, said he has no interest in speaking at the sentencing hearing of Fastow or any other Enron defendant.

"It's probably not worth the time and effort for something that is so much water under the bridge to some degree," said Eden, who with his brother now runs a Houston-area sprinkler company called Watering Made Easy.

Eden said speaking at the sentencing could help some Enron victims move on with their lives.

"If that is what it takes, good for them. But I would have hoped they could have done it without this," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068069

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said he couldn't predict how many Enron victims would speak at Fastow's sentencing.

Cron said he doesn't think the sentencing will be a pleasant experience for Fastow.

"There will be some angry people there. He should sit tight, say nothing and tell the judge at the end he is sorry for what he did," he said.

Attorneys for Fastow did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Fastow's sentencing is set for 9 a.m. Tuesday. People will be able to sign up to speak between 8 a.m. and 10 a.m.

Hoyt has said people will be "allocated appropriate time" to speak.

Since Fastow's plea agreement has all but assured his sentence, any victims' statements won't have much affect on the proceedings, said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor in Washington who wrote the government's white-collar sentencing guide.

"In a case like this, the judge knows full well what damage the misconduct did," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Plans To Testify In CIA Leak Trial (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, September 23, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff plans to take the stand at his upcoming trial to tell jurors that he never lied to investigators in the CIA leak case, defense attorneys said Friday.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is charged with perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations in 2003 with reporters regarding Valerie Plame's CIA job.

Libby plans to testify about President Bush's daily terrorism briefings and other classified information to persuade jurors that he had more important things on his mind at the time and didn't remember his discussions with reporters, attorneys said in court papers filed Friday evening.

"Mr. Libby must be able to discuss classified information to give the jury an accurate picture of his state of mind during the relevant time period and to show the jury that any errors he made in his statements and testimony were the product of confusion, mistake and faulty memory rather than deliberate misrepresentations," defense attorneys wrote.

The documents were filed as part of Libby's bid to use classified information at his trial in January. Defense attorneys plan to use a digital slide show to present material to jurors, according to court papers.

Prosecutors oppose the use of many documents, saying Libby is trying to torpedo the case by demanding information that is too sensitive to be released at trial. The tactic they described, known as "graymail," is used to get a case dismissed.

Among the documents Libby wants to use at trial, attorneys said Friday, are records related to former Ambassador Joseph Wilson's trip to Niger. Wilson, Plame's husband, discounted reports that Saddam Hussein's regime had an agreement with the African country to buy uranium for a nuclear weapons program — a claim that Bush later included in his State of the Union address.

Plame believes White House aides revealed her CIA status as retribution for her husband's accusation that the Bush administration twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald investigated that for three years and did not charge anyone with violating the law that makes it a crime to disclose the identity of a covert CIA agent.

Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage acknowledged recently that he revealed Plame's job to syndicated columnist Robert Novak and Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward but said it was inadvertent. Armitage is expected to be a witness in the case.

Jurors Sentence Convicted Sex Offender To Death In North Dakota Student's Slaying (FINDLAW/AP)

By Dave Kolpack, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

(AP) - FARGO, North Dakota-Jurors on Friday sentenced a convicted sex offender to death for kidnapping and killing University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin, whose body was found in a Minnesota ravine nearly five months after she disappeared.

DOJ_NMG_0068070

It was North Dakota's first death penalty case in more than a century. The state does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases.

Alfonso Rodriguez Jr., 53, of Crookston, Minnesota, looked straight ahead and showed no emotion as the sentence was announced.

The jury reached its decision after more than a day and a half of deliberations. The same federal jury convicted Rodriguez on Aug. 30 on a charge of kidnapping resulting in Sjodin's death.

Rodriguez's mother, Dolores, and sister, Ileanna Noyes, cried as the verdict was announced, as did a number of the jurors. Members of Sjodin's family looked somber and stared straight ahead. They shared hugs outside the courtroom.

Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minnesota, disappeared from a Grand Forks shopping mall parking lot on Nov. 22, 2003, and her body was found the following April in a ravine near Crookston. Authorities said she was beaten, raped and stabbed.

Rodriguez, who got out of prison about six months before the killing, was charged under federal law because Sjodin was taken across state lines.

U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley, in his statements to jurors, said the death penalty would be the "right thing, in the right case." He stood near her portrait and asked for justice.

Rodriguez's attorney, Richard Ney, asked the jury for mercy after calling psychologists and Rodriguez's family to talk about his childhood of poverty, abuse and exposure to farm chemicals. Ney also said Rodriguez had been anxious about being released from prison after serving more than 20 years for assaults on three women in 1975 and 1980.

Rodriguez Jurors Say Death Seemed Proper Punishment (STPPP)

By Blake Nicholson

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 23, 2006

BISMARCK, N.D. - The foreman of the jury that handed down North Dakota's first death sentence in nearly 100 years says it came down to three votes and a question of punishment for a horrific crime.

"As a Christian person I didn't know if I could agree to the death penalty," said Terry Heuer, 51, of Leonard, the foreman of the jury that sentenced Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. to death for killing University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin.

"But it came down to, 'Was life in prison really a punishment for this particular case?'" Heuer said Sunday.

Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., was found guilty late last month in federal court in Fargo of a charge of kidnapping resulting in the death of Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn. She disappeared from a Grand Forks shopping mall parking lot on Nov. 22, 2003, and her body was found the following April in a ravine near Crookston. Authorities said she was beaten, raped and stabbed.

Evidence including the knife Rodriguez used to cut Sjodin's throat and the rope that bound her arms were present in the jury room. Heuer, his voice wavering, said Sunday that those images and the memories of the trial - and the ultimate decision - will stay with him.

"I don't know that I have an opinion one way or the other on the death penalty," he said. "I made this decision personally just on this case. It comes down to - we end up having to deal with that for the rest of our lives."

The death penalty sentence on Friday came after six weeks of testimony in three separate phases of the trial. The jury of seven women and five men had to determine whether Rodriguez was guilty, whether he was eligible for the death penalty, and whether he should get that punishment. They answered yes all three times.

The final time, it took three votes to reach a unanimous decision, said Heuer and Arlys Carter, 71, of Lisbon, another jury member. Each of the first two votes came back 11-1 for death, with the one holdout juror finally deciding to change his mind, they said.

Heuer said the final juror, whom he did not name, was not pressured.

"Everybody had to make up their own mind on this," he said. "It's a traumatic thing to go through."

After the first 11-1 vote on Thursday afternoon, jurors left for the day early because "everybody just needed to come back fresh," Heuer said.

A vote early Friday again was 11-1, but the unanimous decision was reached after a little more discussion, he said.

"We were a very conscientious bunch of people," Heuer said. "We were very, very careful with each" of the 30 factors offered by defense attorneys to support life in prison instead of death.

In the end, those factors, including a childhood of poverty, sexual abuse and possible brain damage from exposure to farm chemicals, were not enough to warrant mercy, Carter said.

"He didn't show (Sjodin) mercy, and neither did he show any remorse that we could see," Carter said. "He was very expressionless through the whole procedure. He did smile when his niece and nephew came into the courtroom. I have no doubt he was fond of his family, and they of him, and that didn't make our decision any easier.

"I think we all felt that the evidence was so overwhelming to one side," Carter said. "There was very little defense for his side. It was just not enough to hold on to."

Carter said the four alternate jurors said they also would have voted for death, "which made us feel good."

Heuer said jurors "looked and looked and looked" for remorse and did not find it. Neither did they believe that Rodriguez was accepting responsibility for Sjodin's death, as his attorneys claimed, when he offered in March to plead guilty in return for a life sentence.

"I have very strong faith," Carter said, "and I think (Rodriguez) still has his chance for mercy like all the rest of us do."

Carter and Heuer said the jurors did not believe prison was a fitting punishment for Rodriguez.

"From all we heard he adjusted very well to prison life, that he behaved very well, and did not seem unhappy there," Carter said.

Rodriguez had gotten out of prison about six months before Sjodin's killing, after serving 23 years for earlier assaults against women.

North Dakota's last execution was in 1905 and the last person sentenced to death in the state was spared 10 years later. The state eventually abolished its death penalty law. Rodriguez was prosecuted in federal court, where a death sentence is allowed.

Carter said she hopes the issue does not arise for another 100 years, though she felt honored and privileged to serve in this case.

"I would never want to do it again, but I would not have wanted to miss the opportunity to do it once," she said.

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

A Fairfax County man who admitted stabbing another man 64 times, then tried to minimize his involvement before his sentencing, was given the maximum 40-year term yesterday for second-degree murder.

The slaying of Marvin Greenwell, 55, occurred in a Huntington area apartment in May 1994. For years, police had few leads in the case. But after a Fairfax cold case detective resubmitted DNA evidence from Greenwell's apartment, the state's DNA databank discovered a suspect last year: Leslie E. Carver, now 45, who had committed a series of armed robberies shortly after the Greenwell murder, in the same area.

While detectives were investigating Carver, he was picked up by Prince William County police in June last year on charges of drug possession. In several tape-recorded conversations from the Prince William jail, according to court records, Carver made some fairly explicit admissions.

"I killed somebody in 1994," he told his mother. "I have to live with that every day of my life, Mom, every day, you know."

When Fairfax detectives went to talk to him, Carver denied killing Greenwell. But faced with the prospect of a first-degree murder trial, and the combination of the DNA evidence and phone transcripts, Carver pleaded guilty in July to second-degree murder.

After every felony guilty plea in Fairfax, an officer from the state probation and parole agency conducts an interview to get the defendant's personal history and version of the crime as part of a report to the judge before a sentencing hearing. Fairfax Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney Marc J. Birnbaum said Carver told the probation officer that "he doesn't accept responsibility. He comes up with this other person involved who really killed" Greenwell.

Birnbaum noted that Carver's criminal record stretched 27 years, featured nine incarcerations and moved from property crimes to drugs to violence. "Any way one looks at this case," Birnbaum said, "it is a cruel, violent and vicious crime."

Deputy Fairfax Public Defender Dawn Butorac, one of Carver's attorneys, said Carver did accept responsibility for the murder by admitting that he was in the room when Greenwell was killed, which would provide the legal culpability for a murder conviction.

State sentencing guidelines in effect in 1994 suggested a possible prison term of 13 to 27 years, Butorac said. Because Carver has had previous probations and paroles revoked for at least the next 14 years, Butorac suggested that Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Randy I. Bellows sentence Carver to 13 years, the low end of the sentencing guidelines.

Carver stood and said, "I just wanted to say that I'm sorry to the Greenwell family." Turning to the judge, he said: "I don't know. I'd ask if you could give me a little time in there, so I might be able to get out one day."

Bellows reminded Carver that at his guilty plea in July, "you told me that you killed Mr. Greenwell. And I don't have any reservations that is exactly what you did." After reading Carver's claim that he didn't actually stab Greenwell, the judge said he went back and listened to the taped conversations from the jail.

The judge also reviewed the crime scene photos. In 30 years as a public defender, prosecutor and judge, Bellows said, "this is among the worst I've ever seen."

Bellows said: "I feel that the [sentencing guidelines] are completely inappropriate in this case. The maximum sentence is 40 years, and that is what I impose."

Greenwell's widow and three grown children began applauding loudly.

Carver yelled over his shoulder, "I love you, too," as he was led out of the courtroom.

18-month Sentence In Travel Scandal (MJS)

By Gina Barton Gbarton@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 23, 2006

Thompson gets prison time for steering state contract

In a case that has played a role in a combative campaign season, former state Department of Administration supervisor Georgia Thompson was sentenced Friday to 18 months in prison for steering a state travel contract to a company whose top executives made $20,000 in campaign donations to Gov. Jim Doyle.

During Thompson's sentencing hearing in federal court in Milwaukee, the judge and attorneys for both sides acknowledged the case's political overtones and lamented a recent surge in public corruption cases across the state. In the hours after the hearing, Democratic and Republican party operatives blasted each other in dueling news releases.

Thompson, 56, was convicted by a federal jury in June of misapplying government funds and of defrauding the state of its right to honest services. Thompson, of Waunakee, was on a team of evaluators that reviewed proposals for a three-year, $750,000 "travel partner" contract to handle travel arrangements for state employees. It ultimately was awarded to Adelman Travel. The jury found that Adelman would not have won if Thompson had not manipulated the process.

The indictment said Thompson steered the contract to Adelman to cause political advantage for her supervisors and to bolster her job security. It did not allege that the contract was awarded in exchange for donations of $10,000 each from Adelman's chief executive and a board member. Doyle has since canceled the contract.

"People are deserving of good and honest government," U.S. District Judge Rudolph T. Randa said at the hearing. "There has been too much of this recently; people tend to lose confidence."

Randa said he would decide in about two weeks whether to grant Thompson's request to remain free pending her appeal. If he denies the request, Thompson will be required to report to federal prison on Nov. 27.

In addition to the prison term, Thompson must pay a $4,000 fine and serve three years of supervised release.

Her attorneys argued for probation while Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott Campbell urged Randa to send Thompson to prison for 21 months.

Letters from Thompson's friends, relatives and co-workers characterized her as a good listener and a dedicated public servant. Two members of the travel committee that awarded the contracts wrote letters supporting Thompson. A former supervisor, Jane Pawasarat, noted that Thompson had taken the time to write thank-you notes to those who have supported her throughout the prosecution.

Thompson declined to speak at her sentencing hearing. In a written statement, she described growing up one of 10 children in Madison. Her father was a painter for the University of Wisconsin and her mother was a janitor for the Department of Administration.

"I take pride in doing the right thing," she wrote. "I take pride in being a good friend. I believe in defending everyone's voice and their right to have a voice. I've always tackled my work with great energy and high expectations."

Her attorney, Stephen P. Hurley, argued that Thompson has been punished enough.

"She resigned from her position, was publicly humiliated by the Governor and has been forced to sell her home to make ends meet (including paying her legal bills). As an intensely private person, her 15 minutes of fame (and it has been much more than that) have borne a large toll on her," Hurley wrote in an earlier court filing.

Because the case has been used in political campaigns, the public already knows that the offense was serious, Hurley said in court. He argued that a sentence of probation would not detract from that.

Campbell disagreed.

"The very reason that this case has gotten attention is the very reason why a just sentence, a deterring sentence, is needed in this case," he argued. "A lenient sentence - a sentence of probation - will send the message that the federal courts in Wisconsin don't take corruption like this seriously."

There was no indication Friday that the sentencing marked the end of Thompson's time in the political spotlight.

Mark Green, the Republican candidate for governor, called her sentencing a "sad day" and insisted that, if he is elected governor Nov. 7, he will take steps to make sure no similar events occur.

As governor, Green said, his administration would make sure no companies are solicited for campaign donations, or make any, while they are in the process of bidding for a state contract. He also said he is "open" to the idea of not raising campaign money while a budget for state government, which spends $26 billion every two years, is being considered.

Green said his campaign ads and his speeches would make no new references to Thompson over the next six weeks.

But other pro-Green groups, including the Republican Party of Wisconsin, have run TV ads that tie Doyle to Thompson.

"Jim Doyle has rigged contracts for cash, he's rigged votes to make political attacks and by failing to protect our electoral process, this election is ripe for fraud once again," party executive director Rick Wiley said in a statement.

Democratic Party Chair Joe Wineke shot back: "For months, Republicans have been trying to use the Georgia Thompson case for their own political advantage and to smear Governor Doyle. . . . These dishonest, hypocritical attacks are just another pathetic attempt by Republicans to distract voters from the fact that Congressman Mark Green has violated Wisconsin law, and is asking a judge to rule that he can keep more than a million dollars in illegal special interest cash."

Doyle was not available for comment Friday, aides said.

Department of Administration Secretary Stephen Bablitch pointed out that Thompson was hired during a Republican administration and said she acted alone.

Dan Bach, the top aide to Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager, said this week that a joint state and federal investigation into the travel contract continues. Investigators also are looking into the role played by former state Administration Secretary Marc Marotta in a bid to build student housing at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

An inquiry into the state Public Service Commission's approval of the sale of the Kewaunee nuclear power plant also continues, Bach said Thursday.

Oakland City Hall Probe Wide-ranging (OAKTRIB)

By Heather MacDonald, STAFF WRITER

Oakland Tribune, September 22, 2006

FBI's questions have centered on 10 to 15 city contracts, officials say

OAKLAND — The arrest of a man with close ties to several city officials is just a small part of a wide-ranging investigation by federal authorities into public corruption at Oakland City Hall, FBI officials said Thursday.

The probe is focusing on whether "City Official A" — identified as Council President Ignacio De La Fuente — or other city officials granted contracts in return for favors, said FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy.

FBI agents have interviewed dozens of people at City Hall during the past week, including several department heads, City Council aides and City Administrator Deborah Edgerly.

"We will go where the investigation takes us," Quy said.

De La Fuente vigorously denies any wrongdoing.

Several city officials interviewed by the FBI said the questions focused on 10 to 15 city contracts and appeared to be part of an intense investigation into De La Fuente, who unsuccessfully ran for mayor in June. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the FBI asked them not to speak to the news media.

The deals under scrutiny include the city's contract with Swinerton Builders to retrofit the Police Administration Building after the 1989 Loma Prieta earthquake, sources said. It was approved unanimously by the Oakland City Council in July 2004.

In addition, agents asked about the effort to rezone the area between Tidewater Avenue and the Oakland Estuary. Earlier this week, De La Fuente voted to allow housing to be built in the now-industrial area. Last month, Carlos Plazola, De La Fuente's longtime aide, resigned to concentrate on Plazola's real estate development business, which owns property in the area, sources said.

Also being examined is a proposal made to the Port of Oakland to provide limousine service at Oakland Airport, sources said.

FBI agents also asked about council members interfering with city employees, a violation of the City Charter, which requires them to go throughEdgerly rather than contacting staff directly. A majority of the council members routinely go around Edgerly to get pet projects moving or to gather information, officials said.

Despite the wide range of topics brought up by the FBI, several people who were interviewed said the investigation felt focused on elected officials and not at all like a fishing expedition.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Corrigan told a federal magistrate Thursday he expects Maurice Himy, the former owner of a clothing store on Oakland City Hall Plaza, to be indicted on extortion and public corruption charges next week.

After the court hearing, Himy declined to comment, but his attorney, William L. Osterhoudt, told reporters he expects his client to be cleared.

"He is a fine person and a credit to the community," Osterhoudt said. He declined to discuss the specific allegations against his client.

Himy, 59, is due back in court Sept. 29. The San Rafael man is accused of telling an Oakland businessman, who wanted a contract to auction the city's surplus vehicles and other property, that he could get him the deal in return for cash because of his connection to De La Fuente and other city officials.

According to an FBI affidavit, Himy referred to Oakland as "Moneytown" and told Cooper that unless he was paid he would "kill the contract." At first, Himy demanded a percentage of the contract's revenue, but later asked for $65,000 total to be paid in monthly installments.

De La Fuente said he contacted Bill Noland, director of the city's Finance and Management Agency, about Cooper's bid for the $30,000 auctioneering contract in an effort to ensure that city contracts went to local companies as often as possible.

Councilmember Larry Reid (Elmhurst-East Oakland) also contacted Noland on Cooper's behalf, but was told the businessman submitted his bid for the contract four minutes too late.

the contract after bid specifications were changed to require the cars and equipment to be auctioned in Oakland, ensuring the city would reap the sales tax revenue generated by the sales. He submitted the lowest bid.

However, the only auction Cooper held — to resell about 30 vehicles and other equipment — was plagued with trouble from the beginning, and had to be postponed after Cooper initially failed to adequately notice the auction.

Afterward, Cooper reported that one car and six street sweepers sold for prices lower than those recorded by city officials and the purchasers, Noland said. The discrepancy, which has not been resolved, totaled $21,725, he added.

The contract was terminated after city officials discovered Cooper did not have a valid state license to resell cars, Noland said.

Cooper, the former executive director of the sister city association between Oakland and Santiago de Cuba, contributed $600 to De La Fuente's mayoral bid and volunteered for the campaign.

Cooper referred questions to his attorney, John Burris, who called him a victim of extortion.

In 1995, Cooper was convicted of making false statements to the government while applying for reimbursement for property damage caused by the Loma Prieta earthquake and sentenced to 41 months in prison, officials said.

Quy praised Cooper for coming forward, calling him brave, and said Cooper had been completely forthcoming about his background.

According to the FBI, Cooper was not the first person Himy demanded money from to make a deal happen. In November 2003, an unidentified developer was weighing whether to buy a 120,000-square-foot office building, and wanted to know whether the Oakland Police Department was interested in renting the building.

After approaching an unidentified aide to a former Oakland mayor, the developer met with an unidentified Oakland police officer and Himy about the building, according to the FBI. A few days later, Himy asked the developer for a $150,000 fee, saying "this is how things are done in town."

The developer declined to pay Himy, and never purchased the building.

Jacques Barzaghi, Mayor Jerry Brown's longtime confidant and senior aide, was heavily involved in the search for a new police headquarters, prompted by the seismic risk to the Police Administration Building, officials said. Barzaghi, who was fired by Brown in June 2004, and Himy are close friends.

At the same time the FBI contends Himy was extorting Cooper, he was having a hard time paying the rent for his store, Spaccio. A temporary rent reduction kept the store open for about a year, but city officials evicted Himy and his partner this March after business did not improve, said Frank Fanelli, manager of the city's real estate services division.

Himy owes the city $165,000 in back rent and $16,500 in penalties, Noland said. The debt has been sent to a collection agency, officials said.

In March, FBI agents interviewed several council members as part of the agency's investigation into state Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, focusing on whether he ever pressured them to steer contracts to his friends and business associates. Perata and De La Fuente are close allies. Perata denies any wrongdoing.

Officials Seek Funds To Build Crime Lab (WT)

By Amy Doolittle, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

D.C. officials yesterday asked for more than $94 million in federal funds over the next three years to establish a state-of-the-art crime laboratory in the District.

The District does not have its own crime lab. Forensic evidence from the city is sent for processing to the FBI's crime lab, which is on the grounds of the Marine Corps Base in Quantico, Va.

"To support our crime-fighting efforts, the District needs its own dedicated crime laboratory," Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey testified yesterday before the House Committee on Government Reform. "We need a laboratory that is capable of taking full advantage of the latest in DNA and other forensic technologies."

The hearing was led by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and chairman of the Committee on Government Reform.

The District has a backlog of DNA evidence waiting to be processed on more than 1,500 sexual assault cases and a violent crimes backlog expected to grow 100 to 200 cases per year, officials said.

The District is allowed to use the FBI's lab and supplies for free but is required to provide its own personnel.

FBI officials estimated that about 30 percent of the cases the Quantico lab processes each year are from the District. They said their increased caseload since September 11 has made it difficult to move District evidence through quickly.

"Since September 11 the mission of the FBI Laboratory has focused primarily upon providing forensic services to support counter-terrorism," said Joseph A. DiZinno, director of the FBI laboratory. "The support to [Metropolitan Police Department] investigations can continue, but not at the priority level previously received."

The new lab would cost about $253 million, said Edward D. Reiskin, D.C. deputy mayor for public safety and justice and the interim city administrator.

It would include forensic and DNA testing functions, the city morgue, the D.C. Department of Health and a bio-safety laboratory for homeland security threats.

Because the District does not have its own crime lab, it cannot enter DNA evidence into a national or city database, which cross-references samples and can help catch repeat offenders.

"A forensics lab of one's own for a city with a chronically high crime rate is a no-brainer," said D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat. "The forensics lab may be the key to further reduction in violent crime in the District."

Chief Ramsey said eliminating the forensic case backlog could be key in lowering the city's crime rate.

"If we can clear up this backlog maybe we can put some people away and close some of these cases," he said.

The D.C. Council has so far dedicated about $10 million for the project and $13 million in federal funding.

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams also has proposed $75 million in the fiscal year 2008 and 2009 budgets. The remaining city dollars likely would come from a series of bonds.

The lab is scheduled to be completed by late 2009.

Mr. Davis and Mrs. Norton said yesterday they are not aware of any opposition to the federal government giving the District money for a crime lab. However, Mr. Davis cautioned that there might be objections in the future.

"It's money; people always object," he said. "We're going to do the best we can to push this through as fast as we can."

More Journalists Facing Jail (WP)

UNLESS A federal appeals court steps in, two reporters for the San Francisco Chronicle will head to jail for as long as 18 months. Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada broke an important story: the grand jury testimony of baseball superstars, including Barry Bonds, concerning the steroid-dealing BALCO lab and their use of its products. They have properly refused to identify their sources, despite a subpoena from federal authorities. And as has become distressingly common in investigations and lawsuits around the country, the journalists are facing jail time for doing their jobs.

Any reasonable balancing of the interests that clash when law enforcement needs to know a reporter's sources would, in this case, favor letting Mr. Williams and Mr. Fainaru-Wada honor their commitments of confidentiality. The public service they did by exposing steroid use among top athletes was significant. As Mr. Fainaru-Wada put it in court this week: "A fraud was being perpetrated on sports fans -- with athletes using illegal performance-enhancing drugs to manufacture records and achievements that were, at best, deceitful, and, at worst, an illusion." It's hard to see how the public's interest in getting to the bottom of a routine leak outweighs its interest in access to such stories.

Yet federal law, unlike the law in nearly every state, does not give a reporter any protection against compelled disclosure of confidential sources in criminal investigations. And the judge in this case, Jeffrey S. White, specifically declined to balance any harm the leak caused against the value of the information to the public.

Congress has legislation pending that would give journalists a limited privilege, but the Senate Judiciary Committee has yet to act on it. Under its terms, a judge might still order a journalist to give up a source or face jail, but the judge would first have at least to take "into account both the public interest in newsgathering and maintaining a free flow of information to citizens." (Disclosure: The Washington Post Co., along with other media organizations, filed a friend-of-the-court brief on behalf of the reporters, and Post executives are lobbying for the shield bill.) How many more reporters are going to get locked up before Congress passes this modest reform?

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Texas Democrats File Suit Against Voting Fraud Law (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

HOUSTON, Sept. 22 — In the latest of the nation's skirmishes over voting rights, Texas Democrats have sued two top Republican state officials over an antifraud law that the suit says is being used to intimidate minority voters casting ballots by mail.

The action, filed Thursday in federal court in Marshall, challenges both the constitutionality of the law and the way it is being enforced. It contends that Attorney General Greg Abbott and Secretary of State Roger Williams are exaggerating the threat of election fraud and selectively applying the statute, enacted in 2003, so that they can "suppress voting by disfavored groups" that generally support Democrats.

The law makes it a crime in certain cases to carry someone else's filled-out ballot to the mailbox, to possess another person's blank ballot or to provide absentee ballot assistance to anyone who has not asked for it.

One plaintiff, Gloria Meeks, a 69-year-old Fort Worth woman who said she was being investigated for helping elderly and disabled voters cast ballots, provided a sworn statement saying two state investigators "peeped into my bathroom window not once but twice while I was in my bathroom drying off from my bath."

A statement issued by Mr. Abbott's office did not address that accusation directly but said the investigators had acted professionally, and added, "It is not uncommon for the target of a criminal investigation to make baseless allegations against law enforcement in order to deflect attention from the serious criminal allegations they face."

Responding to the suit in another statement, the state's solicitor general, Ted Cruz, dismissed it as baseless and called the plaintiffs "a combination of political operatives and individual criminals who have already pleaded guilty to voter fraud."

"There are open investigations against members of both parties," Mr. Cruz said in an interview, "but the vast majority of complaints that have come in have concerned alleged criminal conduct in the Democratic primary and party elections."

Mr. Cruz also noted that the law had been sponsored by a Democratic member of the Texas House.

In an era of exceptionally partisan politics, the question of who gets to vote has become a most contentious one, especially now as the midterm elections approach. This week, the United States House of Representatives passed a bill that beginning in 2010 would deny the vote to the millions of people who lack a birth certificate, a passport or proof of naturalization. Last year, Georgia was barred from requiring voters to produce a government-issued photo identification card. And in 2004 Florida had to discard a list, intended to keep felons from voting, because it had neglected to include Hispanics.

The new suit was filed in the name of the Texas Democratic Party and six voters by J. Gerald Hebert, a Virginia lawyer and former Justice Department prosecutor specializing in voting rights. The plaintiffs include two Texarkana women, Willie Ray, a member of the City Council, and Jamillah Johnson, who have both pleaded guilty and been sentenced to probation for violating the 2003 law by handling other people's votes.

Another plaintiff, Parthenia McDonald, 78, of Fort Worth said she had joined the suit because she used a wheelchair and needed help to vote. "I can't even get out of my front door, so I couldn't go to my mailbox," Ms. McDonald said.

Under the statute, assisting voters with mail-in ballots is legal if done by a member of the family or household or someone the voter voluntarily designates in writing on the envelope. The suit says these guidelines are often too vague to interpret properly. It says the restrictions and the way the state has enforced them disenfranchise the poor, people who speak no English and others overwhelmingly likely to vote Democratic.

But the former Democratic lawmaker who sponsored the legislation, Steven D. Wolens of Dallas, took sharp issue with the suit's claim that the "plain intent" of the measure was to suppress the minority vote "and to squelch completely legitimate, nonfraudulent activities of civic organizations, including political parties."

"That was not my intent," Mr. Wolens said in an interview. "My purpose was to eliminate vote fraud in absentee balloting."

He said he and his wife, Mayor Laura Miller of Dallas, had both been victimized as political candidates by "rigged elections with people harvesting votes."

Mr. Wolens, a lawyer who is no longer in the Legislature, said he had not examined the suit and could not say whether his statute was now being used to suppress minority or Democratic voting.

Attorney General Abbott, a former Texas judge running for re-election this year, has long highlighted his efforts against voter fraud, calling it "an epidemic" and likening it to the infamous ballot-box stuffing in South Texas that won the 1948 Democratic senatorial primary for Lyndon B. Johnson.

But the suit said he had prosecuted only about eight people under the new law, all affiliated with the Democrats and all but one African-American or Hispanic.

Mr. Cruz, the solicitor general, said that other cases involving both parties were under investigation and that in any case the attorney general did not initiate voting fraud cases but received them from local authorities.

In the case of Ms. Meeks, the woman who said investigators had peeped into her bathroom, Angela Hale, a spokeswoman for Mr. Abbott, called her "the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation that stems from a complaint referred to the office of attorney general by a citizen in Tarrant County."

"The investigation of Ms. Meeks has been conducted professionally and properly, to the full extent allowed by law," Ms. Hale said in a statement.

Ms. Hale also defended Mr. Abbott's use, in a PowerPoint presentation on voter fraud, of a postage stamp about sickle cell anemia, an ailment found chiefly among African-Americans, to show how possibly fraudulent mail ballots were examined for suspicious similarities. But she said another exhibit in the presentation, a "clip art" illustration of black voters in line at a polling booth, had been removed.

An Unwelcome Light On A Club Where Legends Teed Off (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

BURBANK, Calif., Sept. 22 — In truth, the naked women discharging cocktails at the famed Lakeside Golf Club were not what rankled Jennifer Merkel, though she certainly found them less than charming.

It was her tee time — chosen by the club and consistently at a far less convenient hour than her husband's — that got her steamed. There was also the accusation that the highest level of memberships was reserved for men, and that all the club's board members were male and that as a woman she could not enter the Grillroom or the Gin Room.

So Ms. Merkel sued, causing more than a small hoo-ha at Lakeside, the exclusive club here where Bob Hope, Bing Crosby, W. C. Fields, Gene Autry and John Wayne all hit the links, and drawing unwanted attention to the often exclusionary policies of private clubs.

"I think it is too bad when people get so upset that it ends up in a lawsuit," said Bob Thomas, a spokesman for the Southern California Golf Association.

The lawsuit, which Ms. Merkel filed with her husband, Reginald Lee, accuses the club of sex discrimination and of violating a host of state civil rights laws, including one that protects gay domestic partners because club rules allow family membership privileges only to people married to someone "of the opposite sex."

Ms. Merkel charges that as a woman she is not allowed to play at Lakeside on Saturdays or become a lifetime member of the club, and that she is relegated to "special membership" status, and thereby not allowed to serve on the club's board or hold equity in the club.

Before filing her suit, she complained to the National Organization for Women, which sent a letter to the club seeking an explanation.

Discrimination complaints against golf clubs by women are not new — the most famous were those against the Augusta National Golf Club in Georgia, which is host to the Masters Tournament and which has no female members — but they rarely result in lawsuits, because private golf clubs generally have great latitude over who is allowed join and how memberships are structured. The National Council of Women's Organizations has led a protest against the Augusta club because it will not allow women to be members.

"These are private organizations," said Alfred P. Carlton Jr., former president of the American Bar Association and an expert in country club law. "And unless they take a public subsidy or have special tax status, there is no public law of discrimination that would apply."

But one component of Ms. Merkel's suit, supported by colorful and off-colorful pictures, is a complaint about the annual Kelly Cup tournament, in which "completely naked women, a k a strippers and prostitutes, are allowed on the golf course and drink with members and guests." That has raised eyebrows even among the most seasoned golf experts.

"I wouldn't call this common at all," Mr. Carlton said. "Most country clubs are rather sedate organizations."

The club's general manager, Lance Sabella, did not deny that the tournament existed, nor did the one board member who took a reporter's call on the matter before promptly slamming down the phone. Mr. Sabella contended that the real reason Ms. Merkel and her husband had sued was because the club was moving to terminate Mr. Lee's membership.

"This lawsuit by Mr. Lee is a most unfortunate attempt to deflect attention from his own public conduct," said Mr. Sabella, reading a statement. The board's decision to oust him "comes after three years of discussions, notices and warnings concerning his disruptive, ungentlemanly and unacceptable conduct."

Mr. Sabella said via e-mail on Friday that Mr. Lee "physically threatened another member and verbally accosted him, using abusive language" on volleyball night in 2003, and that there were seven other "documented incidents of inappropriate behavior/actions by Mr. Lee." He added that the Grill Room was not accessible to women because it was part of the men's locker room, and that the club's bylaws were "gender neutral." There is a woman, he said, in the highest level of membership.

The lawyer for Mr. Lee and Ms. Merkel, Leo Terrell, said that at a termination hearing this week, the club accused Mr. Lee of writing down an inaccurate score and of starting his game at the wrong tee time, which Mr. Terrell said were common among golfers, and of getting into an argument on the course three years ago.

"This is just a kangaroo court," said Mr. Terrell, who added that he planned to place some female protesters outside the club this weekend. Or maybe next, depending on when he decides to go golfing there with Mr. Lee.

He could have esteemed company. The club, which Mr. Terrell said costs roughly $100,000 to join, has a host of celebrities he would not name. "But just think 'Rocky,' 'Wall Street,' 'Dancing With Wolves,' and you get the picture," he said.

Mr. Terrell conceded there was little case law for him here but said he thought California civil rights codes offered his clients some protection.

After a discrimination flap in 1990 at Shoal Creek, an all-white club in Birmingham, Ala., the Professional Golfers Association drafted policies for sites that were host to tournaments, contractually obligating them to not discriminate. Many courses dropped out rather than change their ways. (P.G.A. tournaments are not played at Lakewood.)

"They are hanging this lawsuit on the issues of equal access," Mr. Johnson said. "And there are some California laws that deal with that issue, but they don't apply to truly private clubs. Lakeside is a truly private club."

Homeland Security Seeks Verification Of Employee Citizenship Status (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Homeland Security isn't waiting for Congress to require employers to verify they're hiring legal immigrants. It's preparing new rules that would compel companies to take swift action when they receive notice that a worker may be using fake documents, even as another federal agency warns that the proposed rule would be an invitation to discrimination lawsuits.

Congress is stymied over immigration reform, particularly legislation that would require employers to check workers' Social Security information.

So DHS is moving ahead on regulations - expected by the end of the year - that would require employers to ascertain quickly an employee's immigration status if the Social Security Administration sends back a notice saying it found no match between an employee's name and his or her Social Security number.

That directive comes despite the fact that Social Security's current "no-match" letter warns employers that taking adverse action against their employees could "violate state or federal law and subject you to legal consequences."

Last month, the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), which oversees workplace discrimination cases, wrote to Homeland Security warning that its proposed rule "may create circumstances in which employers have incentives to take actions that violate . . . non-discriminatory provisions."

Social Security Administration officials confirmed that they're discussing similar concerns about discrimination with DHS.

Currently, when Social Security receives a W-2 earnings statement from an employer in which an employee's name and Social Security number don't match, a "no-match" letter is sent to the employer.

About 128,000 such letters were sent out this year for the 2005 tax year, roughly the same number sent for the 2004 tax year. The letters spell out what employers and employees must do to rectify the discrepancy but doesn't hold employers liable for workers who turn out to be illegal immigrants.

The new DHS rule would require the employer to check within 14 days to see if the mismatch was a clerical error and would give the employee 60 days to prove his or her status.

Currently, there's no time limit for resolving a "no-match" discrepancy. The EEOC wants any new rule to give workers 90 days instead of 60 to resolve paperwork problems.

Employers that can't resolve any discrepancies either internally or by checking with federal agencies would be required to fire the workers or face federal prosecution or fines for hiring illegal immigrants.

Business groups complain that this leaves them vulnerable to enforcement actions if they don't comply and costly lawsuits if they do.

"Legally speaking, an employer has to very careful," said Scott Vinson, vice president of government relations for the National Council of Chain Restaurants. "If you terminate an employee without any other evidence, you could open up yourself to liability for civil rights violations."

"I don't think any company wants a bunch of employees with fraudulent Social Security numbers, or the Social Security numbers of children under the age of 5, or of dead people," Boyd said.

Employers who show that they tried to verify workers' identities and didn't know the workers were illegal would be in the clear.

"Knowing is the operative word," Boyd said. "If we go to a company and we find 50 illegal aliens, and the company says they looked at all the documents, they didn't know they were illegal, and the paperwork supports that, then they're in compliance."

The change would help agents go after companies that routinely seek out illegal immigrants or ignore signs like "no-match" letters.

"We have seen numerous cases where companies have hundreds of people on their payroll with bogus Social Security Numbers," Boyd said.

Employer groups, however, question why DHS is moving ahead with the rule when Congress is still narrowing differences between competing immigration bills that require mandatory verification of an employee's citizenship status.

"We thought it would be a smart thing for DHS to pause for a moment to wait and see . . . because this may ultimately have to be changed," said Vinson, who represents the chain restaurants. "From what I'm hearing, DHS does plan to proceed with this . . . and it's being fast-tracked."

Before the Sept. 11 terror attacks, immigration authorities rarely fined or prosecuted employers for hiring illegal immigrants, and the illegal workforce grew to an estimated 11 million people over the past decade. After the attacks, authorities accelerated immigrant-worker sweeps and increased prosecutions of employers.

Now, a small but growing number of companies has decided to verify their workers' identities more aggressively by joining the voluntary DHS program Basic Pilot, which allows companies to verify Social Security numbers over the Internet.

More than 11,200 employers are signed up for the program this year, twice last year's numbers. It's a big jump for a program in place since 1996, but a small fraction of the estimated 7 to 8 million employers nationwide.

Dunkin' Brands Inc., corporate parent of Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins, joined in June. Chief Legal Officer Stephen Horn, in a statement to McClatchy Newspapers, said, "We see it as a way to help our franchisees comply with the laws when the authenticity of their new hires' credentials are difficult to discern."

But the program has accuracy problems and is far from foolproof, said Basic Pilot participants. It can't recognize employees who are using others' identification and Social Security numbers. That would require more sharing of tax records among the IRS, Homeland Security and Social Security Administration.

Advocates of a guest-worker program, such as the one proposed by President Bush, charge that the proposed DHS rule and Basic Pilot only drive workers toward employers who pay them off the books.

In the Maryland city of Upper Marlboro, undocumented workers gathered after dawn and awaited jobs as day laborers.

One recently arrived young man from Mexico's southernmost state of Chiapas, leaning against a contractor's truck and wearing a company-issued shirt embroidered with the name Lupe, underscored the verification challenge.

Lupe confirmed that he's without legal working papers and shrugged when asked if his employer verified his status.

"It hasn't been a problem," Lupe said.

Ga. Lawmaker May Apologize To Latinos (AP-Y)

By Ben Evans, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

A Georgia Republican says he'll apologize to a national Latino advocacy group he accused of supporting racism and illegal immigration if the organization agrees to a list of conditions.

In a press release this week, Rep. Charlie Norwood called the National Council of La Raza a "radical," "anti-American" organization that "supports racist groups calling for the secession of the western United States as a Hispanic-only homeland."

The Washington-based group, which regularly testifies before Congress and is a leading Hispanic advocacy organization, emphatically denies those characterizations.

"His accusations in his press release were patently false," said Cecilia Munoz, vice president of NCLR. "We've attempted to clarify the record multiple times and we've offered to meet with him, and he continues to insist on a bizarre interpretation of our work."

In offering a conditional apology, Norwood asked NCLR to sever all ties with a leftist student group and its "racist doctrines," to repudiate all claims that any American territory belongs to Mexico, and to seek outside supervision to ensure that NCLR-sponsored programs do not discriminate.

Norwood, a six-term congressman, acknowledges that the group itself does not promote racist or separatist policies. But he cites its association with a leftist student group called MEChA that has branches at colleges across the country, some of which advocate retaking U.S. land that once belonged to Mexico. He points to a $2,500 grant the council gave in 2003 to the Georgetown University MEChA branch, which calls for the political liberation of Latinos from repressive foreigners.

The donation represents a tiny portion of the millions of dollars in grants that NCLR gave to health clinics, housing organizations, community centers and local advocacy groups that year.

John Stone, a spokesman for Norwood, said it is significant and drew an analogy with a conservative think tank: "If the Heritage Foundation gave one small donation to the Aryan Brotherhood, I think that would cause quite a stir."

FCC Is Likely To Put Conditions On AT&T Deal (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

WASHINGTON -- Federal Communications Commission staff recommended approving AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. with no conditions, agency sources said Friday.

Although the FCC staff and Chairman Kevin Martin are advocating no conditions, it is highly unlikely the deal will clear the commission without restrictions. The FCC's newest commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, is not expected to vote on the matter because of his previous career as a lobbyist and telecom attorney for smaller phone companies, FCC officials said. Those companies are opposing the deal.

If Mr. McDowell is recused from voting, Mr. Martin will have to reach a compromise with the commission's two Democrats, who are expected to press for conditions similar to those imposed last year when the commission approved the purchase of AT&T by SBC Communications Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s purchase of MCI Inc. Those conditions involved treatment of Internet traffic.

In a possible bid to avoid imposing similar conditions this time that would affect only AT&T, the FCC is also set to open a formal inquiry into whether industrywide rules need to be written that would require Internet providers -- including phone companies -- to treat all Internet traffic equally, otherwise known as net neutrality. High-tech companies and consumer advocates have complained phone and cable companies may try to discriminate against some Internet traffic and want rules to prevent that. The FCC's two Democrats successfully got conditions to prohibit AT&T and Verizon from doing that in the deals last year and are expected to try again.

The FCC is set to vote on the deal at its Oct. 12 meeting and the Justice Department's review of the deal may also be done before then. The antitrust review does not appear to have been slowed by a federal court review of the department's approval of the AT&T and Verizon deals. Those conditions mostly involved short-term price caps and limited divestitures in 19 cities where the department found some antitrust issues involving high-volume data lines for business customers.

The FCC has moved relatively quickly to approve the AT&T-BellSouth deal, possibly because of the coming elections in November. Some congressional Democrats have expressed unhappiness about the deal, which essentially puts Ma Bell back together 22 years after the government broke it up, and if the House came under Democratic control, it could prompt more pressure on the FCC to impose conditions.

AT&T's BellSouth Buy May Win FCC Approval, People Say (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, September 23, 2006

Sept. 22 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. is likely to be approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission, said people familiar with the agency's plans.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has asked other commissioners to approve the purchase without conditions, said the people, who asked not to be identified because the decision hasn't been made. Martin circulated a draft order last night and the FCC may vote Oct. 12, the people said today.

The draft is a starting point for talks and may not mean the deal will sail through without conditions. The newest FCC member, Republican Robert McDowell, a former lobbyist, may be barred from voting, leaving the panel split between Republicans and Democrats. In addition, Sprint Nextel Corp. and Global Crossing Ltd. want the agency to force AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, to allow equal access to its high-speed networks.

``It would surprise me if there aren't commissioners agitating for some tough net neutrality conditions,'' said Paul Glenchur, an analyst at Stanford Washington Research Group.

Glenchur noted that Martin last year initially proposed approving two telephone-company mergers without conditions.

``Then discussions among the commissioners led to the development of FCC conditions, and I think that's probably what will happen here too,'' Glenchur said.

`Guidepost'

Conditions on last year's mergers probably will be a ``guidepost'' for commissioners' negotiations on the BellSouth deal, Jessica Zufolo, an analyst with Medley Global Advisors in Washington, wrote today in an investor note. ``For some, it will be the starting point for more rigorous negotiations,'' she said.

Shares of San Antonio-based AT&T rose 62 cents to $32.90 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Atlanta- based BellSouth, the third-largest U.S. local phone company, rose 80 cents to $43.23.

The FCC had a vacant Republican seat for more than a year prior to McDowell, a former lobbyist for Comptel, which represents carriers that compete with AT&T and BellSouth. With an even split, Martin agreed last year to Democrat-backed conditions on SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI Inc.

They barred the combined companies from raising rates on certain services for two years. The commission also made the companies comply with network-neutrality principles, such as ensuring that high-speed Internet subscribers can access any legal content they choose.

Neutrality Study

The commission also may start a separate net neutrality inquiry next month, people familiar with the matter said today. Martin circulated a notice last night seeking public comment on the FCC's existing neutrality principles, the people said.

The inquiry ``could be a way for the commissioners to take net neutrality out of the merger discussion and into an industry-wide proceeding,'' Glenchur said.

Internet companies such as Google Inc. are pressing for tougher neutrality rules that would bar phone companies from charging content providers for priority access to new, high- speed networks under construction. Phone companies plan to use those fiber-optic networks to offer television service in competition with cable companies.

Shareholders approved the BellSouth purchase in July. The deal will give AT&T Chief Executive Officer Ed Whitacre control of the companies' shared mobile-phone business, Cingular Wireless LLC, the largest in the U.S. It will also widen AT&T's lead as the dominant local, long-distance and wireless provider, and help it fend off cable-television companies offering phone service.

Share Gains

Once approved by federal regulators, BellSouth investors will get 1.325 AT&T shares for each they now own, representing an 18 percent premium based on the companies' stock prices on March 3, the last trading day before the deal was announced.

The deal was worth $37.09 a share to BellSouth investors when it was announced. Since then, AT&T shares have risen almost 18 percent.

In addition to full ownership of Cingular, BellSouth will give AT&T local-phone and Internet customers in nine states, expanding the company's reach from California to Florida.

The BellSouth acquisition is ``strongly in the public interest, as 18 states have now determined," AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said today in an e-mailed statement. ``We look forward to bringing the benefits of increased innovation and competition to consumers once the merger is approved."

Opponents

A coalition of rival carriers and consumer groups said the sale would lead to ``irreversible marketplace harms" unless the FCC imposes tough conditions.

``It would be precipitous and unprecedented for the commission to take action on this merger while the Department of Justice is under federal judicial scrutiny for its approval of the SBC-AT&T and Verizon-MCI mergers," said Andrew Schwartzman, president of the Washington-based Media Access Project and a member of the Competition Coalition.

A U.S. judge is examining the Justice Department's October 2005 approval of SBC's $16 billion purchase of AT&T Corp., which formed AT&T Inc., and Verizon's $8.44 billion MCI acquisition. Terms of the approval, which required the companies to divest some fiber-optic lines to buildings serving large businesses, were subject to court review.

That court proceeding ``relates primarily to the Justice Department" and ``doesn't really have an impact" on the FCC's review of the BellSouth deal, Martin told reporters last week.

Smithfield's Plan To Buy Rival Spurs Complaints (VAPILOT)

By Jeremiah Mcwilliams, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, September 23, 2006

A coalition of farmers and Midwest senators is protesting Smithfield Foods Inc.'s bid to buy its top pork-producing rival, even as the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division has begun investigating.

Smithfield's planned $810 million acquisition of Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's sixth-largest pork processor, would further extend the Smithfield-based company's reach in the meat industry.

"I cannot fathom how Smithfield, which is the largest and fastest growing integrator, can continue to be allowed to purchase hog operations across the country," said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, in a statement this week. "Over the last several years Smithfield has made it perfectly clear that it intended to purchase its competitors to assert its dominance in the pork industry. This is alarming."

A Justice Department spokeswoman said there was no timeline for completing the antitrust investigation.

The Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Antitrust, Competition Policy and Consumer Rights will hold hearings on the deal in the near future, said its chairman, Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio.

"This merger takes place in an industry already witnessing the decline of independent family farmers, and rapid consolidation in meat production and packing," DeWine said in a statement. "If this merger goes through, farmers will have even fewer choices for selling their hogs, and consumers will certainly be affected."

After the deal, Smithfield would have about 28 percent of U.S. hog-slaughtering capacity and less than 20 percent of the nation's hogs, said Smithfield Chairman Joseph W. Luter III this week.

Smithfield - already the world's largest hog farmer and pork processor - is confident the deal will win approval.

The controversy is "politics as usual," said company spokesman Jerry Hostetter. "We expect the Justice Department to review the deal. We expect to work with them and resolve it."

Midwesterners "don't really like other companies coming into their turf - they don't like big agricultural companies," Hostetter said, noting that Grassley and Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, also opposed Smithfield's $367 million acquisition of pork processor Farmland Foods in 2003. "They always react this way," he said.

Smithfield is contractually bound to pay $100 million to Premium Standard if the deal is terminated because it fails to clear antitrust barriers.

"We were willing to establish that breakup fee because we expect to be able to close the deal," Hostetter said.

Kansas City-based Premium Standard, meanwhile, must pay Smithfield about $27.4 million if the smaller company's board changes its mind and goes against the deal.

Jim Mintert, a professor of agricultural economics at Kansas State University, said that, in order to reject the Smithfield deal, antitrust regulators would have to impose a different standard than is used in other industries.

Smithfield's market share "is large in the food industry, but they're not large by traditional antitrust standards," Mintert said. "If this was any industry but the food industry, and more specifically meat production and packing, this wouldn't even be on the radar screen. Not even close."

Opponents of the deal say small farmers are being squeezed out by consolidation in the meatpacking and hog-growing industries. As vertically integrated conglomerates take control of production from hog farms to ham plants, opponents say independent farms are subjected to tough pricing in a shrinking spot market for hogs.

Nationwide, the number of hog farms shrank from 300,000 in 1989 to 98,000 in 1999 as larger farms took bigger shares of the market, according to University of Arkansas' National Agricultural Law Center.

"The U.S. livestock industry is already heavily concentrated and lacks open and fair competition," said Tom Buis, president of the National Farmers Union, in a statement.

"Allowing the two largest hog businesses to join together would only exacerbate an already unacceptable level of concentration," said Buis, whose group represents about 250,000 farm and ranch families.

C. Larry Pope, president and chief executive of Smithfield Foods, said on a conference call this week that the company would honor Premium Standard's current hog production contracts. In a nod to smaller hog raisers, Pope also said the company is committed to buying a significant number of hogs on the open market.

Wright Friction Expected To Persist (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 23, 2006

Tucked into legislation to repeal the Wright amendment, the words – intended to exempt the deal from antitrust laws – nearly cratered the compromise to lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field.

The language was removed from legislation in the U.S. Senate this week, keeping the Wright fight alive as the clock ticks down on the congressional session.

But the battle is far from over.

Even if the legislation clears Congress next week, the Wright-repeal movement is expected to hit more rocky terrain in a court fight treading over many of the same issues.

The debate over the antitrust language this summer came to represent almost every facet of the decades-long dispute – how to bring airline competition to North Texas, whether Congress should involve itself with the in-city airport, why the effort to repeal a contentious 1979 law needed even more contentious legislation.

Lawmakers from North Texas say their efforts, fighting some of their most powerful colleagues on Capitol Hill, were merely intended as protection to help ensure their Wright legislation survived once it passed.

The deal "was always going to be subject, in my view, to litigation," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell.

But some legislative language about how to treat the agreement could be added protection in front of a trial judge, he said.

The need for an antitrust exemption wasn't expressed in the June agreement among the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport.

The five parties designed their agreement for protection from one another, and penalties were devised if any of the signatories chose to renege on their commitments.

But when the deal moved to Washington in the form of legislation weeks later, the four-word antitrust protection was built in to help protect the five parties from outsiders: The bill deemed that the compromise complied with the U.S. transportation code "and any competition laws."

But that immunity clause, once it was highlighted for congressional committees that oversee antitrust laws, drew a bitter fight – and more questions.

Couldn't the deal stand on its own? Why wouldn't the legislation survive in court if it really was good for consumers?

Wasn't the Wright repeal movement about creating more competition?

Critics of the antitrust exemption intervened, creating hurdles to the legislation that still haven't been cleared completely.

Proponents of the agreement maintain that the deal is good for consumers – or at least that it's better than the current situation, in which Love Field flights are limited to a nine-state region.

Even before the agreement for new language was reached this week, Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said she was not afraid the North Texas compromise would lose a court challenge.

The antitrust immunity, she said, was necessary to protect Dallas from getting tied up in court over the next eight years – a tight timeline for the condemnation of gates and planned improvements to the airport.

The antitrust protection "has nothing to do with our ability to win in court and everything to do with our ability to implement our plan," she said.

The proposal would lift Love flight restrictions in 2014 and immediately allow for one-stop flights beyond the Wright perimeter.

In perhaps the most controversial piece of the deal, the number of available gates at Love would be cut to 20 from 32. Nineteen are now operational. The gate reduction would lead to the demolition of the unused six-gate terminal owned by Love Terminal Partners LP.

That group sued the mayor and the parties and launched a lobbying effort that brought the antitrust exemption before key lawmakers.

The lead attorney for the terminal group, Bill Brewer of Dallas, said the five parties involved in the deal engaged in "collusive activity" that would harm consumers to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

Lawmakers said they expected the terminal group to mount further challenges in court – one reason the bill needed protection from antitrust suits.

Mr. Brewer said, "We are going to press this debate in every way that we can for as long as we can, because we believe that the bill is not proper."

But the legal threat to the parties would be much greater than any challenge by Love Terminal Partners, he said.

"They care about the class-action consumer antitrust actions that will be filed, if this agreement was to take effect and there is no immunity," he said. "There are lawyers lined up outside the courthouse within minutes to file that case."

A House version of the Wright legislation, which North Texas lawmakers plan to push next week, retains the immunity clause but could be substituted with the Senate language if members wanted.

The Senate version removes the antitrust exemption and offers other protective language to show that Congress is ordering the gates at Love to be torn down.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who has been pushing the issue through Congress, said outside parties could still make claims in court, but "we will pass a bill that protects our parties."

"I never felt there was an antitrust issue," she said. "People can sue and cities can make agreements."

Lawmakers from North Texas have been quick to acknowledge that they'll do what the five parties need to get the deal done.

The key, they said, is to explain to their colleagues in Congress the history behind the Wright legislation and why the divisive issue needs to be resolved.

"This problem is largely of Congress' making to begin with," said Rep. Michael Burgess, R-Flower Mound. "I hope people can understand why it is important to us in the D/FW metroplex to have this 35-year-old burr pulled out from under our saddle."

Tigers By The Tail (WSJ)

By Ron Cass

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

Intel executives, coming up on a pre-trial conference in a case that could decide their company's fate, should be looking with envy and admiration at Tiger Woods, and wondering how to make their business more like his.

If golf followed the same path as other businesses, Tiger could expect to face a lawsuit contending that his dominance of professional golf is based on unfair competition. And in fact, a few years back Sergio Garcia whined that Tiger got better practice times, favorable treatment around the course, more protection against distracting fans -- little things that could, Mr. Garcia intimated, explain Tiger's edge. Sportswriters responded swiftly, deriding Mr. Garcia for looking to blame others for his being outcompeted. They understood that sports contests belong on the field, not in the media or the courts.

The same should be true of business. Market-based economies thrive on competition. The competitive economy doesn't yield an infinite number of equally successful firms producing indistinguishable products, but lets winners and losers emerge from marketplace competition. The (inevitably) temporary dominance of one product or one firm spurs others to compete harder. Today, however, many businesses -- especially American ones -- find it easier to restrain a dominant competitor through the courts than to beat it in the market.

Take the case of Advanced Micro Devices and Intel, the dominant chipmaker for PCs and servers. AMD for years played the role of Phil Mickelson to Intel Corporation's Tiger Woods -- the talented rival who keeps coming up short in head-to-head competition. Last year, it decided to model Mr. Garcia rather than Mr. Mickelson, filing an antitrust action against Intel, charging it with a variety of unlawful actions. On Sept. 27, U.S. district court judge Joseph Farnan will determine what day, probably in 2008, this potentially multibillion dollar suit will go to trial.

Lawsuits are not invariably bad things. Intellectual property rights, for example, support investment in innovation, and litigation at times is essential to preserve those rights. Antitrust litigation can also usefully police conspiracies to restrain competition through collusive price-fixing or bid-rigging agreements among supposed adversaries. Unfortunately, the more likely use of antitrust law is to handicap a dominant firm that has been successful in the market. That's the goal of Microsoft competitors, and it seems to be AMD's goal as well.

AMD finds fault in Intel's continued market dominance: Because Intel has had 80% or more of the x86 chip processor market for many years it must be doing something illegal to keep rivals out. Yet, George Stigler, among others, long ago debunked the significance of market share as a measure of competition. Duopoly markets, like the market for large commercial aircraft, can be fiercely competitive. Ask anyone working at Boeing or Airbus.

Moreover, markets can change rapidly, especially high-tech markets, often in ways unanticipated by antitrust suits. Witness the changes in computing that caused the government's antitrust case against IBM to implode.

AMD's share of the server-chip market has risen dramatically over the past two years, from negligible to more than 25%, and its share of the x86 PC-chip market has also passed the 20% AMD's complaint used as a benchmark. That was before recent deals were announced with IBM and Dell that will further increase AMD's market share, and before any activity in the lawsuit (or the EU decision to pursue an investigation based on AMD's complaint). The potential for such dramatic shifts explains why firms like Intel and Microsoft go to great lengths to stay on top of the markets they currently rule.

AMD objects to Intel's pricing and rebate policy. Intel offers computer makers like Dell and IBM rebates if they purchase certain volumes of its chips. The rebates, AMD argues, are illegal because they apply across the board (rather than only to chips purchased above a given volume) and drive prices so low that AMD cannot compete. And because, once the target volume is reached, the rebate operates to reduce the prices of a buyer's entire chip purchase, AMD says Intel is selling the last increment of chips below its cost of production -- i.e., predatory pricing.

Forcing Intel to raise its prices would stifle competition, stand antitrust law on its head, and require Intel (or other dominant firms) to have information about competitors' costs almost certainly beyond its reach. Similarly, as long as the price of the goods to which the rebate applies covers the seller's costs, as AMD apparently concedes, the rebate trigger point shouldn't matter. As an economic and legal matter, whether AMD can compete with Intel's prices is irrelevant.

Still, some theorists and some judges, concerned that rebates could be structured in ways that make competition by rivals more difficult, conclude that courts should police them. To second-guess a firm's prices and rebates, as the AMD-Intel litigation requires, the firm sued must gather, reproduce, disclose and justify sensitive business decisions. Judges are not especially competent to set prices or determine the right way to structure business dealings, and the problems of price-setting where there are high economies of scale are notorious.

The risk of overstepping judicial bounds could be lowered by rules giving strong presumptions of legality to pricing and bundling decisions. Instead, some theories now contemplated by the antimonopoly strand of antitrust law allow for a broad range of ordinary business practices and prices to be deemed illegal. The cost, intrusion and risk associated with judicial intervention are enough to discourage aggressive competition by many highly successful firms -- but that is exactly what the antitrust laws should encourage, not deter.

Clear, simple rules and predictable outcomes advance the rule of law; antitrust statutes focused on clear abuses facilitate competition. But vague rules limiting business practices of successful firms are as useful to market competition as having golf officials second-guess which clubs Tiger Woods can use for particular shots. Letting him compete as aggressively as he can is far better for the game.

The Ultimate Agricultural Efficiency (NYT)

Any American history of pork — the meat, that is — shows a steady concentration of more and more hogs in the hands of fewer and fewer producers. That is what modern agricultural “efficiency” looks like. It’s good for the bottom line of the big industrial players, but bad for farmers, hogs, the environment and, ultimately, consumers. That history took another step in the wrong direction when Smithfield Foods — the biggest pork packer — agreed to buy the second biggest pork packer, Premium Standard Farms.

This is a deal that deserves to be closely examined by antitrust regulators. It would mean fewer markets for farmers and fewer choices for consumers. Already, packing giants like Smithfield and Premium Standard Farms use their market power, when buying hogs, in ways that violate the spirit of the 1921 Packers and Stockyards Act, which prohibits undue price discrimination. Their power in the marketplace allows them to negotiate price premiums that smaller packers can’t offer.

The public should also understand what the deal would mean for the future of American farming. It would push farmers still farther down the road to becoming nothing but contract laborers.

There is little or no role for the independent farmer in this landscape. The logic is simple: Why bother to buy pigs from farmers when you can own them yourself? If this deal closes, more than half the pigs Smithfield kills would be pigs it already owns, a percentage that is sure to increase. The hog farmers' job would no longer be farming. They would be janitors in confinement barns across rural America where the packers' huge herds of pigs are crammed in stalls to live out their short lives.

And that would be the ultimate efficiency of American agriculture — doing away with the farmer by doing away with competitive markets.

Feds Halt Oil Lease Sale On Alaska Slope (AP-Y)

By H.josef Hebert

AP, September 23, 2006

The Interior Department is willing to temporarily abandon the sale of oil leases in an environmentally sensitive area surrounding Lake Teshekpuk on Alaska's North Slope.

In papers filed in federal court in Anchorage, the department asks the court to give the go-ahead to a broader lease sale next week, while the contentious leases in the lake area undergo further environmental review.

U.S. District Judge James Singleton on Sept. 7 blocked the proposed sale of leases in the northeast area of the National Petroleum Reserve Alaska, saying the Bureau of Land Management had not adequately assessed the cumulative environmental impact of the sales including those on about 400,000 acres north and east of Lake Teshekpuk.

The government, in papers filed with the Anchorage court and obtained by the AP on Friday, said it still strongly disagrees with Singleton's conclusion, but asks that the court decision be limited to the leases near the lake so the rest of the sale can proceed.

"BLM ... believes that the ability to go forward with some leasing in the northeast NPRA is in the public interest," the government argued, saying leasing on tracts near the lake could be put off "until further analysis has been completed" to resolve the environmental issues the court raised.

Lawyers for environmental groups, which had filed suit to block the lease sales, said in separate filings they are not opposed to narrowing the order as long as the lake area remains off limits.

"We're not opposed to all leases in NPRA We are opposed to oil leases going near Lake Teshekpuk," said Tony Iallonardo, spokesman for the National Audubon Society, one of the groups that filed the suit.

Deirdre McDonnell, an attorney for Earth Justice in Juneau, cautioned against making too much of the government's filing. "It's not a change of position at all. They're continuing to argue that their decision (to lease the lake area) is legal. I don't see them voluntarily doing anything."

It's not known when Singleton will act in response to the latest court filings.

The Interior Department announced in August it was making available 696 tracts on 8 million acres in the northeast and northwest planning areas of the NPRA, a vast area set aside in 1923 for its oil resource.

The government and some oil companies argue that while the legal issue focuses on leasing in the northeastern NPRA, the judge's decision jeopardizes leases to be sold on a total of 8 million acres including leases in the northwestern portion of the reserve.

Bids on the latest leases were scheduled to be opened Sept. 27.

The leases included nearly 400,000 acres north and east of Lake Teshekpuk, a lagoon-pocked region that environmentalists argue should be free of development to protect caribou and migratory birds.

But the lake area also is believed to have 2 billion barrels of oil and has been eyed by oil companies because of its relatively close proximity to existing development in the Prudhoe Bay area to the east. Most of the other leases in the NPRA are much farther away and less desirable to oil companies.

The BLM, in its filing Thursday, continues to argue that restrictions written into those leases — limiting surface disturbance and requiring corridors for caribou migration — "provide the maximum protection to environmental resources." And, the agency said, additional protections can be imposed if needed.

But it asked the court to revise its order and limit any injunction to the new leases near Lake Teshekpuk that have been the focus of the environmentalists' outrage.

State Concedes On Glades Cleanup (PALMBEACHP)

By Robert P. King, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 23, 2006

Gov. Jeb Bush's administration is abandoning its efforts to end federal court oversight of the state's $1.1 billion Everglades cleanup, a legal maneuver that had drawn fierce criticism from environmental groups, the Miccosukee Indians and members of Congress.

In a letter made public Friday, the state Department of Environmental Protection said it is ending more than a year of talks with the U.S. Justice Department because of doubts that the federal government will pay its full share of a crucial water-restoration project near Everglades National Park.

But one critic said the state seems to be grasping for an excuse to drop a request that was unlikely to succeed anyway.

"They're obviously just looking for a cover," said tribal attorney Dexter Lehtinen, who learned of the state's about-face earlier this week. "It's good news....It's better to win without having to fight the battle."

The cleanup grew out of a lawsuit the federal government filed in 1988. Much the cleanup is still covered by a 1992 court order overseen by U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno, who last year declared that the state has violated some of its promises. That ruling spurred the state to begin talks with federal agencies to change or end the court order, according to the DEP's letter. The negotiations have included meetings in Washington between the governor and appointees of his brother, President Bush, The Palm Beach Post reported in February.

State leaders have said a state-run cleanup under strict federal permits - not endless court hearings - would be the best way to keep the progress going. But opponents said they feared the permits would contain too much wiggle room.

Spinach Illnesses Rise As Inquiry Narrows (NYT)

By The New York Times

The number of people who have become sick with E. coli after eating fresh spinach continued to increase yesterday as federal officials narrowed their investigation and reminded consumers that spinach grown outside three California counties was safe to eat.

The federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported yesterday that 166 people in 25 states had been infected with the E. coli strain traced to spinach grown in California. Although no new bags of contaminated spinach were reported, a Food and Drug Administration official said he considered the outbreak “ongoing.”

Federal investigators in California continue to visit spinach fields and processing plants to examine sanitation practices and look for evidence of standing water, animals, pests or other unusual activity, said Mark Roh, acting regional director of the food agency’s Pacific regional office.

David Acheson, the chief medical officer at the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the F.D.A., emphasized that spinach grown outside the three California counties linked to the outbreak was safe to eat, though he did not say when bags of fresh spinach would be back on grocery shelves.

“Spinach grown in other parts of the U.S. have not been implicated,” Mr. Acheson said, “and the public can be confident that spinach grown there can be consumed.”

A Revised Warning On Spinach (LAT)

By Amanda Covarrubias And David Pierson

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

FDA officials say tainted produce that sickened 166 people nationwide came from facilities and farms in three California counties.

Federal officials Friday lifted their blanket warning against eating fresh spinach, narrowing it to spinach from three California counties linked to an E. coli outbreak that has spread to 25 states.

Food and Drug Administration officials changed their recommendation after determining that tainted spinach that has sickened 166 people nationwide and caused at least one death came from processing plants and farms in San Benito, Santa Clara and Monterey counties.

"At this stage of the investigation, we know spinach grown in the rest of the U.S. and in California is not implicated in the current outbreak, therefore the public can be confident that spinach grown in non-implicated areas can be consumed," said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer for the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

He said in a news conference Friday that state and federal investigators were working to further narrow the area from which the contaminated spinach came.

California growers produce about three-quarters of the nation's spinach, and about 60% of it comes from the three-county region that has been implicated in the outbreak. Other spinach-producing counties are Ventura, Imperial and Riverside.

Outside the state, Arizona, Texas and New Jersey have sizable spinach farms, said Tim Chelling, spokesman for the Western Growers Assn.

He said the FDA's announcement was welcome news to the beleaguered spinach industry. He noted that winter crops would soon be harvested in Imperial County and Yuma, Ariz.

"We want to act responsibly and err on the side of caution, but a blanket warning is extreme," Chelling said.

Many grocery store customers, however, said Friday that they were going to wait awhile before buying spinach again.

Cristina Ward was loading her car with groceries from a Ralphs in Glendale. Not included in her bags was spinach — not for another few weeks, she said.

"I'm going to wait at least two more weeks," said the 31-year-old Glendale resident. "I stopped buying as soon as I heard about the outbreak. I like spinach salads."

Randy Ray, not a fan of spinach to begin with, said the E. coli outbreak just gave him another reason not to like the leafy green.

"I'll have it once in a while, but I'll be much more cautious," the 34-year-old Los Angeles resident said. "I wouldn't buy it Monday."

Roger and Amelia Otway and their 4-year-old son went shopping for a spinach substitute to make salad. The couple said they didn't feel safe eating spinach so soon after the outbreak. "He always called me to remind me not to buy spinach," Amelia Otway said about her husband. "We're going to wait at least two full weeks."

Because it can take up to three weeks for a bacterial infection to be reported to federal authorities, Acheson said officials could expect to see reports of new cases of E. coli through the first week in October.

Mark Roh, acting director for the FDA's Pacific Region, said Friday that a team of 20 investigators had inspected 10 fields and three processing plants in the three counties since Sept. 14, when the outbreak was first reported.

He declined to say what they had found so far. He said they were looking at sanitation practices, housekeeping methods, the cleanliness of equipment, what raw materials were being used, evidence of animal activity or pests, and many other factors.

No specific source of contamination has been identified, but many of those who got sick had eaten bagged spinach produced by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista. At least one bag processed by Natural Selection, from New Mexico, contained the strain of E. coli linked with the outbreak. That company and two others recalled 42 brands of fresh bagged spinach or mixed greens.

The FDA's announcement came as the spinach-related outbreak had widened to half the states in the country.

Of those infected, 88 people have been hospitalized, including a Wisconsin woman who died.

Health officials also were investigating whether the deaths of a Maryland woman in her 80s and a 2-year-old boy in Idaho were caused by the E. coli O157:H7 bacteria found in tainted spinach.

As officials grappled with the outbreak, the California Department of Food and Agriculture pulled whole and raw milk products produced by a Fresno County dairy from shelves after four Southern California children were sickened by E. coli.

The raw milk produced by Organic Pastures sent children in San Bernardino, Riverside and San Diego counties to hospitals, where two were in intensive care, state officials said.

In the two deaths under investigation in Maryland and Idaho, both victims had reportedly eaten spinach before they became ill, but a conclusive link had not been made.

"We still think it's probably the spinach," said Russ Mason, a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health.

Kyle Allgood, 2, of Chubbuck, Idaho, died Wednesday at a Salt Lake City hospital from hemolytic-uremic syndrome, a condition associated with E. coli that can lead to kidney failure.

The Maryland woman, who was described as in her 80s, died Sept. 13.

E. coli O157:H7 causes diarrhea, often bloody. Most healthy adults can recover completely within a week, but some people — usually young children and the elderly — can developed hemolytic-uremic syndrome.

States reporting cases were Maryland (3), Tennessee (1), Arizona (4), California (1), Colorado (1), Connecticut (3), Idaho (4), Illinois (1), Indiana (8), Kentucky (8), Maine (3), Michigan (4), Minnesota (2), Nebraska (8), Nevada (1), New Mexico (5), New York (11), Ohio (20), Oregon (5), Pennsylvania (8), Utah (17), Virginia (2), Washington (3), Wisconsin (42) and Wyoming (1).

3 Children In Md. Sick With E. Coli From Spinach (WP)

By Annys Shin And Mary Otto

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Maryland state health officials have attributed three cases of E. coli illness to a spinach-borne outbreak of the deadly bacterium and are investigating the death of an 86-year old Hagerstown woman who became ill with E. coli after eating bagged spinach.

The three confirmed victims are children, all of whom are recovering, Michelle A. Gourdine, an official of the Maryland Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, said yesterday. Gourdine would not identify the children or say where they live, citing confidentiality concerns. Virginia reported a second case of E. coli yesterday, but state health officials there declined to provide further details.

The outbreak of E. coli O157:H7, which has sickened 166 people in 25 states, has been traced to three counties in and around the Salinas Valley in California. Yesterday, the Food and Drug Administration said spinach from the rest of the country was safe to eat and that it was working on getting it back on store shelves.

"Spinach grown in other parts of the United States has not been implicated," said David W. Acheson, a food-safety official with the Food and Drug Administration.

For now, the FDA continues to warn people not to eat any fresh spinach until the agency and the industry figure out how to label spinach so that it is clear that it is not from the three California counties.

June E. Dunning, 86, of Hagerstown died last week of E. coli after eating bagged fresh spinach. But state health officials have not been able to conclusively connect her death with the national outbreak because of problems with completing a genetic test on the bacterium she was infected with.

"That DNA fingerprint is unavailable . . . It may not be possible to get more information on that elderly resident," Gourdine said. "That case may never be confirmed."

In the Salinas Valley, federal and state health officials continued their hunt for the source of the outbreak, which has been narrowed to a few growers identified through supplier and distribution records provided by Natural Selection Foods LLC, a produce processor. Natural Selection and two other companies recalled products containing fresh spinach.

Mark Roh, acting FDA director for the Pacific region, said five teams of four inspectors each have been to 10 California fields representing at least six growers, and to three processing plants.

They have collected 188 samples of water, soil, spinach and bird droppings, and swabs from processing plants in their attempt to find the source of the contamination.

Every year, Escherichia coli is responsible for about 75,000 cases of illness, and about 50 deaths, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control. In Maryland, 20 to 30 E. coli cases are reported each year, the state health department said. So far this year, 23 cases have been confirmed in the state.

In the past 10 years, there have been 20 outbreaks of E. coli associated with fresh produce. The current outbreak, the second linked to spinach, is far more extensive than earlier ones. Of the 166 people with reported illnesses, 27 have developed complications that can lead to kidney failure, 88 have been hospitalized and one death has been confirmed.

Maryland health officials have identified a total of 10 cases of E. coli 0157 since Aug. 1. Investigators believe the spinach implicated in the outbreak was eaten from Aug. 2 and Sept. 9.

Of those, three reported cases were linked to the nationwide outbreak through DNA tests. Three other cases were found to be genetically unrelated to the outbreak.

Four more cases, including Dunning's, remain under investigation.

"There is no evidence to conclusively link the remaining four, one of which involves a death, to spinach," the state health department said in a written statement. It will continue to study those cases to see if links can be established, the department said.

Outside Dunning's home last night, her son-in-law Warren Swartz declined to comment.

Earlier, he confirmed an account in the Hagerstown Herald-Mail that Dunning fell ill Sept. 1. She developed bloody diarrhea, a common symptom of E. coli O157:H7 infection, after eating bagged spinach that day and the day before.

On Sept. 2, Dunning was hospitalized. Three days later, doctors removed part of her colon. On Sept. 7, E. coli illness was diagnosed. By then, she had fallen into a coma. She died on Sept 13.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Head Of Minneapolis FBI Office Reassigned For 30 Days (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 23, 2006

The move apparently came after he reassigned a star agent after they argued.

The head of the Minneapolis FBI office, Michael Tabman, has been reassigned temporarily because of an accusation that he punished a star agent in the pre-Sept. 11, 2001, investigation of Zacarias Moussaoui, a government source said Friday.

Minneapolis FBI agent Harry Samit, who accused headquarters supervisors of "criminal negligence" in their handling of the Moussaoui case, is charging that Tabman reassigned him because he pressed to speak at a public forum, the source said.

The FBI, in a terse statement that made no mention of Samit, acknowledged Tabman's reassignment "to avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest."This is an internal administrative matter, and it would be inappropriate for the FBI to comment on the specifics of the situation," the statement said. "The FBI has sent an inspector to the Minneapolis field office to determine the facts. It is important to note that until the internal inquiry is complete, no conclusions can or should be made."

The source said that Samit and Tabman apparently argued about who would speak at a national security forum on the Moussaoui case at the William Mitchell College of Law on Sept. 12. John Radsan, a William Mitchell law professor who organized the forum, initially circulated fliers stating that Samit would appear, along with chief prosecutor Robert Spencer and lead defense lawyer Edward MacMahon.

But sometime in August, Radsan substituted Tabman's name for Samit's. Tabman had no involvement in the investigation and arrived in Minneapolis in 2005, long after Moussaoui's arrest while learning to fly a 747 jumbo jet at an Eagan flight school.

Shortly after the argument, the source said, Samit was reassigned from the counterterrorism unit, where he has spent most of his seven years as a FBI special agent. Samit then complained to FBI headquarters, which apparently led to Tabman's 30-day removal from his position, the source said.

Reached at his office, Samit declined to comment on Friday.

Samit, a former naval intelligence officer, has drawn wide praise for his tenacious investigative work on the Moussaoui case in the weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks. He was the lead FBI agent in Moussaoui's Aug. 16, 2001, arrest, after the now-convicted Al-Qaida operative aroused suspicions while at the flight school.

Samit was a key witness for both sides at Moussaoui's death-penalty trial last spring --the only U.S. prosecution stemming from the Sept. 11 attacks. During his testimony, Samit described how he quickly became convinced that Moussaoui was a terrorist and sent more than 70 communications to Washington in pursuit of a warrant to search Moussaoui's belongings -- a request that was never granted. A search after the attacks turned up clues to the terror plot.

In his testimony, Samit acknowledged making scathing remarks about headquarters supervisors' handling of the case.

Tabman, a native New Yorker who joined the FBI in 1983, has been special agent in charge in Minneapolis since January 2005. Two months later, he oversaw the bureau's investigation at the Red Lake Indian Reservation, where a high school student fatally shot nine people before killing himself. Before coming to Minneapolis, Tabman spent two years as an inspector for the FBI.

Tabman has been temporarily replaced in Minneapolis by the FBI's special agent in charge from San Antonio.

The Duluth News Tribune, September 23, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - The head of the Minneapolis FBI office, Michael Tabman, has been temporarily sent back to Washington as the bureau conducts an internal inquiry into "an ongoing internal administrative matter," a spokesman said Friday.

Minneapolis FBI spokesman Paul McCabe wouldn't provide details of the investigation or who it involves. He said the FBI has sent an inspector to the Minneapolis office to determine the facts.

"The special agent in charge of the Minneapolis field office has been temporarily assigned to FBI headquarters to avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest," McCabe said. "It is important to note that until the internal inquiry is complete, no conclusions can or should be made."

KMSP-TV, citing unidentified sources, reported Thursday night that the inquiry involves a claim by Minneapolis agent Harry Samit of workplace retaliation for his criticism of superiors.

McCabe wouldn't confirm that, and a phone number for Samit wasn't immediately available. The FBI's press office in Washington referred calls to McCabe.

Samit was one of two agents who arrested convicted terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui at a flight school in Eagan 3 1/2 weeks before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and tried in vain to get a search warrant for Moussaoui's computer before 9/11.

DOJ_NMG_0068091

Testifying in Moussaoui's trial in March, he accused his superiors of "criminal negligence" in rejecting 70 entreaties he made during August and early September 2001 to get a search warrant for Moussaoui's computer and start a full criminal investigation.

He also testified that FBI headquarters' refusal to follow up on his warnings "prevented a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks" that killed nearly 3,000 people.

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 23, 2006

BRIEFING: MINNEAPOLIS

The head of the Minneapolis FBI office has been ordered back to Washington, D.C., while an investigation is conducted into an internal administrative matter, an agency spokesman confirmed Friday.

Michael Tabman, special agent in charge of the Minneapolis field office, has been temporarily reassigned to "avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest" during the investigation by an agency inspector, according to a statement.

The reason for the investigation was not disclosed, and Tabman's reassignment was described as temporary.

KMSP-TV, citing unidentified sources, reported Thursday that the inquiry involves a claim by Minneapolis agent Harry Samit of workplace retaliation following his criticism of superiors. Samit was one of two agents who arrested convicted terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui at a flight school in Eagan about a month before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Testifying at Moussaoui's trial in March, Samit accused his superiors of criminal negligence in rejecting his entreaties to obtain a search warrant for Moussaoui's computer during August and in early September 2001.

Tabman has headed the Minneapolis office since January 2005. FBI spokesman Paul McCabe declined to comment on the television report.

"It is important to note that until the internal inquiry is complete, no conclusions can or should be made," McCabe said.

Hampton Inn looks at Midway site

Take out one hotel in the Midway and put in … another hotel?

A year after the closing of the FourPoints Sheraton hotel, a familiar name in the hospitality industry is hoping to develop a Hampton Inn on a nearby parcel.

Bill Morrissey, whose St. Paul-based firm Morrissey Hospitality Cos. manages the St. Paul Hotel, said Friday he's pursuing discussions with property owner Target. His company is interested in building and managing a 125-room hotel on the southwest corner of University Avenue and Syndicate Street.

Target purchased and shut down the Sheraton last year to make room for a new SuperTarget, which is beginning to take shape along Interstate 94. Morrissey said he would be interested in sharing parking with the store.

The Sheraton enjoyed decent occupancy rates but was hampered by the higher costs associated with running a full-service hotel, Morrissey said. His Hampton Inn would have a better shot at succeeding financially as a limited-service hotel, he said.

Target did not return phone calls Friday afternoon.

Indoor toilets back in use at Ramsey

After a week of using portable toilets lined up outside their school, students and staff at Ramsey Junior High got their bathrooms back Friday.

Crews at the St. Paul school, 1700 Summit Ave., have been working since Sept. 12 to clear a blockage that caused sewage to back up, forcing classes to be canceled one day last week.

A break was found in the sewer line underneath the school, said Patrick Quinn, the district's executive director of operations. That had not been fixed by Friday, but a temporary bypass system had been installed that allowed the restrooms to reopen.

Quinn said the district staff is considering ways to permanently fix the problem without having to tear up the school's floor.

Two classrooms remain closed. The school's kitchen has been usable because it has a separate sewer connection, Quinn said.

Service centers get major award

New immigrants who learned English through St. Paul's Neighborhood House include one graduate who started his own drywall company. Another found a career in teaching math to newcomers and preparing them for high-school equivalency testing.

Now, the English-language-learning offerings at the West Side institution have received national attention for those success stories.

The United Neighborhood Centers of America and the Annie E. Casey Foundation honored the West Side institution with a $20,000 national award for its English-language-learning instruction.

The Minneapolis-based Family and Children's Service received the same award, which recognizes creative programs that help families advance economically by connecting them with community resources.

Both nonprofits will be expected to share their "best practices" with other organizations across the country.

2 In Police Corruption Case Are Granted Bail (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 23, 2006

Strict limits set for pair by judge

No cellphones. No computers. No visitors, including their children's playmates, unless they're on an approved list. And absolutely no leaving the house, unless they're strapped to a stretcher and heading to the hospital for emergency care.

Those were just some of the restrictions a federal judge set yesterday while granting bail for two Boston police officers who are charged with conspiring to traffic cocaine and heroin, in one of the department's biggest corruption cases.

The homes of Carlos A. Pizarro, 36, and Nelson Carrasquillo, 35, both in Dorchester, will be searched for weapons before the two are released, on Monday at the earliest.

Their home telephones will be monitored, and the officers will be fitted with electronic bracelets that will trigger an alarm if they stray outside.

The court must approve all visitors before they come.

``I don't want any witness to run any risk," said US District Judge William G. Young, who ordered the restrictions after prosecutors argued that Pizarro and Carrasquillo might try to recruit others -- possibly via the Internet or on disposable cellphones -- to intimidate or harm the government's key witness or his family.

When Pizarro's lawyer, R. Bradford Bailey, asked if the names of children coming to the home for play dates with Pizarro's 9-year-old daughter and 5-year-old son also had to be approved by the court, Young said, ``Yes! This is going to interfere with people's living."

Both Pizarro's wife, Michele, and Carrasquillo's wife, Sharon, told the judge that they understood the strain the conditions would put on their families, but were willing to abide by them and report any violations in order to have their husbands home.

The government urged Young to overrule a magistrate judge who had ordered Pizarro, a 10-year veteran of the department, and Carrasquillo, a seven-year veteran, released on bail.

The alleged ringleader in the case, Officer Roberto Pulido, 41, of Hyde Park, a 10-year veteran assigned to the motorcycle unit, has been ordered jailed without bail until the case is resolved.

The three officers were arrested July 20 in Miami on charges that they protected 100 kilograms of cocaine while it was being trucked to Boston in June by undercover FBI agents posing as drug dealers.

Carrasquillo and Pulido were also charged with protecting an earlier shipment of 40 kilograms of cocaine.

An FBI affidavit filed in court alleges that Pulido was involved in a wide array of crimes, including identity theft, steroid trafficking, and protecting illegal after-hours parties where uniformed officers mingled with drug dealers and prostitutes.

Yesterday, Assistant US Attorney John T. McNeil argued that Pizarro and Carrasquillo might flee if released and would pose a danger.

He cited FBI tapes played during earlier court proceedings in which Pulido boasts that those who helped him protect drug shipments knew that ``if something goes bad and they're at fault, somebody is going to pay, either with their life or their children's lives."

But lawyers for Pizarro and Carrasquillo argued that Pulido's statements about killing children were false bravado and that their clients had no history of violence.

Young said he believed the strict conditions would protect witnesses, while allowing the officers to remain free until their trial. Both officers must also post $50,000 in cash and $200,000 in real estate.

After the hearing, Stephen Neyman, Carrasquillo's lawyer, called the judge's bail conditions fair and said Carrasquillo, a father of three, was grateful for the opportunity to be free after spending 24 hours a day locked in a cell.

Pizarro's lawyer said the family's willingness to abide by such strict restrictions to have him home was ``a real testament of their support" for the officer.

Accused Cartel Bosses Nearing Guilty Plea Deals (AP)

By Curt Anderson, The Associated Press

AP, September 23, 2006

Agreement may save some relatives of brothers suspected of running Cali ring.

MIAMI -- The two brothers accused of running Colombia's Cali cocaine cartel are nearing an agreement with U.S. prosecutors to plead guilty in exchange for guarantees that some relatives won't face charges and will be allowed to keep some assets not linked to drug trafficking, The Associated Press has learned.

Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela would likely spend the rest of their lives in U.S. prison under the tentative deal, according to federal law enforcement officials and lawyers familiar with the negotiations. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the agreement was not finalized Friday.

The pleas would cap a massive 15-year U.S. investigation into the Cali cartel, which made more than $2 billion in profits by smuggling some 250 tons of cocaine into the United States since the 1970s. More than 100 other members of the cartel have been convicted since 1991 and the U.S. government has sought forfeiture of $2 billion in drug proceeds from the brothers.

The guilty pleas by the brothers and release of the final agreement could come as early as Tuesday, the officials and lawyers said. As of Friday afternoon, U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno had not scheduled a change of plea hearing, according to his office.

If the deal is completed, six of 28 family members in Colombia would receive guarantees that they would not be prosecuted on specific obstruction of justice and money laundering charges, the law enforcement officials said. The family members would not be given blanket immunity from extradition to the United States and prosecution for any other possible crimes.

All 28 family members could eventually be removed from a U.S. Treasury Department list that freezes assets of suspected drug traffickers and bars them from doing business in the United States. First, however, they would have to show they have forfeited an unspecified amount of assets linked to drug money.

The family members also would be permitted to keep houses and other assets in Colombia under the deal that involves agreements with the government in Bogota, according to the officials. But they also would have to show that those were not "directly or indirectly" traceable to drug proceeds, according to language in the agreement cited by one U.S. official.

The U.S. Justice Department in Washington declined comment. Lawyers for the Rodriguez Orejuela brothers and their family members confirmed that an agreement resolving the case was imminent but had not yet been signed by the defendants.

"The parties have worked feverishly to reach a resolution in this case that benefits everybody," said Roy Kahn, who represents Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 62. "I expect that a final resolution will come to light shortly."

David Oscar Markus, lawyer for Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, 67, used a sports analogy to describe the status of the talks. "We are at the 1-yard line and anticipate resolving this matter shortly," he said.

"We are moving forward and hopeful to have an agreement among all parties," added Marc Seitles, the Miami lawyer for the Colombian family members.

Claudia Rodriguez Mondragon, daughter of Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, told The Associated Press in Bogota that there was nothing definitive yet but that the "family was waiting for lawyers and judicial authorities to finish their work so that next week (her father and uncle) could decide whether or not to sign" a plea agreement.

The tentative deal is the product of months of intense negotiations between the U.S. Justice, Treasury, State and Homeland Security departments, defense lawyers and those of the family members, and government officials in Colombia.

The brothers were convicted of drug charges in Colombia in 1995 and sent to prison there but were extradited to the United States to face a federal indictment alleging they continued to run their empire from prison. Colombia and the United States signed a new extradition treaty in 1997 that has led to more than 300 drug traffickers facing U.S. justice.

Federal prosecutors had been seeking forfeiture of $2.1 billion in assets linked to the brothers.

Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela's son, William Rodriguez Abadia, pleaded guilty in March to taking over much of the cartel's operations after the 1995 arrests of his father and uncle. Rodriguez Abadia agreed in his plea deal to testify for the government and to forfeit some $300 million in assets linked to drug profits, including his interest in the Drogas La Rebaja pharmacy chain, which has 350 stores in Colombia.

Rodriguez Abadia, 40, was sentenced to over 21 years in U.S. prison, an agreement that granted his wife, two children and mother-in-law permanent legal residency in the United States.

Alleged Leaders Of Cali Cartel Draw Closer To Negotiating Plea Deal (MCT)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - The two brothers accused of running Colombia's notorious Cali cocaine cartel are close to pleading guilty in a deal with federal prosecutors that would give benefits to their family members, defense lawyers for Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela said Friday.

The men "are trying to do the honorable thing and save their family," said David O. Markus, attorney for Gilberto Rodriguez-Orejuela.

The agreement, expected to be finalized as soon as next week, does not require the accused drug kingpins to cooperate with the government in other drug cases, he said.

But the settlement is no sweetheart deal for the brothers. The tentative agreement calls for a 30-year sentence, meaning the men are likely to spend the rest of their lives in prison. In addition, they would give up billions of dollars worth of assets, said individuals close to the case who wished to remain anonymous.

"We're just about there," said Roy Kahn, who represents younger brother Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela. "A lot of things have been agreed to in principle."

Gilberto Rodriguez-Orejuela, 67, known as "the Chess Player," and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, 62, known as "El Senor" have been held in the maximum security wing of Miami's Federal Detention Center since their extradition to the United States in 2004 on drug conspiracy charges.

The deal caps off a massive government investigation into the Cali cartel - a family-run drug trafficking syndicate that once supplied 80 percent of the world's cocaine.

According to a half-dozen individuals close to the case: The agreement would grant immunity from prosecution to six of the men's grown children in Colombia and prevent the U.S. government in some circumstances from seizing family members' homes and other financial assets. The Treasury Department would remove 28 relatives from a list of suspected drug traffickers subject to economic sanctions.

The negotiations involved months of discussions with the U.S. treasury and justice departments, federal prosecutors in Miami and New York, and Colombian authorities, the individuals said.

According to a senior law enforcement official, the relatives given immunity in the deal were under investigation for obstruction of justice, not drug trafficking.

U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno is expected to hold a change of plea hearing Sept. 26.

Miami attorney Mark Schnapp, former chief of the criminal division at the U.S. Attorney's Office, said the case shows international drug dealers are not beyond the reach of U.S. law.

"Any time prosecutors can reach out and bring to justice leaders of a foreign drug organization it's a huge accomplishment," he said.

Colombian authorities arrested Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela in Cali in 1995. Both were serving sentences in a Bogota prison when a federal grand jury in Miami indicted them in 2003.

The U.S. indictment alleged conspiracies to import and distribute cocaine, launder money and obstruct justice through bribes and murder.

Federal authorities said the cartel found creative ways to bring cocaine into the United States, including hiding the drugs in concrete posts, frozen vegetables, lumber, ceramic tile, coffee, and chlorine cylinders.

According to prosecutors, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela continued to run the family business from prison, turning over day-to-day operations to Miguel's eldest son, William Rodriguez-Abadia.

The case took a turn in March, when Rodriguez-Abadia, 40, pleaded guilty and agreed to testify for the government against his father and uncle. As part of his plea deal, the government agreed to give Rodriguez-Abadia's wife, mother-in-law, and two children residency in the United States.

Study Condemns F.D.A.'s Handling Of Drug Safety (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

WASHINGTON, Sept. 22 — The nation's system for ensuring the safety of medicines needs major changes, advertising of new drugs should be restricted, and consumers should be wary of drugs that have only recently been approved, according to a long-anticipated study of drug safety.

The report by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, is likely to intensify a debate about the safety of the nation's drug supply and the adequacy of the government's oversight. The debate heated up in September 2004 when Merck withdrew its popular arthritis drug Vioxx after studies showed that it doubled the risks of heart attacks.

Several senators have already proposed significant changes, some of which the report seems to endorse.

The report's conclusions are often damning. It describes the Food and Drug Administration as rife with internal squabbles and hobbled by underfinancing, poor management and outdated regulations.

"Every organization has its share of dysfunctions, unhappy staff members and internal disputes," the report said. But panel members said that they were deeply concerned about the agency's "organizational health" and its ability to ensure the safety of the nation's drug supply.

The report made these recommendations, most of which would require Congressional authorization:

¶Newly approved drugs should display a black triangle on their labels for two years to warn consumers that their safety is more uncertain than that of older drugs.

¶Drug advertisements should be restricted during this initial period.

¶The F.D.A. should be given the authority to issue fines, injunctions and withdrawals when drug makers fail — as they often do — to complete required safety studies.

¶The F.D.A. should thoroughly review the safety of drugs at least once every five years.

¶The F.D.A. commissioner should be appointed to a six-year term.

¶Drug makers should be required to post publicly the results of nearly all human drug trials.

In a telephone conference with reporters on Friday, top F.D.A. officials struck an awkward balance between thanking the institute for its work and defending their own leadership. They said they needed to study the report before deciding which of its recommendations to endorse.

"While considerable work has been done over the past two years to improve our approach to drug safety, work still needs to be done," said Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach, the acting commissioner of the agency and the nominee for commissioner.

An internal e-mail message sent Friday to agency staff members by Dr. Sandra L. Kweder, deputy director of the Office of New Drugs, was blunter, bemoaning the report's criticism of what it described as the agency's dysfunctional culture.

"It is a long, inflammatory section of the report that will certainly generate the most public attention and hit our people hard," Dr. Kweder wrote, according to a copy provided to The New York Times.

Agency critics were elated.

"The new report validates what the watchdog community has been saying for the last two years," said Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, who as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee has overseen investigations into drug safety problems. "Problems are systemic, and solutions must reflect a new mind-set by the agency leadership."

The drug industry, through its trade organization, reacted warily. "Though there is always room for improvements, it would be a mistake to accept the notion that the F.D.A. drug safety system is seriously flawed," said Caroline Loew, senior vice president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

The Institute of Medicine is a nonprofit organization created by Congress to advise the federal government on health issues. The report was issued by the Committee on the Assessment of the United States Drug Safety System, led by Sheila P. Burke, deputy secretary and chief operating officer of the Smithsonian Institution.

The report described fierce disagreements between those who approve drugs and those who study their effects after approval, disputes that repeated F.D.A. efforts have not resolved. Indeed, managers' failure to address such disagreements competently "has played an important role in damaging the credibility" of the agency, it said.

Critics of the food and drug agency have long been divided into two warring camps. Some say the agency fails to approve life-saving medicines quickly enough, while others say that it is so intent on rapid approvals that it fails to ensure the safety of the drugs.

The institute's report champions the latter view by calling for greater caution. It suggests that one of the agency's biggest problems is a deal struck in 1992 between Congress and the drug industry in which drug makers agreed to pay millions in fees to speed reviews. This deal has increased pressures on drug reviewers to act quickly, and it has limited "the ability of reviewers to examine safety signals as thoroughly as they might like," the report said.

"Some also have serious concerns that the regulator has been 'captured' by industry it regulates, that the agency is less willing to use the regulatory authority at its disposal," the report said, criticizing the agency's regulatory tools as "all-or-nothing."

"The agency needs a more nuanced set of tools to signal uncertainties, to reduce advertising that drives rapid uptake of new drugs, or to compel additional studies in the actual patient populations who take the drug after its approval," it said.

The pharmaceutical industry is likely to fight at least some of the proposals, said Charlie Cook, a Washington political analyst.

"One should never underestimate the influence of the drug industry," Mr. Cook said. "But I would think that at least the outlines of many of these recommendations would have a decent chance of getting through Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0068096

Senators Michael B. Enzi, Republican of Wyoming and chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the ranking Democrat on the committee, have jointly proposed a bill that would undertake at least some of the changes advocated by the report.

Another bill, sponsored by Senator Grassley and Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, offers similar proposals.

There is little chance that Congress will act on any of these proposals before next year, when it must reauthorize the 1992 financing deal with the drug industry. Negotiations between the drug industry and agency about the parameters of that deal are already under way.

Despite its fierce criticisms, the report may bolster the confirmation prospects of Dr. von Eschenbach. A Senate committee approved his nomination on Wednesday, but two Republican senators have vowed to block it.

Over the past 10 years, no commissioner has served more than two years, though the term is open-ended. The report deplored this "lack of stable leadership."

"Without stable leadership strongly and visibly committed to drug safety, all other efforts to improve the effectiveness of the agency or position it effectively for the future will be seriously, if not fatally, compromised," the report states.

It recommends that the commissioner be nominated for a six-year term, but such a change may not solve the problem of early exits. President Bush has nominated two past commissioners. The first left for another job within the administration; the second left amid accusations of financial improprieties.

The report recommends that Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, appoint an independent board to advise the commissioner "to implement and sustain the changes necessary to transform" the agency's culture.

It rejects suggestions by Mr. Grassley and others that the F.D.A. create a center for drug safety to monitor drugs after approval.

"Achieving a balanced approach to the assessment of risks and benefits would be greatly complicated, or even compromised, if two separate organizations were working in isolation from one another," the report concludes.

The F.D.A. asked the Institute of Medicine to review its drug safety system shortly after the Vioxx withdrawal in 2004, and the agency has agreed to pay $3 million for the study.

The federal system for approving and regulating drugs is in serious disrepair, and a host of dramatic changes are needed to fix the problem, a blue-ribbon panel of government advisers concluded yesterday in a long-awaited report.

The analysis by the Institute of Medicine shined an unsparing spotlight on the erosion of public confidence in the Food and Drug Administration, an agency that holds sway over a quarter of the U.S. economy. The report, requested by the FDA itself, found that Congress, agency officials and the pharmaceutical industry share responsibility for the problems -- and bear the burden for implementing solutions.

The report represents a watershed moment after two years of controversy over the safety of such widely used drugs as pain relievers and antidepressants. The Institute of Medicine is part of the National Academies, chartered by Congress to advise the government on scientific and health policy issues. Its recommendations traditionally carry great weight.

The 15 experts drawn from academic and professional organizations were unanimous in endorsing the recommendations, which called for several major policy changes. Several of these have long been urged by drug safety advocates but have been resisted by the industry, Congress and the FDA itself. A number of them would require congressional approval.

The panel called for a moratorium on consumer advertising of newly approved classes of drugs until they have been on the market long enough for unrecognized side effects and risks to emerge. Packaging for new types of medications should also carry a special symbol, such as the black triangle required in Britain, to alert patients that the drug's safety profile would not be fully known until it had been more widely studied, the report said.

The FDA should reevaluate safety and effectiveness data of such new drugs within five years after initial approval, the panel added, and the agency needs new powers to impose fines and requirements on drugmakers. In addition, the report called for the agency to have authority to place a wider range of restrictions on drugs it deems risky.

Manufacturers should also be required to register all clinical trials they sponsor in a government-run database to allow patients and physicians to see the outcome of all studies, not just those published in medical journals, the report said. Studies that show positive results for a drug are more likely to be published by journals than negative ones.

The committee also took aim at FDA management, citing a history of intra-agency squabbling and conflicts of interest on the expert advisory panels appointed by the agency to review the scientific data on proposed new drugs and devices. A substantial majority of advisory panel members should have no ties to industry, it said.

"FDA's credibility is its most crucial asset, and recent concerns about the independence of advisory committee members . . . have cast a shadow on the trustworthiness of the scientific advice received by the agency," the report said.

To reduce turnover and political interference, the institute said, the FDA commissioner should be appointed to a fixed six-year term. Currently, the commissioner serves at the pleasure of the president.

Agency officials said they will take the report seriously but added that changes implemented over the past year meant that the report is somewhat out of date. Acting FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach said the agency is especially focused on improving its scientific, technological and communication methods.

The pharmaceutical industry echoed the agency's response.

"Though there is always room for improvements, it would be a mistake to accept the notion that the FDA drug safety system is seriously flawed," the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America said in a statement. "After all, fewer than three percent of approved prescription drugs have been withdrawn from the American market for safety reasons over the last 20 years."

But Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who has led a number of investigations into the workings of the FDA in recent years, said the agency's reaction to a report it had commissioned speaks volumes.

"The FDA appears to be focused on damage control rather than addressing its core problems," Grassley said in a statement. "As a science-based agency, the FDA is remarkable for its lack of introspection, second-guessing, and failure to assess its own performance and capabilities in a systematic way."

Much of the institute's report focused on a central gap in drug regulation: While the FDA demands strict data on efficacy and safety from clinical trials before approving a new drug, less attention is paid after the drug reaches the market.

A safety problem that occurs once in every thousand patients, for example, would be unlikely to show up in clinical studies of a few hundred people, but it could result in thousands of serious side effects once the drug is approved and being taken by millions. The current system for monitoring adverse effects is nowhere near as systematic as the evidence collected before approval, the report said.

Besides, said R. Alta Charo, a panel member and bioethicist at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, patients who participate in drug trials are carefully selected, and hardly typical of patients in the real world who usually suffer from more complex problems.

"A drug tested in a few hundred or thousand people is very different when used by millions, especially over long periods of time and in conjunction with other supplements," she said.

While the agency can negotiate with companies to conduct long-term, post-approval studies, there are glaring gaps in such information, the report said. This is partly why the report also recommended limits on advertising new drugs. The report's authors acknowledged, however, that limits on advertising could run afoul of constitutional free-speech guarantees.

Charo also cited "a lack of collaboration among divisions, tensions [and] inappropriate management" at the FDA, saying officials who focus on safety issues are chronically underfunded compared with those who handle new-drug approvals.

Part of the problem, the report said, is that the money paid by industry to help fund FDA's regulators, under a 1992 law designed to speed up new drug reviews, cannot under the law be diverted to FDA's safety division, which suffers from chronic underfunding.

"What the report does not do very well is explain that the vast majority of interactions at the center are successful," countered Steven Galson, who directs the FDA division that evaluates new drugs. Still, he added, "I accept the recommendation and see it as an opportunity to improve."

Scott Lassman, senior assistant general counsel for the drug industry group, said it would study the report carefully. He said that the industry is open to suggestions for greater transparency but that the FDA already has enough authority to act after drugs are approved.

The trade group also opposes mandatory registration of clinical trials because that would force companies to reveal trade secrets to competitors, Lassman said. Manufacturers also oppose restrictions on advertising, he said, adding that advertisements help educate patients about problems and treatments.

FDA Is Criticized Over Its Handling Of Drug Safety (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

A closely watched report from the Institute of Medicine criticized the Food and Drug Administration's handling of drug safety and called for major changes, including increased resources and new power to impose restrictions on the marketing and distribution of medicines.

The report, which the FDA itself requested after a series of controversies over medicines, including the withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, concluded that the agency's drug-safety system is hurt by a shortage of money, serious cultural and structural problems, and "unclear and insufficient regulatory authorities." The report also said that neither the FDA nor the drug industry "consistently demonstrate[s] accountability and transparency" in disclosing safety concerns.

The findings could have a major impact on how the FDA handles drug safety. The legislation that gives the agency authority to collect user fees from the pharmaceutical industry must be renewed next year, and Congress is likely to use the opportunity to debate changes in the FDA system for ensuring the safety of medicines.

The senators who lead the committee that oversees the FDA -- Sen. Michael Enzi, a Wyoming Republican, and Sen. Edward Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat -- already have introduced a drug-safety bill. So has Iowa Republican Charles Grassley, who chairs the Senate Finance Committee and has investigated the FDA on several safety matters.

The FDA cited a number of moves it said were already under way "systematically addressing" several of the report's points, including improving the agency's system for tracking drug side effects and working on cultural issues. Andrew von Eschenbach, the agency's acting commissioner, said "work still needs to be done" and the report "will help illuminate and help us to focus some of those efforts." Dr. von Eschenbach said he hasn't in the past believed the FDA needs new authority but that the agency will continue to examine the question as part of its review of the report.

The report called for the FDA's enforcement authority to be "clarified and strengthened." It said the user-fee legislation should include specific safety goals and that the FDA needs new power to impose tough safety measures, such as limiting distribution of a drug to certain specially trained doctors, with violations punished by fines. The report also warned that the agency faces "chronic underfunding" and needs substantial new resources.

Echoing previous criticism, the report pointed to significant cultural problems and "organizational dysfunction" at the FDA's drug center, including sharp staff divisions and lower status for the drug-safety office. The report called for more-stable FDA leadership. The FDA said it had started regular meetings between drug reviewers and safety staffers.

For the first two years drugs are on the market, the report called for restrictions on consumer advertising and a special symbol on the labels indicating they are new. The report said the FDA should do a substantial review of any new information about drugs within five years of their entry onto the market and include a drug-safety staffer on each team that reviews a drug before it is approved. It also endorsed an expanded role for the FDA's outside advisory committees, which the report says should examine all innovative new drugs before or soon after they go on the market.

An official with the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America said the industry reveals safety concerns when they are confirmed and the group will "take a long, hard look" at the institute's report. The Institute of Medicine is part of the National Academies, an independent research organization that advises the federal government.

Report Slams US Drug Safety Regime (FT)

By Christopher Bowe In New York

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

The US drug safety system is feeble compared with drug approval efforts, and suffers from “organisational and cultural problems”, said a much-anticipated independent federal report.

The Institute of Medicine (IOM) report echoed the harshest critics of the Food and Drug Administration’s safety regime. The scathing conclusions found “a lack of clear regulatory authority, chronic underfunding, organisational problems and scarcity of post-approval data about drugs’ risks” in the FDA safety regulation.

The IOM report recommended a number of remedies, which ranged from direct FDA changes to congressional intervention for funding and legal changes. Its recommendations includ- ed limits on advertising for new drugs, increased power for the FDA’s drug safety division, more funding, and clearer legal authority and enforcement tools.

Although it is unclear how many of the recommendations could be implemented, the report’s findings will add to pressure on the pharmaceutical industry.

Sheila Burke, chair of the report committee, consisting of respected US health experts, said: “We found an imbalance in the regulatory attention and resources available before and after approval. . . Regulatory authority that is well-defined and robust before approval diminishes after a drug is introduced to the market.”

Dr Andrew von Eschenbach, acting FDA chief, said the report acknowledged the agency had implemented changes over the last two years, but added: “Work still remains to be done.”

The IOM report also serves as another milestone highlighting how the controversy over Vioxx, a painkiller withdrawn by the US drugmaker Merck, has changed the drug industry.

The FDA commissioned the IOM report after Merck suddenly withdrew Vioxx from the market two years ago. A company study found that Vioxx increased the risk of heart attack and stroke.

Merck had vigorously defended its safety against critics warning of potential heart risks, while also marketing Vioxx to a wide population. Its sales peaked at $2.5bn (£1.3bn) annually.

Man Facing Charges Over Bomb Kit (INDYSTAR)

By Vic Ryckaert

The Indianapolis Star, September 23, 2006

A 26-year-old Far-Northside man has been arrested after officers found bomb-making ingredients, al-Qaida literature and gas masks in his apartment, police said Friday.

Federal counterterrorism experts assisted in the investigation, FBI agent Wendy Osborne said, but the case was left to local authorities to investigate.

"We have no reason to believe that he is a terrorism threat," Osborne said.

The Marion County Sheriff's Department arrested Joseph Bagley on an initial charge of criminal recklessness. He was being held in the Marion County Jail on $15,000 bond.

Deputies found gas masks, batteries, chemicals, electronic devices and components used to make bombs in Bagley's apartment in the 700 block of Lake Nora South Court, according to a police report.

Bagley admitted to mixing the chemicals "for experimental reasons," Sheriff's Department spokesman Capt. Phil Burton said.

"It disturbs us, based on the things we found in his apartment," Burton said.

Officers also seized books on Muslim names and understanding United States government documents, and literature on al-Qaida and former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's bomb maker, according to the report.

While police had not found evidence that links Bagley to a terrorist group, Burton said detectives seized computer equipment and compact discs from Bagley's home that would be scrutinized.

"We'll know more after our cybercrime unit is able to examine the computer," Burton said.

Managers at the Lakeside Pointe at Nora apartments tipped off police after a carpet- cleaning service person reported that Bagley's apartment "looked like a terrorist cell," according to the police report.

"I think they did a great job in handling the situation," Bloomquist said. "We were concerned for the safety of the other residents in the building."

IMMIGRATION:

Man Faces Deportation After WWII Lie (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, September 23, 2006

Troy retiree and U.S. citizen since 1955 says he fibbed about role to flee Ukraine 'to save my life.'

An 85-year-old Troy man who was an officer in a Nazi-sponsored police force in Ukraine during World War II admitted Friday he lied about what he did during the war when he applied to immigrate to the United States in 1949.

The U.S. government wants to strip John (Ivan) Kalymon of his U.S. citizenship and deport him, alleging he shot at Jews the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police were rounding up in 1942, killing at least one person and wounding at least one other.

Kalymon, a retired Chrysler worker, admits he was on the police force but denies rounding up Jewish people or firing a shot.

His son, Alexander, also of Troy, says John Kalymon has dementia and prostate cancer and no family in Ukraine. He and his family will be devastated if he has to leave his home of nearly 60 years, the son said.

John Kalymon's denaturalization hearing in Detroit before U.S. District Judge Marianne Battani is expected to wrap up next week.

DOJ_NMG_0068100

On Friday, a senior trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., confronted John Kalymon with captured wartime records documenting pistol shots fired by a Ukrainian Auxiliary Police officer with his name during a roundup in the L'viv Jewish ghetto in 1942.

"Did you know Jews were being taken away?" William Kenety asked.

John Kalymon said he did not remember. "I know there was taking but I was not in the particular area," he said.

John Kalymon admitted he lied by omitting any mention of his police service and changing details about where he lived during the war when he applied to immigrate to the United States. He testified he lied because the Soviets chased out the Germans and he was afraid of what might happen if he was sent back to Ukraine and the Soviets learned of his war record.

"In my opinion, I didn't lie, but I tried to save my life," John Kalymon testified.

He said he was not a Nazi and did not support or participate in Adolf Hitler's plan to eliminate Jews.

On Monday, John Kalymon's wife of 62 years is expected to testify. John Kalymon has one son and one granddaughter. He is represented by Birmingham lawyer David Domina.

John Kalymon, who was a Polish citizen before he became an American in 1955, would likely be deported to Ukraine, said his son.

"You saw him on the (witness) stand," Alexander Kalymon, 57, said of his father. "He has no one over there. He's incapable of being able to manage day-to-day life."

But Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, an international Jewish human rights organization based in Los Angeles, said since the U.S. government does not prosecute Nazi war criminals, John Kalymon should be deported.

"We are talking about participating in the crime of genocide and in this case someone who was not a bystander but an active participant," Cooper said.

Last year, the government stripped the citizenship of another Chrysler retiree, Iwan Mandycz, who was a guard in 1943 at the SS camp Poniatowa near Lublin, Poland. A federal appeals court recently upheld that decision and his deportation is pending.

Michigan Man Denies He Participated In Nazi Persecution (MCT)

By David Ashenfelter, Detroit Free Press

McClatchy News, September 23, 2006

DETROIT - A retired Chrysler factory worker admitted Friday that he served in a Nazi-controlled police force in Poland during World War II but denied killing, wounding or persecuting Jewish prisoners.

During 3 1/2 hours of testimony in a trial in U.S. District Court in Detroit to strip him of his U.S. citizenship, John (Ivan) Kalymon, 85, of Troy admitted he was in the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, a unit that a government witness testified was heavily involved in rounding up Jews in and around L'viv, where Kalymon was based in the early 1940s, for deportation to work camps and extermination centers. L'viv now is in Ukraine.

Kalymon insisted that he never participated in and wasn't aware of such activities.

But under questioning by William Kenety V of the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, Kalymon admitted that he failed to disclose his two-year involvement in the Ukrainian police when he came to the United States in 1949. He became a U.S. citizen in 1955.

Kalymon was the third witness to testify in a six-day bench trial before U.S. District Judge Marianne Battani . Kenety and Justice Department lawyer Jeffrey Menkin want her to revoke Kalymon's citizenship so he can be deported.

In his testimony, Kalymon denied signing a police report that said he and another man shot at Jewish prisoners during a roundup of 2,128 Jews on Aug. 14, 1942, killing one and wounding another.

He also denied firing shots during two other roundups that month in which other Jews were killed.

The government had called two expert witnesses, including a historian who testified about the events in and around L'viv during the war.

The government plans to submit deposition testimony Monday from three other witnesses, including a now-deceased Army officer who interviewed Kalymon before he entered the United States.

Kalymon's lawyer, David Domina, plans to call two witnesses, including Kalymon's wife of 62 years, Lubow Kalymon, to testify next week. Domina also plans to submit deposition testimony from a California man who served in the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and said he never was asked to take part in any action against Jews.

Church To Fight IRS Demand For Documents (AP-Y)

By Gillian Flaccus

AP, September 23, 2006

A liberal church that has been threatened with the loss of its tax-exempt status over an anti-war sermon delivered just days before the 2004 presidential election said Thursday it will fight an IRS order to turn over documents on the matter.

"We're going to put it in their court and in a court of law so that we can get an adjudication to some very fundamental issue here that we see as an intolerable infringement of rights," Bob Long, senior warden of All Saints Church, told The Associated Press.

He said the church's 26-member vestry voted unanimously to resist IRS demands for documents and an interview with the congregation's rector by the end of the month.

The church's action sets up a high-profile confrontation between the church and the IRS, which now must decide whether to ask for a hearing before a judge, who would then decide on the validity of the agency's demands.

IRS spokesman Terry Lemons would not comment specifically on the dispute but noted in a statement that the agency could take a church to court.

"We recognize the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and religion," Lemons said. "But there is no constitutional right to be exempt from federal taxation."

Religious leaders on the right and left have expressed fear that the dispute could make it more difficult for them to speak out on moral issues such as gay marriage and abortion during the midterm election campaign.

At a news conference Thursday, church officials were flanked by about 40 representatives of mosques, synagogues and other churches.

"We smell intimidation, it smells rotten, and we should not allow any aspect of intimidation to be directed to any member of our great country," said Maher Hathout, senior adviser of the Muslim Public Affairs Council.

Under federal tax law, church officials can legally discuss politics, but to retain tax-exempt status, they cannot endorse candidates or parties.

The dispute at the 3,500-member Episcopal church centers on a sermon titled "If Jesus Debated Senator Kerry and President Bush," delivered by a guest pastor. Though he did not endorse a candidate, he said Jesus would condemn the Iraq war and Bush's doctrine of pre-emptive war.

According to the IRS, the only church ever to be stripped of its tax-exempt status for partisan politicking was a church near Binghamton, N.Y., that ran full-page newspaper ads against President Clinton during the 1992 election season.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Report Says Education Officials Violated Rules (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

Department of Education officials violated conflict of interest rules when awarding grants to states under President Bush's billion-dollar reading initiative, and steered contracts to favored textbook publishers, the department's inspector general said yesterday.

In a searing report that concludes the first in a series of investigations into complaints of political favoritism in the reading initiative, known as Reading First, the report said officials improperly selected the members of review panels that awarded large grants to states, often failing to detect conflicts of interest. The money was used to buy reading textbooks and curriculum for public schools nationwide.

States have received more than $4.8 billion in Reading First grants during the Bush administration, and a recent survey by an independent group, the Center on Education Policy, reported that many state officials consider the initiative to be highly effective in raising reading achievement. But the report describes a tangled process in which some states had to apply for grants as many as six times before receiving approval, with department officials scheming to stack panels with experts tied to favored publishers.

In one e-mail message cited in the report, from which the inspector general deleted some vulgarities, the director of Reading First, Chris Doherty, urged staff members to make clear to one company that it was not favored at the department.

"They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive deleted] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags," Mr. Doherty wrote.

Mr. Doherty recently resigned from the department to "return to the private sector," Katherine McLane, a department spokeswoman said.

Officials relayed reporters' requests for comment to Mr. Doherty, and he declined to be interviewed, an official said.

The abuses described in the report occurred during 2002 and 2003, when Rod Paige was education secretary. John Grimaldi, spokesman for the Chartwell Education Group where Mr. Paige is chairman, said he had not read the report but would seek Mr. Paige's reaction to it.

"Some of the actions taken by department officials and described in the inspector general's report reflect individual mistakes," Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement. "Although these events occurred before I became secretary of education, I am concerned about these actions and committed to addressing and resolving them."

Officials will review by the end of the year all Reading First applications that the department approved, to determine that they met all applicable requirements, Ms. McLane said.

The report recounts how during the formation of a review panel in 2002 a journalist asked the department whether federal officials were trying to stack the panel so that some reading programs would not be treated fairly.

The report cited the Reading First director's response to the department employee who relayed the journalist's question: "Stack the panel? ... I have never heard of such a thing ....<harumph, harumph>" the director replied.

"The response," the report concluded, "suggests that he may indeed have intended to 'stack' the expert review panel."

The report mentions Reid Lyon, the former chief of a branch of the National Institutes of Health, who was a research adviser to President Bush and an architect of Reading First. He exerted immense influence at the department when Mr. Paige was there.

In 2002, Dr. Lyon told the Reading First director and other department officials that a woman whom the department had already selected to be on a review panel had been "actively working to undermine" a reading initiative he favored, the report said.

"Chances are that other reviewers can trump any bias on her part," Dr. Lyon told the officials.

"We can't uninvite her," a senior adviser to Mr. Paige wrote in response, the report said. "Just make sure she is on a panel with one of our barracuda types."

The incident demonstrated "the intention of the former senior adviser to the secretary to control another panelist," the report said.

In an interview yesterday, Dr. Lyon said that in the 2002 incident he sought to neutralize bias.

"If we detected bias, we had to make sure that the review panel was put together so that that bias would be neutralized," he said.

Dr. Lyon left the national institutes in August 2005 and is now an executive vice president for Higher Ed Holdings, a company based in Dallas that is working to found a college of education.

"Oh man, I'm mortified," Dr. Lyon said of the report. "To see the facts that were presented today was very disappointing, because it's an outstanding program."

The investigation was opened last year after the inspector general received accusations of mismanagement and other abuses at the department from publishers of several reading programs, including Robert E. Slavin, a director of a research center at the Johns Hopkins University who is chairman of Success for All, a nonprofit foundation that produces reading materials.

"The department has said at least 10,000 times that they had no favored reading programs, and this report provides clear evidence that they were very aggressively pressing districts to use certain programs and not use others," Dr. Slavin said.

Audit Finds Ethical Lapses In U.S. Reading Program (WP)

By Ben Feller

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

A scorching internal review of the Bush administration's billion-dollar-a-year reading program says the Education Department ignored the law and ethical standards to steer money how it wanted.

The government audit is unsparing in its view that the Reading First program has been beset by conflicts of interest and willful mismanagement. It suggests that the department broke the law by trying to dictate which curriculum schools must use. It also says that program review panels were stacked with people who shared the director's views and that only favored publishers of reading curricula could get money.

In one e-mail, director Chris Doherty told a staff member to come down hard on a company he didn't support, according to the report released yesterday by the department's inspector general. "They are trying to crash our party, and we need to beat the [expletive deleted] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags," Doherty wrote, the report says.

Doherty is resigning, department spokeswoman Katherine McLane said. Asked whether his quitting was in response to the report, she said only that Doherty is returning to the private sector after five years at the agency. Doherty declined to comment.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings pledged to swiftly adopt all the audit's recommendations. She also pledged a review of every Reading First grant her agency has approved. About 1,500 school districts have received $4.8 billion in Reading First grants.

Reading First aims to help young children read through scientifically proven programs, and the department considers it a jewel of No Child Left Behind, Bush's education law. Just this week, a separate review found that the effort is helping schools raise achievement.

But from the start, the program has been dogged by accusations of impropriety, leading to several ongoing audits. The new report from the Office of Inspector General -- an independent arm of the Education Department -- calls into question the program's credibility.

The ranking Democrat on the House education committee was furious. "They should fire everyone who was involved in this," said Rep. George Miller (Calif.). ". . . This was an intentional effort to corrupt the process."

Spellings said the problems happened in the early days of the program, which began in 2002, before she was secretary. She said those responsible have left the agency or been reassigned.

The audit found that the department:

· Botched the way it picked a panel to review grant applications, raising questions about whether grants were approved as the law requires.

· Screened grant reviewers for conflicts of interest but then failed to identify six who had a clear conflict based on their industry connections.

The report does not name Doherty, referring to him as the Reading First director. It says he repeatedly used his influence to steer money toward states that used a reading approach he favored called Direct Instruction (DI). In one case, the report says, he was told that a review panel was stacked with people who backed that program.

"That's the funniest part -- yes!" he responded in an e-mail in 2002. "You know the line from Casablanca, 'I am SHOCKED that there is gambling going on in this establishment!' Well, 'I am SHOCKED that there are pro-DI people on this panel!' "

Spellings took issue with the use of such e-mails in the audit. The IG said the e-mails were written by Doherty in his role as director, and it said there is no evidence that they were inaccurate or pulled out of context.

The audit also faults other officials who had a big hand in Reading First, including Susan B. Neuman, the former assistant secretary of elementary and secondary education.

Spellings, who became secretary in 2005, said she is not aware of any effort to favor certain reading programs. "I'm doing everything I can at this point," she said. "I can't undo what's been done."

N.Y. English Scores Drop Sharply In 6th Grade (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

The share of students in New York State who are reading and writing at grade level drops sharply between the fifth and sixth grades and keeps declining through middle school, according to the first results of a new state testing system adopted to comply with the federal No Child Left Behind law's requirements for tracking year-to-year progress.

The scores for the 2005-6 school year, which were released yesterday by the state education commissioner, Richard P. Mills, also showed an increase in the proportion of students in the state performing at the lowest level.

"The overall pattern is disturbing," Mr. Mills said at a news conference in Albany. "Literacy is the problem. This pattern is not inevitable. This pattern has to change. All youngsters have to emerge from middle school ready for high school. We still have a lot of work to do." He added: "We have to do something different. We have to change our tactics, our curriculum, our approach."

The steady erosion of student achievement through eighth grade offers a particularly bleak outlook on New York State's chances of meeting the goal of No Child Left Behind, which seeks 100 percent proficiency in reading and math among all categories of students by 2014 and imposes sanctions on schools and districts for failing to make annual progress.

Since the state began testing in the fourth and eighth grades in 1999, the middle school results have lagged behind.

Yesterday's results, for the first time, allowed state officials to pinpoint exactly where student achievement begins to drop off sharply. The big change comes between the fifth and sixth grades, the year when many students move into middle school. More than 1.2 million students took the exam last January.

The scores offered a sobering portrait for virtually all types of school districts in the state. Although wealthy suburban districts continued to far outperform poor urban ones, the decline in performance from the fifth through eighth grades was equally apparent in the richer locales, with the trend holding across Westchester and Nassau Counties as surely as in the Bronx or Buffalo and rural counties like Allegany.

Statewide, yesterday's results showed 69 percent of third graders meeting reading and writing standards, compared with 68.6 percent of fourth graders, 67.1 percent of fifth graders, 60.4 percent of sixth graders, 56.4 percent of seventh graders, and 49.3 percent of eighth graders. Across all grades, 61.5 percent of students met the standards.

Still, there was relatively positive news for New York City. Even though the adoption of a new set of tests makes direct comparisons to prior years statistically unreliable, the test found 61.5 percent of the city's third graders to be on or above grade level in English. That was 8 points higher than a city test found the prior year.

The proportion of fourth graders who met the standards was virtually unchanged at 58.9 percent. Statewide, the share of fourth graders at or above grade level declined 3.8 points, to 68.6 percent.

Schools Chancellor Joel I. Klein said that since 2002, New York City had outperformed other urban districts and made better progress than the state as a whole. And though he said much work had to be done, he was thrilled with the results. "I think that the work we are doing is powerful," he said at a news conference.

New York State's other big cities — Yonkers, Buffalo, Rochester and Syracuse — all showed more substantial declines in fourth grade performance. New York City also showed a solid increase in the percentage of eighth graders meeting the state standards, outpacing a slight increase statewide.

In one disappointment for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, the state results cast doubt on extraordinary gains by the city's fifth graders last year. The state results showed 56.7 percent of the city's fifth graders on or above grade level, a decline of about 10 percentage points from the previous city test.

The pattern in New York State can be found in Michigan and Florida and is showing up around the country as states expand their testing systems. Some researchers say the problem is not in middle schools, where the scores are weak, but in earlier grades.

E. D. Hirsch Jr., the author of a recent book, "The Knowledge Deficit," said students do not learn enough vocabulary and content knowledge at younger ages.

Daniel P. Keating, director of the Center for Human Growth and Development at the University of Michigan, said schools should prepare students earlier for the more abstract and sophisticated reasoning required in middle school.

"Perhaps the early preparation is not anticipating that shift to having those higher demands," he said, adding that tests for younger children do not measure those skills. "All of a sudden we're looking for the kinds of skills that just haven't been assessed earlier."

The scores in New York State were released in the fall this year, rather than in the spring, because of technical work required by the new exams, angering parents and educators. The timing also led New York City to promote hundreds of students in the third, fifth and seventh grades who, it turned out, had not met Mr. Bloomberg's criteria for moving on.

Officials said those students would not be pulled back a grade, but would be given extra help.

The mayor's rules require any student scoring at the lowest possible level on the test to be held back, and in the city that number was 11.4 percent in grades three through eight.

The city was not alone in having an increase in students performing at the lowest possible level — known as Level 1 — showing they have serious academic deficiencies.

Last year, state officials boasted that they had reduced those numbers to their lowest levels since testing began in the 1998-99 school year. But this year, 9 percent of fourth graders scored at the lowest level, up from 5.4 last year, while 9.5 percent of eighth graders similarly scored at the lowest level, up from 6.6 percent.

Overall, 8.1 percent of students in all grades scored at Level 1, which in eighth grade becomes an almost-certain prescription for failure in high school. "Students at Level 1 are going to have great difficulty passing their courses," Mr. Mills said.

In previous years, state officials had repeatedly stressed the greater complexity of skills that students were required to demonstrate on the eighth grade exam to explain the relatively good performance on fourth grade tests and lackluster results in eighth grade.

But armed yesterday with the data across all grades, Mr. Mills said he believed there was a widespread and dangerous slacking off in literacy instruction beginning in the fifth grade at many schools, and he called on educators to raise their vigilance.

"They certainly are not learning to read in a powerful way; they certainly are not learning to write as they should," Mr. Mills said. "Adult literacy scores are too low, but this is where it begins. It begins with a decision to just let it go, to just let it go when a child doesn't learn to read at the very beginning."

Mr. Mills said the state's Board of Regents had long been concerned about the transition from elementary to middle school and those concerns were bound to be heightened. "There has to be a hand-off not only of the students, but also of what they know and what's expected," he said.

Will Public Lose Confidence In Census? (AP-Y)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, September 23, 2006

When Elizabeth Mazur found a census taker's business card stuck inside her door last fall, she dutifully called the number and agreed to take part in a monthly survey on income and poverty.

Some questions were personal: Who did she live with? How much money did she make? Where were her parents born?

Mazur, a 29-year-old lawyer in Chicago, said she was happy to answer. But after hearing that Census Bureau workers have lost 672 laptop computers since 2001, including 246 that contained personal data, she's not sure she'd do it again.

"You hear stories about people, schemers pretending to be a bank employee," Mazur said. "Knowing there have been problems (at the Census Bureau), I would be less willing to do it if somebody I didn't know called me."

The Commerce Department, which oversees the Census Bureau, this week became the latest federal agency to acknowledge losing laptop computers containing sensitive information. Overall, the department has lost or had stolen 1,137 laptops since 2001 — the largest number of computers that any agency has publicly acknowledged losing.

All the computers containing personal information were protected by passwords or encryption technology. Still, the disclosure raises questions about the government's ability to protect sensitive information, said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va.

At least eight other federal agencies have reported computers with sensitive information lost, stolen or illegally accessed in recent months. The biggest case was at the Department of Veterans Affairs, which had a computer containing the personal information of 26.5 million veterans and military personnel stolen. The computer was eventually recovered with no data accessed.

"The reality is, we are incapable of storing, moving and accessing information," said Davis, who vowed to pursue legislation to improve security. "The American people deserve better from their government." Davis chairs the House Government Reform Committee, which has requested information about lost or stolen computers from all Cabinet agencies. He hopes to compile a report by next week.

Rep. Michael R. Turner, R-Ohio, chairman of the House subcommittee on the census, said he plans to hold hearings on how the computers were lost and how to prevent losses in the future.

There is no evidence that any personal information from the Census Bureau's computers has been accessed or misused, said Ruth Cymber, the agency's director of communications. Publicly disclosing personal information from census surveys is a crime punishable by up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Census officials do not know how many people had their personal information on the lost or stolen computers, Cymber said. On average, a computer would contain information from 20 to 30 households at any given time.

Most personal information from census surveys would be insufficient to steal a person's identity, according to security experts. However, 81 of the lost computers may have contained Social Security numbers.

Among the Census Bureau computers containing personal information, 104 were stolen and 113 were not returned by former employees. The rest were lost or misplaced. Cymber said the bureau is working with state and local police to try to retrieve computers from former workers.

When possible, the Census Bureau has withheld pay from workers who did not return computers, Cymber said. Most of them were temporary hourly workers paid to gather data door to door.

Security analysts said it would take a computer expert to access a laptop protected by a password. One protected by encryption technology would be even more difficult to access.

"The casual thief likely won't know how to break them," said Peter Swire, a law professor at Ohio State University and the chief privacy counselor for the Clinton administration.

In the meantime, census officials are concerned about losing the public's confidence. The Census Bureau conducts about 120 surveys a year, questioning more than 3 million households about everything from their race and ethnicity to their employment status and how many bathrooms they have in their homes. Most of the questions are mandated by law. The information is used by economists, government planners, marketing companies and academic researchers.

"We cannot do our work without public confidence," Cymber said.

Americans are required by law to answer questions from census takers. But census officials had to go back to 1962 to find a case of someone being prosecuted.

Gary Gordon, a Utica College professor and an expert on identity fraud, said the Census Bureau will have to repair its reputation if it wants Americans to continue answering questions voluntarily.

"People are learning that they need to protect their personal identifiers and trust is big issue," Gordon said.

For her part, Mazur was philosophical about the possibility that some computer thief might learn how much money she made last year.

"I feel like there's so many ways that we're vulnerable, what's one more laptop being lost by the government?" she said.

Luring Customers From Medicare (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, September 22, 2006

For years, private insurers have offered alternatives to the federal Medicare program that are meant to give patients lower-cost options than the government coverage provides. More than 7 million people now subscribe to such plans, out of a total Medicare population of 42.5 million.

But suddenly a type of private insurance plan is gaining ground that looks very similar to the basic coverage long available to anyone with a federally issued Medicare card.

And the government is paying the private insurance industry a subsidy of 11 percent per patient, on average, to provide it.

Since the government substantially increased the subsidies two years ago for these most basic private industry plans — known as private fee-for-service — enrollment in the plans has grown tenfold to 820,000. About 18,000 people signed up in August alone, Medicare said yesterday in its latest update. And some analysts expect enrollments to double or even triple by 2009.

The $7 billion that Medicare will pay private industry this year to provide this fee-for-service coverage is at least $770 million higher than the government would spend covering those patients itself, based on the 11 percent calculation.

Critics see the trend as further evidence that the government is paying private industry to take Medicare off its hands.

It is a “back-door way of trying to privatize Medicare,” said Dr. Jack Lewin, the chief executive of the California Medical Association, a physicians’ group. But the Bush administration’s Medicare chief, Dr. Mark B. McClellan, insisted yesterday that the trend “is definitely not a ‘push to privatization,’ ” but simply a way to give people with Medicare more choices. “The original Medicare program is and remains an option for those who prefer it,’’ said Dr. McClellan, who plans to step down next month.

Private insurers can offer more choices and cost breaks to patients, he said, while providing overall better health care that will end up saving the government money.

The 11 percent calculation comes from the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission, an independent federal research body that advises Congress. And some insurance executives say the figure is an exaggeration. But there is little dispute that federal subsidies are encouraging the insurance industry to recruit members for the plans.

And while the current industry coverage can be a good deal for some patients, critics worry that Medicare patients reliant on private insurers could be left stranded if the federal money is eventually cut.

“We are very concerned that Congress is going to pull back on the funding,’’ Dr. Lewin said, “and we will be left with a private system that offers fewer benefits and is going to be influenced by Wall Street.’’

Critics say the growing transfer of the nation’s $342 billion Medicare program to private industry has already been playing out through other means, like the new Medicare Part D drug program and various Medicare-linked managed care plans and H.M.O’s offered by private insurers.

Providing Medicare coverage in all its guises has become a $60 billion-a-year business and one of the few profitable growth areas for insurers. Medicare enrollees look especially attractive to insurers, as the industry’s other main clientele — corporate America — struggles to meet the growing cost of providing health benefits to working people.

The fee-for-service plans, the focus of the current controversy, are in many ways similar to the government’s own Medicare. Under the industry version, patients have the right to choose their own doctors and hospitals — as they have long been able to do with their federally issued Medicare cards.

And as with the federal program, enrollees in the private fee-for-service plans typically pay a monthly $88.50 premium to the government.

Under the industry plans, moreover, the hospitals and doctors receive the same rates as when they are paid through the basic federal Medicare program.

Experts say that because the administrative costs of providing the private policies are minimal, they represent easy income for the insurance companies, with profit margins of 4 percent or so.

But many see the private fee-for-service Medicare plans as mainly a feeder program in which insurance companies hope to gradually convert members into even more complex, more profitable private Medicare offerings that the government also subsidizes.

The more lucrative plans, like Medicare health maintenance organizations or doctor-network managed care programs, which have been available longer, can yield profits in the 10 percent range, analysts say.

The more basic private fee-for-service plans, around for less than a decade, were authorized through an amendment to the 1997 balanced budget act as a way to ensure that elderly people could obtain adequate health insurance. Now the plans are envisioned as primarily for rural Americans who typically have few medical choices.

The insurance industry largely ignored the fee-for-service plans until the insurers' subsidies were increased by $14 billion over 10 years by the 2003 Medicare overhaul legislation. Insurance lobbyists had argued that expanding private Medicare programs would eventually lower the government's costs.

But insurers "are not really being asked to do anything for additional subsidies," said Marilyn Moon, a longtime Medicare researcher who served as a public trustee of the program — a watchdog role — during the Clinton years. She is now at the American Institutes for Research, a nonpartisan research center in Washington.

The leader by far in private Medicare fee-for-service, with more than half the total members, is Humana. UnitedHealth and WellPoint are also big players.

John M. Bertko, a Humana vice president, says benefits included having nurses stay in touch with discharged hospital patients with chronic diseases to make sure they were following doctors' orders.

Other selling points for the private insurance plans include predictable out-of-pocket co-payments — typically $5 to $20 for doctor visits. That compares with the uncertainties patients face under traditional federal Medicare, in which they are responsible for 20 percent of whatever the doctor charges.

The monthly premiums of $12.50 each for Mr. Smith, 68, and Mrs. Smith, 70, are in addition to their government Medicare premiums of $88.50 each. But the Smiths say the private plan is paying off.

Mrs. Smith recently had heart bypass surgery. And though the bill has not yet arrived, she knows that the hospital deductible for her Secure Horizons plan is $600, compared with the $952 she would be responsible for under traditional Medicare.

And instead of 20 percent of the approved doctors' fees in traditional Medicare, the Smiths pay only $10 to a primary care doctor and $20 for specialists. Secure Horizons pays the rest out of its subsidies from Medicare — which are $692.29 a month, on average, for each fee-for-service member in that part of the country.

Like the Smiths, more than half of the private fee-for-service enrollees so far have also chosen drug coverage, and many are choosing a plan that combines both.

One is Cathy Watts, 58, of Decatur, Ill., a former nurse who says she had to retire four years ago because of Parkinson's disease and partial paralysis. Last January she signed up for a fee-for-service offering from Humana that included Part D drug coverage.

Other than the government's $88.50 Medicare premium that is deducted from her monthly Social Security check, Ms. Watts pays no premium to Humana.

She says the drug coverage was the main lure for her because her drug bill last year was $6,000.

"I will probably pay $3,600 this year" for drugs, she said. "So that will be better." And she can still see the doctors of her choice.

While insurers do run a risk of losing money on a patient if he or she has unexpectedly large health costs, the companies can consult county-by-county Medicare cost data and decide where to offer coverage and which high-cost areas to avoid.

In southern Illinois, where Mrs. Watts lives, the average monthly rate the government is paying an insurer to provide Medicare fee-for-service is $692.29 — the same as in Mr. Martin's town in Indiana.

Under Medicare's complicated rules, though, the amount actually paid to a company for a patient can vary. Around the nation, depending on local medical costs and the health profile of Medicare-eligible residents, the monthly federal subsidy to the insurance company can range from $400 to $2,500, said Dr. Scott Latimer, a Humana executive based in Tampa, Fla.

Enrollments in the fee-for-service plans are still primarily, though not exclusively, concentrated in rural and small cities. Before the Medicare subsidies were increased in 2003, insurers had little incentive to focus on such places. With few doctors and sometimes only one or two hospitals in such areas, insurers typically have little bargaining power. And the health care providers have often balked at accepting the lower fees and second-guessing often associated with managed care insurance networks. But when enough patients in a local area have been enrolled in the private fee-for-service plans, the companies say local health care providers may have little choice but to join the insurers' Medicare networks.

Rick Jelinek, the chief executive of UnitedHealth's Secure Horizons Medicare business, acknowledged that the company's strategy was "in the longer term, to build networks around our programs."

With such networks in place, he said, the company could help manage patients' health — and the insurer's costs — through techniques like having nurses provide telephone health counseling aimed at helping keep patients with heart disease and diabetes avoid hospitalization.

Dan Mendelson, a former Clinton administration health official who is now the president of Avalere Health, a Washington research and consulting firm that advises insurance companies, said the private fee-for-service trend "should save money for Medicare by improving patient care."

But Ms. Moon, the Medicare researcher, said she was "unconvinced by the logic that says, 'If we are overpaying the health plans now, they will save us money later.' "

Treasury Softens Line On Home Loan Giants (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie In New York

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

The treasury department under Hank Paulson is softening its long-held stance that mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac should face strict limits on their holdings of mortgages and securities.

Congress is sparring over how strictly a proposed new regulator will define the portfolio limits for the two government-sponsored enterprises, which both buy mortgages and package them as securities, and act as traders in the secondary market for mortgage-backed bonds.

The GSEs have scaled backed their presence in the mortgage market in the wake of accounting scandals in recent years, but together they still hold a portfolio of $1,400bn mortgage assets.

The size of these portfolios and use of derivatives has been a hot topic with regulators and Congress, with officials at the treasury and Federal Reserve expressing concern about systemic risk to the financial system.

Last year the House of Representatives and Senate banking committee passed bills governing Fannie and Freddie, with the Senate adopting a tougher stance that would cap portfolio assets.

But treasury officials now say they are willing to be more flexible. Randal Quarles, treasury undersecretary for domestic finance, told the Financial Times: "It's important people understand we are open to working and engaging in an alternative approach in regulating the size of the portfolios.''

As the window for a compromise among lawmakers closes, Mr Quarles said the treasury department was hopeful about Congress reaching agreement.

"There is scope before the recess and certainly scope after that.

"We are a couple of yards away from the goal line,'' he said.

With concerns growing about falling housing prices, the proposed flexibility over portfolio limits has also not escaped the notice of the bond market.

Richard Gilhooly, senior fixed- income strategist at BNP Paribas in New York, said: "When you have a risk scenario and housing increasingly faces the prospect of a hard landing, you do not want to handcuff yourself from dealing with the situation.''

Gerald Lucas, senior investment adviser at Deutsche Bank in New York, said: ''When you get a new treasury secretary it's a chance for a fresh approach. The market will be happy with a regulator that has teeth and still allows the GSEs to participate.''

Probe Of FAA Contracting Finds Waste (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

A Federal Aviation Administration contracting program, initially hailed as a way to make the agency more efficient, was so poorly managed that it cost the government millions of dollars in overruns, according to a government investigative report and legislators who reviewed its conclusions. The FAA has disbanded the program.

The program was designed to allow the FAA to obtain services faster and cheaper by using 142 approved vendors.

But the FAA ran into major problems shortly after the program's inception in 2002 because contracts were supervised poorly, many were not put out for competitive bids and officials did not set proper labor rates, according to a report to be released Monday by the Transportation Department inspector general's office.

The report does not say precisely how much the FAA was overcharged by contractors but describes a variety of problems, including the hiring of former FAA employees by contractors.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who requested the investigation, said the program's problems cost the government tens of millions of dollars.

"It's just outrageous how the FAA was not looking out for the taxpayers' dollars," Grassley said in an interview. "Three words would sum this up: absolutely no accountability."

FAA officials said they disbanded the program months ago and did what was necessary to resolve leftover problems.

The inspector general's report says the FAA never set standard labor rates for the program's contractors, forcing officials to negotiate them with each new contract. That caused officials to take twice as long as usual to award contracts.

The FAA also did not set labor qualifications for contractors, the report says. One contractor charged the FAA $35 an hour for the work of an administrative assistant. Four weeks later, it called the worker an analyst and raised her hourly rate to $71 without providing proof of her qualifications, the report says.

The inspector general estimated that labor costs alone could have created overruns of $24 million to $44 million if the program and the contracts been allowed to continue.

More than half the contracts were not put up for bids, the report says. The FAA is allowed to award sole-source contracts, but of eight such contracts reviewed by investigators, only one was found to have had "adequate justification."

The report says companies were eager to hire former FAA employees. One offered a finder's fee for such workers, and 21 percent of its employees had worked for the agency.

"While this practice does not violate any government regulations, it creates significant risks to FAA's ability to maintain arms-length relationships with its contractors when negotiating contract terms or overseeing contractor performance," the report says.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who also pushed for the inspector general's investigation, said the hiring of former FAA employees by contractors troubled him.

"There is nothing wrong with hiring experienced people, but there is plenty wrong with hiring people and giving them a job they are not qualified to do," he said.

FAA officials said they took steps more than a year ago to address issues raised by the inspector general. They began requiring the agency's deputy administrator to review all no-bid contracts worth more than $1 million, and the chief financial officer began approving all contracts worth more than $10 million.

By March, the FAA had disbanded the program. The agency has put all but five of the remaining contracts up for bids. It also has set guidelines on how to deal with former FAA employees and relatives of current workers, officials said.

"We have dissolved this entire program," said Laura Brown, an FAA spokeswoman. "We have already taken many of the steps that the IG recommended, and as the IG noted, we have agreed to most of the recommendations and we are taking further actions in response" to the report.

The report does not identify the companies or the FAA officials involved in the contracts. A spokesman for the inspector general's office declined to provide such information, referring questions to the FAA.

The investigation began last year when Debra Srite, an FAA contracting officer, and an unidentified colleague approached auditors and Grassley to raise questions about a contract with Crown Consulting Inc., a District firm with 180 employees.

A government audit last year found that Crown overbilled the FAA by $56,317 over four months. The audit attributed much of the overbilling to Crown's exaggerating the qualifications of its employees.

The audit report said at least two Crown employees were not qualified to do the work for which Crown was billing the FAA. Crown officials could not be reached for comment last night.

Srite, who left the FAA a month ago because she said she felt pressure on the job after pointing out problems with Crown's contract, said she was pleased by the inspector general's report.

"They hit most of everything," Srite said in a telephone interview. She said she still wanted investigators to look into "a lot of property that is not accounted for."

A Bad Court-Splitting Plan (NYT)

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

The Senate held hearings this week on a proposal to split the San Francisco-based United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in two. The idea is being promoted as a way to reduce the court workload. The Ninth Circuit is very large and busy, but the proposal would actually do little to solve the overload problem. Its real aim is not efficiency, but a conservative, anti-environmental agenda.

The Ninth Circuit, which covers nine Western states plus Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands, is the largest of the nation's federal judicial circuits. The reason is simple: California. With the state's enormous growth, the number of cases presented to the Ninth Circuit has also grown rapidly, although there is no evidence that the court has been unable to handle its work.

If Congress wanted to help, it would divide California into two different circuits. But instead, it is considering a bill that would put California and Hawaii into a "new" Ninth Circuit, which would have more than 70 percent of the court's current caseload, while putting the remaining states in a newly created 12th Circuit. To make matters worse, the new Ninth Circuit would get less than 60 percent of the allotment of permanent judges.

While the bill does not solve any problem, it would create new ones while requiring, by the court system's estimate, nearly $100 million in start-up costs. The overwhelming majority of Ninth Circuit judges, appointed by both Republican and Democratic presidents, oppose dividing the court.

The split is a pet idea of conservative interest groups and companies that are unhappy with some pro-environmental rulings. They would like to put the open lands in states like Montana and Idaho out of the reach of judges in California who have a record of taking environmental law seriously.

There are steps Congress could take to ease the burden on the Ninth Circuit, including providing more money to improve administration, and fixing the immigration system, which is a source of much of the court's workload. The one thing it should not do is allow ideologues to tamper with the federal courts under a false mantle of reform.

U.S. Stocks Fall For Second Day On Economy; Caterpillar Slides (BLOOM)

By Allen Wan

Bloomberg, September 22, 2006

Sept. 22 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks capped a losing week with a second straight day of declines on renewed concern that the economy is weakening and earnings growth will slow.

Caterpillar Inc., the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, dropped on the threat that demand for machinery will slacken. Boston Scientific Corp. led health-care shares lower after the medical-device maker failed to meet analysts' sales and earnings estimates.

``I don't think the stock market has faced up to the fact that a slowing of the economy will hurt profits," said Nick Sargen, who helps manage $30 billion as chief investment officer at Fort Washington Investment Advisors Inc. in Cincinnati.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index lost 3.25, or 0.3 percent, to 1314.78. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped 25.13, or 0.2 percent, to 11,508.10. The Nasdaq Composite Index slid 18.82, or 0.8 percent, to 2218.93.

After closing within a point of a five-year high, the S&P 500 lost almost 1 percent in the week's final two days. A report showed factory activity shrank in the Philadelphia area for the first time in three years, suggesting that a housing slump is weighing on other areas of the economy.

``This fall-off we're seeing in housing is for real, it's serious," said Dirk van Dijk, director of research at Zacks Investment Research in Chicago. ``Housing has been a major driver for consumer spending."

Earnings Forecast

Earnings growth at S&P 500 companies will slow through the rest of the year, climbing 14.2 percent this quarter and 12.6 percent in the final three months of 2006, according to a Thomson Financial survey of analysts published today. Profits rose 16.3 percent in the second quarter.

For the week, the Dow average fell 0.5 percent, the S&P 500 lost 0.4 percent and the Nasdaq slumped 0.8 percent.

Caterpillar lost $1.77, or 2.7 percent, to $62.77 for the Dow's steepest decline.

Boston Scientific tumbled $1.51, or 9.2 percent, to $14.85 for the biggest retreat in the S&P 500. The maker of drug-coated heart stents said third-quarter sales will total as much as $2.04 billion, less than the average analyst estimate of $2.17 billion compiled by Thomson.

UBS AG cut its rating on the shares to ``neutral" from ``buy" and slashed its price forecast by 44 percent to $18.

An S&P 500 measure of health-care shares retreated 0.6 percent for the second-biggest drop among 10 industry groups.

General Motors

General Motors Corp. dropped 31 cents to $30.62 as the prospects for a link with Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. faded, people familiar with matter said. Renault and Nissan may start talks with Ford Motor Co., two people with knowledge of the discussions said. Ford gained 24 cents to $8.

Spokesmen for GM, Renault and Nissan yesterday said negotiations continue and no decisions have been made. Ford spokesman Oscar Suris declined to comment.

Cablevision Systems Co. slid 40 cents to $22.59. The fifth- largest U.S. cable-television provider awarded stock options to an executive after his death in 1999, then backdated them to give the illusion they were granted when he was alive, according to a regulatory filing.

AT&T Inc. jumped 62 cents to $32.90, while BellSouth Corp. climbed 80 cents $43.23. AT&T's $67 billion purchase of the company is likely to be approved by the Federal Communications Commission, said people familiar with the agency's plans.

New York Times

New York Times Co. declined $1.04 to $21.79. The company forecast third-quarter profit, including some costs, of up to 10 cents a share, less than the 18 cents expected by analysts.

About 12 stocks fell for every five that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.44 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 5.9 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Hewlett-Packard Co. rose 24 cents to $35.11. After the market closed, Chairwoman Patricia Dunn resigned, taking responsibility for the investigation into media leaks. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd will replace her. Former U.S. prosecutor Bart Schwartz was also named to conduct a review.

Tribune Co. gained $1.94, or 6.1 percent, to $33.99 for the biggest advance in the S&P 500. The publisher of the Chicago Tribune agreed to consider a sale of the company or some assets, according to a person familiar with the discussions. Tribune spokesman Gary Weitman declined to comment.

Nike, Palm

Nike Inc. climbed $3.90 to $86.36. The largest athletic- shoe maker reported first-quarter sales of $4.19 billion, exceeding the average estimate of $4.16 billion.

Palm Inc. rose 59 cents to $15.09. The maker of the Treo e- mail phone said it will buy back $250 million in stock.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $611 million, declined 1.2 percent to 718.63. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, decreased 0.4 percent to 13,118.54. Based on its drop, the value of stocks slid by $59.5 billion.

Investors Confront Dark Side Of Slow Growth (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

Here is a question investors are pondering heading into the final week of this year's third quarter: Is a slowing economy good news or bad news?

Most investment pros maintain that a gradually weakening economy, for now, is a good thing because it will keep the Federal Reserve from raising its interest-rate targets.

But a vocal minority maintains that, with the Fed already on hold, having left interest rates steady for its past two policy meetings, the time for that benign scenario to play out has already passed. In the bears' eyes, slower economic growth will lead to weaker corporate profits and reduced consumer spending. Lower gasoline prices will help, but that could be offset by reduced household wealth because of the recent housing slowdown, the bears say.

The stock market's seesaw trading Friday -- and throughout the past week -- reflected that split in thinking.

In the middle of the week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was closing in on its record of 11722.98, reached in January 2000. A two-day selloff at the end of the week raised doubts about whether it would soon clear that hurdle. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan's utterances moved the bond market, and oil prices fell.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average was down nearly 60 points at one point Friday, but a late round of buying trimmed its losses. The blue-chip average finished down 25.13 points, or 0.2%, at 11508.10, off 0.5% on the week, and is now about 215 points from its all-time high.

"It's too early yet to say it won't make it back to the record," said Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research, a market-research firm in Chicago. "If it pulls all the way back to 11000, then I'd say OK. But this move doesn't have enough conviction to it."

Mr. Bianco noted that, for the first time in about three years, financial bets in the futures market Friday reflected a small chance that the Fed could cut rates at the policy makers' next meeting in October.

"That doesn't mean a cut is going to happen, by any stretch," said Mr. Bianco, citing the 4% odds. "But it's just an interesting fact that people are even beginning to entertain the idea seriously enough to put money into it." Lower interest rates are considered good for stocks because they reduce the cost of corporate debt, thus helping profits, and encourage consumer spending.

Strategist Bob Hoye of the Vancouver research firm Institutional Advisors believes such sentiment is misplaced. "The thing is, by the time the Fed eases, it's usually too late," said Mr. Hoye, who believes stocks will continue to pull back.

Another selloff in crude oil helped to keep stocks' losses in check Friday. Hurt by strong supply trends, oil futures for November delivery fell $1.04, or 1.7%, to $60.55 a barrel, off 5.4% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.8%, or 18.82 points, to 2218.93, off 0.7% on the week. And the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.3%, or 3.25, to 1314.78, off 0.4% on the week.

Treasurys rallied, helped by reports that Mr. Greenspan, in remarks at an event sponsored by investment-management firm Drake Management LLC, cited weak housing prices as a factor that might lead the current Fed governors to adopt a looser monetary policy, which some interpreted as a hint that a rate cut might be in the works.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, slipped 0.58%, or 1.27 points, to 217.39.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.21 billion shares, as 1,240 issues rose and 2,046 fell.

Bond prices rose.2 The 10-year Treasury note gained 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.601%. The 30-year bond rose 18/32 to yield 4.744%.

The dollar strengthened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 116.52 yen, from 116.31 yen Thursday. The euro eased to $1.2788 from 1.2792.

Decline In Gas Prices Isn't Buoying Detroit (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

DETROIT, Sept. 22 — Just when $3-a-gallon gasoline looked as if it were here to stay, it left.

But it was around long enough to devastate Detroit's automakers by convincing many car shoppers that smaller is better.

Now that gas prices have fallen almost 50 cents in the last month, moving below $2 a gallon in some markets, will car shoppers once again start thinking of buying the S.U.V.'s and other big vehicles that have been Detroit's bread and butter for the last decade?

For now, that may be wishful thinking, according to many dealers and auto executives.

"I'm surprised. I thought when the gas prices came down around $2 that my business would pick up," said Vic Bailey, 80, who owns a Ford dealership in Spartanburg, S.C., where a handful of gas stations were charging around $1.96 Friday afternoon.

"September has been very disappointing since the first of the month," when Ford offered no-interest financing, Mr. Bailey said.

Simple economics would suggest that as gas prices fall, car shoppers would place less emphasis on mileage. But few, if any, people in the automotive industry are betting that this latest drop will undo some of the damage to Detroit.

"They'd have to keep falling and the decline would have to last for at least three or four months before it would have much of an impact on anything," said Sean McAlinden, chief economist at the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich.

"It would take a real fall to the $1.50 level to start changing expectations," he explained. "And there's a better chance of $4 than $1.50 in the long run."

The problem is consumers may have decided that higher gas prices are more the rule, and any drops they might see in coming months or years are the exception.

Detroit car companies continue to rely on big vehicles as the most important part of their lineups. Those products were planned years ago, when $3-a-gallon-gas still seemed unthinkable.

In August, a survey by Consumer Reports magazine found that fuel economy had become the top consideration for car shoppers, ahead of reliability, price and safety. Many of the people who feel that way have turned to Japanese manufacturers, namely Toyota and Honda, which spent decades honing their reputations for producing high-quality fuel-efficient vehicles.

In 2002, the year S.U.V. sales peaked, only 22.7 percent of likely buyers said fuel economy was important in considering which car to buy, according to CNW Marketing Research, a firm in Bandon, Ore., that studies buying habits.

By 2005, 61.3 percent of buyers rated fuel economy as important. And in the first quarter of this year, after Hurricane Katrina but before gas prices spiked again, that figured climbed to 64 percent, CNW research showed.

Sales of S.U.V.'s, a market long dominated by Detroit, have plunged 18 percent this year through August, after a 15 percent drop last year, industry statistics show. That compares with single-digit declines in 2003 and 2004, when gas cost less than $2.

None of the 15 top-selling vehicles in August were traditional S.U.V.'s. Sales of the Ford Explorer, the most popular S.U.V. for years, are about one-third lower than last year.

Last year was the first time drivers in most of the country paid $3 a gallon, after Katrina, although drivers in California have seen prices rise above $3 a gallon routinely this decade.

But this year prices surged again, with no hurricane to blame, and Detroit realized its days of raking in handsome profits on sales of S.U.V.'s alone were not coming back.

"There's a new reality," said Ford Motor Company's chief sales analyst, George Pipas, acknowledging that the company no longer expects a rebound in the S.U.V. market. At this point, Mr. Pipas said, he can only hope that gas prices stay low enough for long enough to stop light truck sales from dropping too quickly.

"If gas prices were to stabilize at today's levels, I think we might see a return to the slower declines that we experienced in '03 and '04," he said. "We still see this category declining further, regardless of what happens to energy prices. We happen to think that demographics are the primary driver of this shift, as baby boomers downsize, but that gas prices speeded it up."

As of Friday, a gallon of regular unleaded gas cost an average of $2.44 nationwide, according to the AAA motor club. That is 47 cents less than a month ago — yet still high by historical standards.

The respite comes as General Motors prepares to begin selling its new line of full-size pickups, a vehicle seen as key to returning the company to profitability. G.M. also redesigned its large S.U.V.'s earlier this year and needs to continue selling them at a steady pace to keep its turnaround plans on track.

Ford is bringing out fresh versions of the Ford Explorer and Lincoln Navigator, once so popular Ford could not keep them in stock. But their sales have plummeted this year. Ford is putting its emphasis this fall, however, on its new crossover, the Edge.

The Chrysler Group, which is more dependent on truck sales than any of its competitors, has experienced a sudden sales slump and expects to lose $1.5 billion this quarter, more than double its original projections. Chrysler has a bevy of upcoming new vehicles, but it has struggled to unload excess inventories of 2006 models that are clogging dealer lots.

Neither company is counting on falling gas prices to provide much of a boost. If anything, consumer confidence may increase slightly, which all industries would welcome. But economists do not expect many people to put money saved on fuel toward a new vehicle, if they were not already shopping for one.

"I don't think anybody's paid a whole lot of attention to it," said a G.M. spokesman, John M. McDonald.

"It's way too early to tell," said Kevin McCormick, a Chrysler spokesman. "We don't know how long these lower prices are going to sustain."

Chrysler's chief executive, Thomas W. LaSorda, last month said the company was planning for gas prices to remain in the $3 to $4 range for the rest of this decade. On a conference call this week, Mr. LaSorda said there had been no uptick in sales as a result of reduced gas prices.

Mr. McAlinden said the automakers are wise to dismiss the recent drop-off and focus on improving their offerings of smaller cars with higher gas mileage.

"The executives in Detroit — finally — don't trust this decline in gasoline at all," he said. "Any foreign event could put us back at $3 a gallon, and I think the public senses that."

Boeing C-17 Plant May Get Reprieve (LAT)

By Peter Pae

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

A congressional plan to add $2.1 billion to the defense budget to buy 10 more C-17 transport planes could help extend the life of the aircraft's production line in Long Beach beyond 2010, Boeing Co.'s top defense executive said.

The funding could provide Boeing with a much-needed reprieve from having to shut the line sooner, James Albaugh, president of Boeing's Integrated Defense Systems unit, said in an interview Friday. About 5,500 people are employed at the large Long Beach factory where the planes are assembled.

"If you're down in Long Beach, you'll see a lot of happy faces," Albaugh said.

The additional funding was approved by a conference committee late Thursday and is scheduled for a vote by the full House and Senate next week.

Approval would enable Boeing to maintain the production line until the Defense Department completes a new assessment of military airlift needs, Albaugh said. The Chicago-based company hopes the study will call for procurement of more than 40 C-17s, which would keep the line open until at least 2013.

Boeing and members of Congress have been calling for the Pentagon to conduct the study after criticism that its 2005 analysis of the military's air transport requirements may have been flawed. The so-called mobility capabilities study concluded that plans to purchase 180 C-17s were adequate and disputed previous Air Force projections that a fleet of 222 of the four-engine jets was needed.

The Pentagon has used the mobility study to justify not buying additional C17s beyond those already delivered or on order. Boeing has completed 154 C-17s.

The Government Accountability Office on Wednesday issued a rebuke of the Pentagon study that analysts said further undermined the rationale for limiting C-17 purchases.

Congress, led by the delegations from California and Missouri, where about 1,800 jobs are tied to the C-17 program, has been pushing the Pentagon to buy more of the aircraft. With Defense Department planners unmoved, key legislators included the additional C-17 funds in a $70-billion supplemental appropriations bill that would pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The C-17, used in the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts to transport troops, casualties, cargo and humanitarian aid, has enjoyed wide support in Congress. The Pentagon originally had requested funding for 12 C-17s in the fiscal 2007 budget. The new congressional funding plan would raise that total to 22 aircraft.

Angelides Inspires Growing Concern (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

As the candidate fights to clarify his message, donations fall short. Unions may decide to spend their campaign money elsewhere.

With just over six weeks left in the race for governor, the troubles facing Democrat Phil Angelides have intensified, and his political allies are expressing rising concern over his campaign's failure to gain momentum.

Hindering his drive to oust Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger are Angelides' slow pace in raising money, his tepid support from organized labor and his difficulty defining himself clearly for voters, Democratic strategists say.

Missteps have also hobbled Angelides. Some black members of the clergy say the state treasurer has made only lackluster efforts to appeal to African Americans, his party's most loyal constituency. And his campaign manager's admission this month that two Angelides aides bungled the release of audio recordings of private Schwarzenegger conversations has stirred grumbling among Democratic leaders about his staff's competence.

Aggravating all that are what even critics of Schwarzenegger say are the discipline and efficiency of the Republican governor's reelection machine.

So with Schwarzenegger holding a wide lead barely two weeks before voting by mail starts, one question on the minds of many Angelides supporters is whether there is enough time to right his campaign. Another is whether his trouble sparking voter enthusiasm risks harming other Democrats on the Nov. 7 ballot or sinking propositions that the party supports.

Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist who is not working on the campaign, said Angelides had fallen into a perilous cycle, in which low poll ratings deter donors, making it harder to afford the TV ads needed to drive a recovery. To escape the rut is "not impossible, but it's certainly a hard thing to do, given the time that's left in the race," he said.

Angelides has overcome long odds before. In the spring Democratic primary, he was trailing rival Steve Westly by 13 points in a Times Poll just six weeks before he defeated the state controller. But Westly was largely unknown and, thus, much easier to knock out than a governor long familiar to Californians.

"Would he prefer to be ahead? Yes, that would be nifty," said Gale Kaufman, a campaign consultant who works closely with unions that back Angelides. "Does it mean he's out of the race? No, not at all."

But money is a major problem. Angelides has raised about $14.4 million this year, compared with the governor's $27.6 million. In the first 20 days of September, Angelides gathered slightly over $1 million, while Schwarzenegger collected $2.6 million.

"It is not a pretty picture when it comes to fundraising, when you don't have an incumbent governor," state Democratic Chairman Art Torres said.

Given the state's caps on donations to candidates, a prime source of hope for Angelides is independent spending on his campaign by supporters. Sacramento real estate tycoon Angelo Tsakopoulos, who with his family spent more than $8 million on TV ads for Angelides in the primary, could try to ride to the rescue again.

But since the June primary, neither Tsakopoulos nor organized labor, another longtime source of big money for Angelides, has invested heavily in his push to unseat Schwarzenegger.

Last year, unions spent nearly $100 million to defeat Schwarzenegger's ballot measures in the November special election. But they have spent just $4 million on Angelides this year, and half of that was for the primary. In addition to qualms over whether Angelides can win, some unions face pressure now to steer money elsewhere, to propositions or to the national battle to win Democratic control of Congress.

"Resources are stretched very thin, let nobody kid you," said Willie Pelote Sr., California political director for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees., which supports Angelides.

The California Correctional Peace Officers Assn., another union that supports Angelides, has reserved $5 million worth of TV ad time in October. But Ray McNally, a consultant to the union, said its leaders were still evaluating the gubernatorial contest before deciding what kind of ads to run and whether to spend millions more.

"There is a good chance that you could see some very serious independent expenditure campaigns — when and if the race starts to tighten," said McNally, a Republican who produced anti-Schwarzenegger ads for the union last year.

As for Schwarzenegger, who was spared the sort of primary that left Angelides bruised and nearly broke, he has already spent millions on ads that spotlight his challenger's support for higher taxes.

"If Phil had his way, it could make it harder to own a home or even afford a car," an announcer says in a Schwarzenegger spot that went on the air Friday.

Angelides, whose ads during the primary highlighted his vow to raise taxes on corporations and the wealthy, has only recently resumed substantial TV advertising, running a Democratic Party spot slamming Schwarzenegger for backing President Bush's reelection in 2004.

"We made a very disciplined, realistic — and I think ultimately it will prove very correct — decision not to compete with them over the summer, because we didn't have the money to do it," said Angelides media strategist Bill Carrick.

In the end, "we're not going to have dollar-for-dollar what they have, but we'll be competitive," said Carrick, who described the Bush ad as part of a push to maximize gains from a national voter climate that favors Democrats.

But some labor and Democratic strategists fault Angelides — many privately and a few publicly — for not running ads that flesh out his biography for voters who know little more about him than the caricatures in Schwarzenegger and Westly spots. They also say Angelides, who added tax cuts to his campaign agenda last month, fumbled the crucial issue of taxes.

Angelides "let himself be defined as a big tax-and-spend guy," said political consultant John Hein, former government-relations director of the California Teachers Assn.

When tax questions came up in the candidate's first mock debate last week with a Schwarzenegger stand-in, the topic tied Angelides in rhetorical knots, according to a person who attended.

More broadly, Angelides is still struggling to clarify his core message. In the primary, he cast himself as the lone Democrat who had the courage to stand up to Schwarzenegger budget cuts at the peak of the governor's popularity. One of the few remnants of that theme is a banner he still displays at campaign stops: "Angelides: A Governor We Can Count On."

Aides say his main message now is that Angelides fights for the middle class while Schwarzenegger protects special interests. But even many Democratic leaders still cannot explain what the message is. "Well, let's see, I'm sure I could go to the Angelides website and pull that right up," said San Diego County Democratic Chairman Jess Durfee.

Basic political work has also proved a challenge for Angelides, a former state Democratic chairman, particularly in his appeals to African Americans. By the time Schwarzenegger one-upped him last month by speaking at First African Methodist Episcopal Church, a must-stop for Democrats in South Los Angeles, Angelides had yet to make a courtesy call to its politically influential pastor, the Rev. John Hunter.

"It was certainly an oversight," said Kerman Maddox, who handles political matters for the church.

The Rev. Frederick O. Murph, pastor of Brookins AME Church in South Los Angeles, said he was concerned that Angelides had failed so far to make any "big thrust, in terms of the African American vote."

"I don't think Phil Angelides has really directed enough energy in that area," said Murph, who nonetheless described the treasurer as "a great guy" who would make a fine governor.

Angelides has won the support of just two African American ministers in California. Last week, he lost the support of a third, the Rev. J. Alfred Smith of Allen Temple Baptist Church in Oakland.

Smith has added his name to a list of eight other black ministers supporting Schwarzenegger, who plans to visit an African American church and business fair on Sunday in Los Angeles.

Patrick Outpaces Two Rivals In New Poll (BOS)

By Frank Phillips

Democrat surges to a 21-point lead as vote nears

Heading into the final days of the campaign, Deval Patrick has opened up a commanding lead in the Democratic race for governor, far outpacing his closest challenger, Christopher Gabrieli, and leaving Thomas F. Reilly a distant third, according to a new poll conducted for The Boston Globe and CBS4-TV.

Forty-six percent of those surveyed supported Patrick, 25 percent backed Gabrieli, and 18 percent were for Reilly in the poll of 523 likely voters in Tuesday's primary election. Only 6 percent said they were undecided, while 4 percent expressed support for other candidates in next Tuesday's election. The survey was taken Sept. 12-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percent.

The survey found voters shifted to Patrick in the last few weeks, despite the millions of dollars that Gabrieli and Reilly have spent on television advertising since late August. A Globe poll, taken Aug. 18-23, showed that the three were in a virtual dead heat, with Patrick at 31 percent, Gabrieli 30 percent, and Reilly 27 percent. In March, a similar poll gave Reilly a strong lead in the race.

Patrick took support from both of his rivals in the intervening weeks, though Reilly seems to have suffered the greatest, according to Andrew E. Smith, the director of the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center, which conducted the poll.

Smith said that Patrick has succeeded in building his support beyond his base of liberal, upper income, well-educated voters that made up the initial core of his coalition. Patrick, who began the race 18 months ago as a political novice who was virtually unknown to voters, now leads in almost all the categories of the primary electorate, the survey shows.

He said Reilly, the state's two-term attorney general, and Gabrieli, a wealthy venture capitalist, lost ground partly because some of the moderate and conservative voters -- a group Smith says are less politically involved and less motivated to vote in a Democratic primary -- have decided not to participate in the election. Support for Reilly and Gabrieli is rooted among moderates and conservative Democrats and independents.

In contrast to the contest for the gubernatorial nomination, the three-way primary race for lieutenant governor appears to be wide open. Deborah Goldberg, the former chairwoman of the Brookline Board of Selectmen, received 26 percent support in the survey; Tim Murray, the mayor of Worcester, 20 percent; and business consultant Andrea Silbert, 18 percent. Twenty-seven percent are undecided.

But among those who say they will definitely vote, the race tightens. Goldberg and Murray both get 27 percent, and Silbert gets 16 percent. The margin of error for those 300 likely voters in the sample is about 5.5 percent.

In the only other Democratic contest, Secretary of State William F. Galvin, seeking his fourth term, is far out in front of his challenger, voting rights lawyer John Bonifaz, getting 45 percent support from the respondents. Bonifaz received only 7 percent, while 38 percent are undecided.

In the race for governor, voters seem to be making their decisions because they generally like the candidates or their overall philosophies, rather than basing the decision on the candidates' stances on specific policies. While all three candidates have different views on rolling back the income tax rate from 5.3 percent to 5 percent -- the most hotly debated issue in the race -- only 11 percent cited the issue as the reason for supporting their candidate.

The current survey found 70 percent of the Democratic primary view Patrick favorably, 9 percent unfavorably. The poll three weeks ago found Patrick with a 51 percent favorable, 10 percent unfavorable rating.

The voters' view of Reilly has dropped dramatically in the last weeks. Forty-two percent of those surveyed viewed Reilly favorably, down from 52 percent in the Globe's August poll. His unfavorable rating jumped from 24 percent to 38 percent. Most analysts, including his closest advisers, attribute Reilly's free-fall to his poor debate performance on Sept. 7, when he went on the attack against both Gabrieli and Patrick.

But the second televised debate, held Wednesday, in the middle of the four-day survey, did not seem to hurt Patrick, even though he was seen as defensive under questioning by Reilly and Gabrieli.

The poll also found that Reilly's strategy of drawing on union support does not appear to have worked. In a small sample of 88 respondents, Patrick holds a 3-to-1 margin over Reilly among those identifying themselves as living in union households. Reilly, who has portrayed himself as a champion of working middle class voters running against two multimillionaires, receives his strongest support from older voters, those with lower levels of income and lower levels of education, according to the survey.

Patrick gets his strongest support from liberals and those with incomes of $100,000 a year or more, those with postgraduate educations, and those with no religious preference. He is especially strong among respondents who say they are most interested in the race and those who say they will definitely vote on Tuesday.

But Patrick's broader appeal is evident in the views of Sonja Bryant of Waltham, a 51-year-old hospital worker and a registered Democrat. She said that Patrick's positions on issues such as housing, crime, education, and affirmative action appeal to her. ``He will be do something about the causes that affect my family, some of his causes are my causes," said Bryant, a survey respondent who agreed to be interviewed after the poll.

Bryant, an African-American woman who describes herself as a liberal, said she was impressed with Patrick's ability to rise from a poor childhood to jobs as a top Clinton administration official and later a corporate executive. ``If you're able to do that with from where you came from, you can do something for the state," she said.

Gabrieli, despite spending over $2 million in ads in the last three weeks, has actually dropped slightly since the August poll. The recent survey gives him a 59 percent favorable rating, up four percentage points from August, but his unfavorable rating rose from 14 percent to 17 percent. He drew slightly more support from those who identify themselves as conservatives, but trailed Patrick among moderates, a targeted group that Gabrieli was hoping to use as a base for victory. Gabrieli also is trailing Patrick by a significant margin among independents, another primary voting bloc that he is counting on to carry.

Gabrieli has portrayed himself as bi partisan and results oriented. ``I don't think he is one of the insiders," said Joe Rosseau, a survey respondent and partially retired state worker from Methuen, explaining why he is supporting Gabrieli.

Rosseau, a 63-year-old registered independent who describes himself as a conservative, said he considered Patrick ``seriously" but worries that he would not get state spending under control. He rejected Reilly because he felt had not done enough to investigate the Big Dig problems.

Rosseau says he is more concerned about the state controlling spending that an immediate income tax cut. Indeed, only 15 percent of those surveyed favor Reilly's position for an immediate rollback, while 48 percent support Gabrieli's plan for a phased in cutback. Patrick's position of keeping the tax at 5.3 percent gets support from 30 percent of the respondents.

Gabrieli's hope for overtaking Patrick may lie with those who say they are most likely to change their minds, the survey findings show. Greg Gullotti of Waltham, self-employed antiques dealer, said he has been divided over whether to vote for Patrick or Gabrieli, but is moving toward Gabrieli.

``I'm leaning in his direction, because he appears to have the sense of self-convictions and has a personality that he would not be swayed by the stress and potential political ramifications of any given situation," said Gullotti, a registered independent who said he generally votes for Democrats. ``He strikes me as a fair and even keeled administrator."

But Gullotti, 37, said he is also drawn to Patrick, but finds off-putting what many say is his strength as a candidate. ``He is a fresh face, with a fairly good track record," he said. ``And he is certainly charismatic and energetic, but that is finally what is turning me against him," Gullotti said. ``The more support Deval Patrick gets, the more he is talking like a politician."

Patrick was considered by the likely primary voters to be the strongest candidate for the Democrats to run against the Republican s' choice, Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey. Some 40 percent in the survey say he has the best chance of winning in November, while 22 percent name Gabrieli, and 19 percent, Reilly.

The August survey found that 37 percent of voters believed Reilly would be the strongest Democrat, with Patrick and Reilly trailing.

Also running in the general election are independent Christy Mihos and Green Rainbow Party candidate Grace Ross.

Asked which of the candidates cares most about ``people like you," 38 percent of those questioned chose Patrick, 23 percent said Reilly, and 20 percent said Gabrieli. Asked which candidate had the best television ads, 36 percent chose Gabrieli, 26 percent said Patrick and 12 percent said Reilly.

'Teflon Ed' Rendell Unbruised Despite Tough Year (PPG)

By Tom Barnes, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

CAMPAIGN 2006 / GOVERNOR

HARRISBURG -- In his first four years in office, Gov. Ed Rendell pushed hard to increase the state income tax, signed the infamous legislative pay raise, failed to enact middle-class property tax relief and oversaw state budgets that regularly exceeded the inflation rate.

So his bid for re-election has to be in trouble, right?

Well, no. For months, the Democratic incumbent, who was mayor of Philadelphia in the 1990s, has led his Republican challenger, former Steeler Lynn Swann, by double digits in every poll.

"I call him 'Teflon Ed' because nothing bad seems to stick to him," said Clay Richards, director of the Quinnipiac Poll, which put Mr. Rendell up by 19 points recently.

"Rendell is the consummate politician," added Mr. Richards. "He can neutralize defeats and even use them to his advantage. He came into office promising property tax relief and he hasn't really delivered on it, but he's able to put the blame for that on the Legislature.

"Even though he signed the pay raise, he hasn't paid any political price for that, while many of the legislators who voted for it have been defeated."

Perhaps the highest-profile issue of Mr. Rendell's first term was the advent of 14 casinos in Pennsylvania, with as many as 61,000 one-armed bandits. The first ones could open early in 2007.

Politically, slots have been a two-edged sword. Gamblers are happy because they won't have to trek to Atlantic City casinos or racetracks in West Virginia or Delaware to get their slots kick. And the state's horse-racing industry is pleased because some of the revenue generated at casinos will go to boost prize money for thoroughbred and harness races and help the horse-breeding and agricultural industry.

But religious conservatives and others think easier access to slots will just increase gambling addiction and generate huge social costs.

There also have been complaints that the promise of $1 billion in slots revenue to lower property taxes has been too slow in coming and won't be fully realized until 2009 at the earliest. Even then, critics say, it won't help average homeowners that much, trimming most annual property tax burdens by only $200 to $250.

Mr. Rendell, 62, took office in January 2003 and spent his first 18 months pushing for Act 71, the slots law. It was finally enacted on July 4, 2004, and he signed it one day later.

In Western Pennsylvania, it authorized one slots parlor in Pittsburgh and another at The Meadows racetrack in Washington County, each with up to 5,000 slots. There also will be smaller casinos (with 500 slots each) at two resorts, Nemacolin Woodlands and Seven Springs.

While some skeptics claim Mr. Rendell is overestimating the $1 billion he expects to get from slots, he say he's sticking with his forecast once all 14 casinos are fully up and running.

In his television commercials, Mr. Rendell boasts that 200,000 low-income seniors already have had their property taxes eliminated as a result of the anticipated slots revenue, and more modest reductions for the bulk of the state's seniors already have been enacted.

High-energy booster

One reason for Mr. Rendell's steady lead in the polls is his high level of energy and savvy use of the power of incumbency. Not bad for a guy who's 62 and fighting his weight. Last week he checked in at a hefty 257 pounds.

He has been tireless in flying around the commonwealth, handing out checks for local economic development projects.

Asked once what's the best perk about being governor, he quipped, "The plane."

Sometimes he even crisscrosses the entire state in one day -- hitting a breakfast in Pittsburgh and a dinner in Philadelphia, for example.

Much of what he doles out comes from the $650 million state capital fund, something all governors have used. But he also persuaded the Republican-controlled Legislature two years ago to approve a $1.3 billion economic stimulus package, another source of bond funds (i.e., borrowed money) to pay for projects.

The list of booster projects is seemingly endless: a new museum in downtown Hershey about the life of chocolate king Milton Hershey; the expansion of a museum dedicated to author James Michener near Philadelphia; Civil War trails near Gettysburg; a photographic equipment plant in Allentown; a music academy in Lancaster; a Dupont plant in Bradford County; a biomedical plant in Montgomery County, and many more.

In the Pittsburgh area, Mr. Rendell developed "Plan B" for ensuring the financing of a new $290 million multi-purpose arena for hockey and other events. He also agreed to advance the city and county $26.5 million to do site preparation work for a new arena.

At a recent Allegheny County Democratic picnic, Mr. Rendell had to correct County Chief Executive Dan Onorato when he thanked the governor for giving the county "about $1 billion."

"It's $1.1 billion," Mr. Rendell said, adding the Allegheny County share is the highest of any county.

That comment was aimed at deflecting criticism from Republicans who are fond of jibing that Mr. Rendell is "the governor of Philadelphia."

They cite items such as Mr. Rendell having state troopers patrol state roads in Philadelphia and help the city reduce costs; advancing planning funds for a major expansion of the city's 13-year-old convention center; and the $42 million from the state for a new Comcast skyscraper being built in Philadelphia.

Republicans claim Mr. Rendell has a conflict of interest on the latter item because he earns $20,000 a year as a Comcast football commentator on Sundays after Philadelphia Eagles games. Mr. Rendell said he donates the money to charity and said he saved several thousand Comcast jobs from going to New Jersey. Pointing out that state troopers patrol state roads in Pittsburgh and all other cities, the governor said he was merely putting Philadelphia on the same footing.

Working the crowd

One reason Mr. Rendell is a successful politician is that he genuinely seems at home in a crowd of people, even those he hardly knows.

At public events like the Harrisburg Farm Show each January, he wolfs down sausages and milk shakes as he shakes the hands of hundreds of show-goers. It's the same gregariousness he's displayed throughout his 30-year political career, which included eight years as Philadelphia district attorney and two terms as mayor of the city, a time when he garnered national attention for turning the economy of the city around. His success as mayor, and as a fund-raiser, led to Mr. Rendell serving as Democratic national committee chairman in 2000-01.

He showed the same affability in late August, when he went to two African-American churches in East Liberty to deliver a short secular sermon.

The pastor of Pentecostal Temple Church of God in Christ, the Rev. Loran Mann, a former television reporter, gave the governor a warm introduction, calling him "my friend" and thanking him for "naming me last year to the commission that sets policy for public television in the state."

A few blocks away, Mr. Rendell walked up to the pulpit of the St. James AME Church to the sound of hands clapping, tambourines banging and voices raised in shouts of "Amen" and "Praise Jesus."

"My core belief is that government can and should do things that make a difference in people's lives and take care of our vulnerable citizens, older people, poor people and young people," he said.

He listed what he considers his proudest achievements as governor: increasing state funding for public schools, for tutoring in math, pre-kindergarten education and all-day kindergarten; funds to put laptop computers in all high school classrooms within four years; for not cutting anyone off welfare rolls despite decreased federal funding; raising more money through Lottery sales to increase drug coverage for senior citizens; trying to reduce gun violence by limiting handgun sales to one per month.

He said Republicans are always "yelling about Democrats spending money. Well, we're not just spending money. We're spending money to improve education and that is investing in our future."

Mr. Rendell might have been expected to be at a political disadvantage in Pittsburgh's black neighborhoods, since Mr. Swann is black, lives in Allegheny County and remains popular among sports fans from his starring days as a receiver with the Steelers' Super Bowl teams of the 1970s.

But St. James choir member Genie Beckom said that even though she and Mr. Swann are black, it was Mr. Swann's political party that she had a problem with.

"I personally wouldn't put any Republican in the governor's office," she said. "It's not to the advantage of my race. Republicans are about cutting back on things we need, such as health care, welfare and education."

Sylvia Allen, another St. James member, also likes Mr. Rendell, saying of Mr. Swann, "I'm not getting the feeling he's tuned in to us [African Americans] or connected to our problems. He's of a different status."

Obviously Mr. Rendell is pleased about his continuing lead in the polls, but when talking to supporters he downplays it, noting that in 2002, he trailed his Democratic primary opponent, then-Auditor General Robert P. Casey Jr., but came back to win the Democratic nomination for governor.

"No poll three months before an election means a thing," he told an Allegheny County Democratic picnic three weeks ago. "Don't get complacent. Work like heck. This is our year if we don't get overconfident."

Taylor, Perdue Talk The Talk Of Tax Cuts (AJC)

By Jim Galloway, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 17, 2006

Tax cuts became the language of the race for governor on Saturday, as Democratic nominee Mark Taylor vowed to eliminate the state property tax on more than 2.5 million Georgia homeowners.

Lifting the .25 mills now assessed by the state would force a $76 million cut in the state's annual budget, and would average $30 a year per homeowner — the amount varying according to the value of each house.

"There's one tax-cutter running for governor, and you're looking at him. The big guy likes big tax cuts," Taylor told several hundred screaming delegates attending the annual state Democratic Party convention in College Park.

Local government and school taxes make up the largest part of property taxes on Georgia homes. Campaign spokesman Rick Dent admitted that eliminating the state's share wouldn't have a huge impact on most taxpayers' household budgets.

"We won't say that it's a lot, but it's more than they've gotten from Sonny Perdue in four years. And it doesn't mean that's where [Taylor] is going to stop," Dent said.

Only days earlier, Republican incumbent Sonny Perdue, before a similar gathering of his own partisans, promised to eliminate the state income tax on retirement income — from pension funds and investments — for Georgians older than 65.

Perdue's cut would cost the state $142 million a year, and apply to between 250,000 and 400,000 people.

Derrick Dickey, a spokesman for Perdue, belittled Taylor's property tax proposal — pointing out that the Democrat was also promising increases in state spending on health insurance for children and education.

"He will no doubt promise every Georgian a Porsche and a shiny new toaster by Election Day," Dickey said on Saturday.

Neither Taylor nor Perdue offered budget cuts to offset their proposed reductions in state income. However, after three years of tight budgets, a strengthening economy and increased tax collections have resulted in a significant surplus.

The one-day gathering of Democrats was a chance for party activists to see the statewide and congressional candidates they had nominated in sometimes fierce primary battles over the summer.

Trying to broaden support base

As each candidate spoke, a common theme was the need for Democrats — ousted from power in the state Capitol in 2002 and 2004 — to broaden their base of support.

"Even if we turn out every Democratic vote, that will not be enough. We have to reach out to every independent, every Libertarian. Democrats have to move away from their comfort zone," said state Labor Commissioner Michael Thurmond, who faces Republican Brent Brown in November.

A platform passed by the convention backed positions staked out by Taylor, including a call to help local governments build more jail space in order to keep more violent offenders off the street.

The party platform took several shots at Perdue, with references to news reports of 2005 legislation sponsored by a business associate and state legislator that gave the governor a $100,000 tax deferral on a land sale.

"Public officials should not use their office for private enrichment," the platform reads, adding that future governors should be required to place their holdings in a blind trust.

Perdue also was a major foil for Taylor — on the issue of tax cuts.

"Sonny Perdue gave Georgia corporations a billion-dollar tax cut. But you didn't get a tax cut.

"He could find the money for corporations, but he couldn't find the money for you. How did Sonny pay for his corporate giveaway? He cut your local schools by over $1 billion," Taylor said.

A spokesman for Perdue pointed out that the Republican governor had permanently extended the homestead exemption on property taxes, worth $434 million in the state's 2007 budget.

Taylor noted that Perdue had tried unsuccessfully to eliminate that exemption, which would have resulted in an increase in property taxes, when he first became governor in 2003.

Webb Treks To Region That Allen Knows Well (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate James Webb is campaigning this weekend through parts of rural Virginia, a politically vital region where he could face a difficult challenge connecting with voters because of his positions on social issues.

About a third of Virginia voters live in rural areas, a sizable voting bloc important to the Democrat, who is locked in a close contest with Sen. George Allen (R). Southern voters have largely abandoned Democrats in elections for federal offices.

This weekend, Webb will crisscross the tobacco fields south of Richmond, meet with supporters near the North Carolina border and attend a fish fry in coal-mining country in southwestern Virginia.

At each stop, Webb will be asking voters to look past social issues that have drawn many rural voters to Republicans and instead make their decision based on economic issues and his background as a former Marine.

"These are natural voters for us once they know where we stand on the issues," Webb said. His ancestors hail from southwestern Virginia, Webb kicked off his campaign in Gate City and he wrote about the region in his book "Born Fighting."

Even so, Webb, who opposes a proposed state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and supports abortion rights, acknowledges, "There are a couple of issues people will have a problem with" in rural regions.

Political analysts say Webb, who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, doesn't have to win many of the areas he will visit this weekend. But he can't be trounced there, either. Webb strategists say they hope for a large turnout in Northern Virginia, where Democrats have done well recently. The strategy won't work unless they keep Allen's margins in check in the rest of the state.

Webb "can't rely on the core Democratic base to be elected," said Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University.

Republicans say Webb faces an uphill quest, despite his military background, because he has neither the advertising budget nor the conservative credentials needed to convince rural voters he's one of them.

DOJ_NMG_0068121

"He's been all over the map on social issues, and I think it looks pretty contrived," said U.S. Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte, a Republican who represents the Shenandoah Valley. "This is a pretty solidly conservative area, and George Allen is very well known here."

Allen, a former governor, has built his political career around appealing to rural voters. He tours the state every year in an RV, has acquired a Southern drawl and rides on horseback in many community parades. On the campaign trail, Allen talks about preserving traditional values, keeping taxes low and investing in a strong national defense.

Allen "has consistently fought on their behalf on the issues they care about," said Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, adding that Webb is "out of touch."

Yesterday, Allen appeared before hundreds of voters at a summit sponsored by the Family Research Council, which promotes traditional values. Allen spoke about stopping "activist judges," protecting "freedom from radical, maniacal terrorist organizations" and securing the U.S. border with Mexico.

"Count on me, as I have done in the past, to be a teammate, an ally, part of your extended family, as we work for our foundational values," Allen said.

Allen used similar arguments in 2000, when he unseated incumbent Charles S. Robb (D) by winning nearly two-thirds of the vote in rural Virginia.

During the spring, Democratic leaders in Washington endorsed Webb because they believed the former Republican would connect with rural voters, who tend to be white, culturally conservative, pro-military and less well educated than voters in Northern Virginia.

During two debates this week, Webb espoused a message of economic populism, arguing that the rich are getting richer while the middle class has struggled under President Bush's policies. On the campaign trail, Webb notes that he began working at age 12. He also rails against excessive corporate profits and calls for a hard line against what he calls unfair trade policies.

Yesterday, Allen said he's the only candidate who has a record of bringing jobs and better educational opportunities to poorer parts of the state.

"His record simply doesn't match up," Allen said of Webb.

Webb has also tried to stake a middle position on affirmative action. He says he wants to restrict affirmative action programs to African Americans, instead of all ethnic minorities, saying the current system amounts to "state-sponsored racism" toward whites. If the system isn't changed, he wants the programs opened up to poor whites.

Webb is also trying to stave off a charge that he is, as Bush and Allen say, "a cut and run" Democrat. Although he was drawn into the race over his opposition to the war, he has not called for an immediate troop pullout. But he wants U.S. forces to be repositioned gradually to other friendly Arab nations to get them out of harm's way.

Webb has sought to one-up Allen over the issue of guns as well. During a debate Monday, Allen defended a bill he sponsored to make it easier for gun owners to carry concealed weapons across state lines. Webb endorsed the proposal and then volunteered that he has a permit to carry a concealed weapon.

"I've had guns since I was 8 years old. I was raised in a family where we hunted, so I think anyone who so chooses has the right to defend themselves with a firearm," Webb said.

U.S. Rep. Rick Boucher, a Democrat who represents southwestern Virginia, said Webb is doing exactly what a Democrat needs to do to win over voters in his part of the state.

"As a very distinguished war hero and secretary of the Navy, he has good credentials from a cultural perspective," Boucher said. "But I think those can be burnished by a clear stance [that] he does not favor gun control."

Democrats point to former governor Mark R. Warner (D), who in 2001 was elected in part after he won 100,000 more votes in southwestern Virginia than Robb did the year before. Besides stressing economic issues and his opposition to gun control, Warner sponsored a NASCAR team and made a country music song his campaign theme to bolster his appeal.

"This is a guy who not only talks the talk but walks the walk," said Warner, noting that Webb has a 24-year-old son serving in the military in Iraq.

Republicans say Democrats face a tougher task in federal elections. They point to Robb and Sen. John F. Kerry, the Democratic presidential candidate in 2004. Both were veterans but still did poorly in rural Virginia.

Webb also faces the risky task of appealing to rural voters while not alienating liberals in Northern Virginia and African Americans, whom Democrats need to turn out to vote in large numbers.

Larry J. Sabato, a political science professor at the University of Virginia, said Webb faces long odds in balancing the views of the state's competing regions.

"On paper, he's got a formula to do it, but it's a long way from paper to the ballot box," Sabato said.

An Awkward Outing (NSWK)

By Lisa Miller

Newsweek, September 23, 2006

In the days leading up to the High Holidays, the holiest time of the year in Judaism, a senator running for re-election and a potential Republican candidate for president, announced that, yes, his mother was born Jewish. Here's what Sen. George Allen said: "I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including my Lumbroso family line's Jewish heritage, which I learned about from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed."

Enough said. Except he couldn't stop talking. That same day, in an interview with a Richmond, Va., paper, Allen said his Jewish ancestry was "just an interesting nuance to my background." And then he added this: "I still had a ham sandwich for lunch. And my mother made great pork chops." Being an eater of ham sandwiches and pork chops may go along with Allen's Red State, cowboy-boot-wearing, Confederate-flag-waving image, but many observers were unnerved by the flippancy of these remarks, and pundits began to debate whether Allen's Jewishness—and his strange reaction to it—would help or hurt his re-election campaign. (Latest poll numbers have Allen and his Democratic opponent Jim Webb nearly neck and neck, 46 percent to 42 percent.)

"I think his national political future is over," says Kati Marton, author of the forthcoming "Nine Jews Who Fled Hitler and Changed the World," who has written extensively about her own discovery, as an adult, that her parents were Jewish and that her grandparents died at Auschwitz. "Because he doesn't seem to know how to deal with some of the most sensitive issues that speak to his fundamental character … Allen obviously hasn't assimilated too many of history's lessons and the lessons of American politics, which is that you can't hide anything—you have to embrace it, you have to own it." Sixty years since the Holocaust, with politicians from Gen. Wesley Clark to Sen. John Kerry "owning" their Jewish roots in public, she adds, a revelation of Jewishness should be anything but shameful.

But as the case of Madeleine Albright shows, coming to grips with hidden Jewish ancestry isn't always easy. Abraham H. Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, offered to be Allen's counselor in his new search for identity. Foxman, who was born Jewish in Poland but was raised Roman Catholic by a nanny who protected him during World War II, suggests that Allen has yet to make peace with his own Jewish roots. "He needs to work it out within himself, and he needs to sit down with me [or the media] and share the depths of his anger, confusion and embarrassment."

For his part, Allen has said that he knew his maternal grandfather had been in a concentration camp, but he thought he had been imprisoned because he sympathized with the Allied cause. When the senator did recently ask his mother about their background, she confirmed that they were born Jewish but swore her son to secrecy out of fear for the family's well-being; she released him from his bond when the story blew up in the press. "This is so personal," he told CNN's Wolf Blitzer earlier this week. "To think that a person … is still having that pain in her, it's still paining her; she still lives in fear of that intimidation, that bigotry, that prejudice, that anti-Semitism."

The idea that Allen might be Jewish was first made public in an August issue of The Forward, a Jewish newspaper—a torturous connecting of the dots between Allen's mother's Tunisian background and an insult, "macaca," that Allen flung at an Indian-American campaign worker for the opposition. Questions from reporters followed and Allen handled them badly. On Monday, when a reporter asked for clarity on the Jewish issue, Allen dodged it, saying his mother was raised Christian; when the reporter persisted, the senator became dismissive, saying "Oh, that's just all. That's just all."

Then came the public confirmation—and the ham sandwich remark. Just hours before sundown on the eve of Rosh Hashana, Ric Arenstein, past president of the Jewish Community Federation of Richmond, was more amused than aghast at Allen's remarks. They don't rise to the level of anti-Semitism, he said, just bad timing. In the days to come, there will be "more Jews together than any weekend this year. That's especially bad the month before an election." Foxman is more sympathetic: "It's not easy" to be in Allen's spot, but as the New Year begins, he offers some free advice: decide who you are, and embrace it.

Etty Allen's Unease (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

You may have heard the term "gaydar," the ability claimed by some gay people to detect other gays. My mother has a similar skill -- call it "Jewdar" -- the knack for identifying fellow members of the tribe.

When I was growing up in northern New Jersey, my mother would demonstrate this talent when we went to restaurants, methodically shifting her gaze from table to table. "Jew, Jew, Christian, intermarried," she would pronounce, with the certitude of the preternaturally gifted.

I've got to admit, though: Virginia Sen. George Allen would have stumped Judy Marcus. Madeleine Albright -- not a surprise. Take off that gaudy eagle pin, take her out of the Council on Foreign Relations and she looks like everyone's Jewish grandma.

But George Allen Jewish? This is like finding out Joe Lieberman is a closet Presbyterian. George Allen makes Montana's Conrad Burns look like a yeshiva boy.

First, there's Allen's football shtick: the coach father, the incessant gridiron metaphors, the -- pardon the phrase -- pigskin he likes to toss into the audience at campaign events. Add the chewing tobacco, the cowboy boots, the Confederate flags, and Allen is the ultimate un-Jew, his goyish bona fides beyond question.

Was that part of the point, consciously or not? In fact, it turns out, the Jewish Question wasn't entirely new to Allen: Charlottesville Daily Progress columnist Bob Gibson referred to the senator's Jewish roots in an October 2003 column -- and says that was the only time in 27 years of coverage that Allen demanded a correction.

It wouldn't be much of a stretch to find offense in Allen's behavior. His hostile response to the debate question -- okay, the reporter's phrasing was odd, but Allen's bristling was out of proportion. His revealing remark that it was wrong to be "making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs." His misleading restatement of his mother's background. Yes, she asked him -- begged him, he said later -- not to tell, but, as any politician knows, there are lots more elegant ways to duck a question.

But I can understand Allen's discomfiture. For many of us, as a matter of culture as much as of spirituality, our religious roots form part of the basic architecture of our self-image. No wonder Allen reached for the nearest ham sandwich and lovingly recalled his mother's prowess with pork chops.

Rather than feeling affronted, though, I prefer to see the pathos in the Allen family story. I imagine Mrs. Allen, turning the pork chops, putting the angel on top of the Christmas tree, all the while feeling the impostor, the outsider with a Terrible Secret. How did she feel when her husband-to-be asked that she keep her background hidden from his mother?

Indeed, the Allen story captures in microcosm an important, if not particularly attractive, aspect of the Jewish experience. How much easier to hide your Judaism, change your name, not to stick out so much in the majority culture. Some Jews responded to the Holocaust with "Never Again" resolve not to play history's perpetual victim. Others learned the lesson of determined assimilation.

"What they put my father through, I always was fearful," Henrietta "Etty" Allen told The Post's Michael D. Shear, referring to her father's imprisonment by the Nazis during the German occupation of Tunis. "I didn't want my children to have to go through that fear all the time."

This week, as the Allen story broke, I've been reading my friend Jeffrey Goldberg's new book, "Prisoners," about his journey from becoming a teenage Zionist on Long Island's South Shore to serving as a prison guard in the Israeli army to covering the intifada for the New Yorker.

Goldberg describes the immutable alienation of Jews, even in America, even now. "We felt something, I think, that many Jews in this country still feel: a kind of involuntary apartness, an unease, rooted in an incontrovertible truth about America -- that no matter what the Constitution says, it is a Christian country," he writes. "It could be argued that no country in the Diaspora has so successfully inoculated itself against Jew-hatred as has America. But the fear of anti-Semitism is the forge on which many American Jews build their identities."

Etty Allen understood this fear and unease. So, I suspect, does her son, from a different, more entitled, vantage point. And that may go some way toward explaining this whole meshugeneh episode.

Hawaii's Akaka Could Become Next Primary Victim (WSJ)

By Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

In a year when primary voters have already proven willing to dump status-quo candidates, one of Hawaii's veteran senators could become the next casualty in a season of political discontent.

Sen. Daniel Akaka, an 82-year-old Democrat and 30-year veteran of Capitol Hill, has been put on the defensive in Saturday's primary by Rep. Ed Case, who is almost 30 years his junior. The outcome will likely determine the November winner, since Republican competition is weak.

Recent polls show Mr. Akaka pulling barely more than 50% of the likely vote, a weak showing for a longtime incumbent. Moreover, the polls show a large percentage of voters have yet to make up their minds. Undecided voters are often bad news for well-known officeholders, who can offer little that is new at the end of a campaign to persuade voters to back them.

What's more, says Jennifer E. Duffy, editor of the Cook Political Report in Washington, Mr. Akaka's so-so poll showing may overstate the support behind him. "I think it's going to be one of those races where no outcome would truly surprise us," she adds.

With Congress's approval rating on the slide -- down to 20% in the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC poll -- a number of incumbents already have been ousted. In Connecticut, newcomer Ned Lamont beat three-term Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is now running as an independent. Gov. Frank Murkowski lost Alaska's Republican primary to former Wasilla Mayor Sarah Palin. In Michigan, Republican Rep. Joe Schwarz fell to former state lawmaker Tim Walberg. And in Georgia, Democratic Rep. Cynthia McKinney lost to Hank Johnson.

In Hawaii, the candidates' ages have been a focal point. Mr. Case has been urging Hawaiians to "catch a new wave" and protect the state's seniority in the Senate. That's an issue, he says, because Hawaii's other senator, Daniel K. Inouye, is also 82. Both senators appear to be in good health, but if that were to change, and Hawaii ended up with newcomers holding both seats, the state would lose the clout seniority brings.

"Hawaii is going to face disaster if it doesn't begin this transition," Mr. Case says. "We are focused on the need for new blood and looking toward the future. It takes some forward thinking."

Mr. Case cites what occurred in Oregon, when long-serving senators retired in 1995 and 1996, and left the state with little juice in the Senate.

In turn, Mr. Akaka's campaign accentuates the positives of him being 82 and having worked 16 years in the Senate and 14 years in the House. The senator also highlights his opposition to the Iraq war. "Age is something that is revered, something that is much esteemed for," Mr. Akaka said in August during his only televised debate with Mr. Case. "When I think of those who are up in age in the U.S. Senate, those men are considered to be the deans of the Senate. Other senators go to them for advice, and they are the ones that keep the Senate stable."

In a recent Hawaii Poll of likely voters, 18% said Mr. Case's theme of leadership transition is the most important issue when picking a candidate, while 14% said it was Mr. Akaka's theme of seniority. A far greater number -- 43% -- said the candidate's stance on issues is most important.

The poll of 601 likely voters showed Mr. Akaka with a wide lead, 51% to Mr. Case's 38%, but the 11% of voters who said they were undecided could swing the outcome. The poll by Ward Research Inc. was conducted between Sept. 6 and Sept. 12, and has a four-percentage-point margin of error.

Another poll taken Sept. 8 through Sept. 12 just on the island of Hawaii -- which doesn't include the big city of Honolulu -- by SMS Research and Marketing Services found Mr. Akaka ahead of Mr. Case 42% to 28% -- but with a huge 30% of voters undecided. The poll of 401 voters has a 5.2-percentage-point error margin.

Two factors might prove to be decisive: turnout and crossover voting, though neither is a given for the challenger. "Case's challenge is that he needs a big turnout. That's not easy to do in this state," says Neal Milner, professor of political science at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. In the past two presidential elections, Hawaii had the lowest voter turnout in the nation. As for support from Republican and independent voters, Mr. Milner says that is tricky. Republicans might favor someone less liberal than Mr. Akaka but "don't need to elect a candidate who is vigorous, moderate and not a Republican," he says.

Mr. Milner's colleague, political-science Prof. Jim Dator, says Mr. Akaka faces a tough race because he has so little to show for three decades in Washington. "No one can say he's done bad or poorly," Mr. Dator says. "He just hasn't done anything." In April, Time magazine named Mr. Akaka one of the five least-effective senators.

"Akaka describes himself as a workhorse, not a showhorse," says spokeswoman Elisa Yadao. "He hasn't been as active with legislation that has his name on it, but he's been a part of actual funding results."

Says Mr. Case: "Voters who are not decided for Akaka are just thinking through the last stages of supporting me."

Hawaii Voters Head To Polls For Primary (AP-Y)

By Mark Niesse, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

Sen. Daniel Akaka faces a challenge in Saturday's Democratic primary from a congressman who wants voters to dump the 82-year-old lawmaker in favor of younger blood.

Rep. Ed Case, 53, has used images of Hawaiian surf in his ad campaign, telling voters to "catch a new wave" by electing a younger senator before Akaka and Sen. Daniel Inouye, also 82, leave office and rob the state of the clout that came with their seniority.

Akaka, who has served 30 years in Congress, has largely ignored Case's calls for new leadership in Washington. Instead, he has highlighted his experience and his consistent votes against the Iraq war.

Two recent polls showed Akaka with a substantial lead among likely Democratic voters, but many people were undecided, and Case could benefit from Republicans and independents who take a Democratic ballot in the open primary.

"Because this is the hot race, you're going to see a lot of crossing over," said University of Hawaii political science professor Ira Rohter. "A lot of them are going to vote for Ed Case because they want to get someone who's less liberal in there."

Akaka held more than a 2-to-1 advantage in fundraising, collecting more than $2 million to Case's $817,000 early this month.

Hawaii has the lowest voter turnout in the nation, with even less participation in primaries. Only 40 percent of 626,000 registered voters cast ballots in the 2004 primary.

Native Hawaiians, who make up about one-eighth of registered voters, were getting an extra push to the polls, with an election-eve rally in front of the Hawaiian royalty's Iolani Palace.

Akaka, a Native Hawaiian himself, planned to personally drum up voters in heavily Hawaiian communities on Election Day. Case is white but had strong multi-ethnic support to win two congressional terms.

The winner faces no serious GOP opposition in the general election, although Republican Gov. Linda Lingle asked voters to nominate motivational speaker Jerry Coffee, who pulled out of the race because of illness. That would enable the party to pick a new candidate for November.

The race for Case's congressional seat developed into a free-for-all, with a dozen experienced candidates seeking the nomination. The primary winner is favored to win the general election, keeping Hawaii's congressional delegation all-Democratic.

Two little-known Democrats are competing to take on Lingle in November, but she is expected to easily win a second term regardless of her challenger. Political newcomer William Aila, a harbormaster, is hoping to upset former state Sen. Randy Iwase.

Election officials planned to use a new form of electronic voting that will leave a paper trail to help verify votes. New touch-screen voting machines are equipped with printers that will display a paper ballot behind a glass window. If there are errors, voters may make changes before casting their ballots.

AP, September 23, 2006

The Green Party's U.S. Senate candidate fell about 9,000 signatures short of the number he needs to qualify for the Nov. 7 ballot as counting stopped Friday, according to his lawyers and those of state Democrats.

A review of the signatures Carl Romanelli gathered in his bid to compete against Republican Sen. Rick Santorum and Democratic state Treasurer Bob Casey was suspended Friday under a state judge's order issued earlier in the week.

Romanelli, a railroad industry consultant, needed to gather 67,070 signatures to qualify for statewide office this year. His candidacy is expected to help Santorum's chances for re-election by drawing votes from Casey.

State Democrats are suing to have him thrown off the ballot. Casey's campaign and the state Democratic Party have accused Santorum of engineering Romanelli's candidacy.

Lawrence M. Otter, a lawyer for Romanelli, said Friday he hopes to persuade Judge James R. Kelley to allow Romanelli to remain on the ballot when a hearing on his nominating petitions resumes Monday.

Pennsylvania law requires minor-party and independent candidates to collect a number of signatures equal to 2 percent of the ballots cast for the largest vote-getter in the last statewide election. This year's threshold was based on Casey's record vote count in winning the treasurer's office in 2004.

Gov. Rendell Helping Senate Candidate (AP-Y)

By Kimberly Hefling

AP, September 23, 2006

Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell is helping a fellow Democrat and former rival — Senate candidate Bob Casey.

Rendell stands up for Casey in a new ad, calling Republican Sen. Rick Santorum's latest TV spot "trash." Rendell's chief fundraisers said Thursday they had raised a combined $250,000 for Casey.

The effort represents Rendell's most public support yet for Casey in what has been a complicated relationship.

Rendell, the former Philadelphia mayor, beat Casey in the 2002 Democratic gubernatorial primary after an especially nasty campaign. Sixteen years earlier, Casey's father, the late Gov. Robert P. Casey, handed Rendell a bitter defeat in the same primary.

Last year, Rendell helped clear the field as national party leaders recruited Casey to run in the Senate race against Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican. But Rendell made headlines this summer when he praised Santorum as an effective senator.

That all ended recently when Santorum launched an attack ad implying that Casey's campaign team is comprised of men who are under investigation. The Santorum ad features actors portraying four donors to Casey's campaign gathered inside a smoke-filled jail cell.

The senator's campaign later conceded that none of the men had given money to Casey's Senate campaign and that two had actually contributed to Santorum's campaign, which was later donated to charity.

The new Casey ad talks about those two donations to Santorum and features a news clip of Rendell saying, "To somewhat insinuate that there are crooks or criminals behind his campaign, that sort of stuff is trash."

Rendell's support could help Casey garner votes in the Philadelphia area. Rendell is widely crediting with orchestrating the city's renaissance. In the general election, Rendell faces Republican Lynn Swann, but the governor is well ahead in polls. Casey is also head of Santorum in polls.

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — Democrat Amy Klobuchar can blame a blogger for a sudden bump in what had been a smooth run for Minnesota's open Senate seat.

Klobuchar held a comfortable lead over Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy in three polls this week, but was forced to fire her top spokeswoman for viewing Kennedy's not-yet-aired ad. A liberal blogger sent the spot to Tara McGuinness after pulling it from a media consultant's Web site.

Klobuchar campaign manager Ben Goldfarb said he found out about the ad Saturday but not the full scope of the problem until Monday, when McGuinness was fired. The campaign alerted the FBI, and announced McGuinness's firing Wednesday, saying they waited until a report to the FBI was complete.

Goldfarb said neither he nor Klobuchar viewed the ad, and the campaign wouldn't be changing strategies because of it.

Whether the incident damages Klobuchar's campaign is uncertain. Prior to the episode, Democrats had marveled at the discipline of her campaign operation.

"She's made a lot of the right moves up until now, and certainly you wish something like this hadn't happened," said Mark Andrew, a former state DFL chairman.

Republicans quickly criticized her.

"This is an extraordinarily sad day for all Minnesotans who value fair play in public life," GOP Chairman Ron Carey said Thursday at a news conference.

Pr. George's Ballots Keep Wynn In Lead (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

Nearly 10 days after the polls closed, Prince George's County officials yesterday finished counting their votes from the Democratic primary election -- and delivered good news to veteran congressman Albert R. Wynn.

The final Prince George's tally helped cushion Wynn's lead over challenger Donna Edwards in the 4th Congressional District. Edwards said late yesterday that she would not concede until Montgomery County officials finished counting a few thousand provisional paper ballots.

In the congressional district that includes much of Prince George's and a slice of Montgomery, Wynn now leads by about 2,700 votes, officials said.

As of late yesterday, 9,945 of the nearly 12,000 provisional ballots had been counted in Montgomery. That appears to make it mathematically impossible for Edwards to win.

Still, Wynn was not ready to declare victory until all provisional votes were counted. "I don't want to make premature comments," he said. "It's a thing where people are sensitive right now."

Last week, Edwards threatened to file a lawsuit over voting irregularities in Prince George's. Yesterday she said she was waiting to get more information from the county's Board of Elections before deciding what legal step, if any, to take.

"I said from the beginning that I'll make my decision or statement after all the votes are counted," Edwards said.

Win or lose, her spirited campaign gave Wynn the scare of his political career. Since his election in 1992, Wynn has been returned to Congress with no less than 80 percent of the vote in primary and general elections.

During the five-month campaign, Edwards took Wynn to task for his vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq and labeled him as a Democrat who had betrayed his base by voting with Republicans on certain issues.

Wynn would not address questions about the campaign or the results.

"I definitely will have some comments, but I don't think I should weigh in until all the votes are counted," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068127

Criticized in the past for delving too deeply into local issues and not paying enough attention to Congress, Wynn said yesterday that he was busy with his work on Capitol Hill.

"We did the Ryan White funding, there are immigration bills that are being talked about," Wynn said. "That's what I've been kind of focused on."

The provisional vote count in Montgomery resumes today and could stretch into tomorrow, said Margaret Jurgensen, the county election director.

Officials said some of the ballots were particularly difficult to verify because of the human errors and technical glitches that made the Sept. 12 primary one of the most chaotic in years.

"We're trying our best, but we're far more interested in accuracy than speed," Jurgensen said.

The Montgomery Board of Elections is scheduled to certify the results of its local races on Monday, she said.

A Day Of Thrust And Parry (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Sept. 22 -- Rep. Anne M. Northup looked pleasant and motherly in her honeydew-green blazer, her smile as sweet as iced tea. "It's good to see all my friends here," the Kentucky Republican said in greeting the handful of reporters who braved strong wind and rain for an early-morning news conference.

Dead silence.

Then it was down to business. Friday's business for Northup was the attempted disembowelment of Democratic challenger John Yarmuth. Her weapon was Yarmuth's own words, preserved in a stack of newspaper columns that Northup brandished at the podium.

Voters, she warned, should know that the Democrat wanted to punish SUV owners, endorsed the legalization of marijuana and was all in favor of teenage drinking. "Parents should be concerned," she said, and so should everyone else. "He has a lot of goofy ideas."

Northup perhaps did not provide the most fair-minded interpretation of what Yarmuth had written as a columnist for the Louisville Eccentric Observer. But nor were her descriptions necessarily so far afield. The Democrat did once back taxes on gas-guzzling vehicles, some of which are manufactured in the district. He wrote a column about prison crowding that praised Canada for decriminalizing pot, and he suggested that lowering the drinking age to 18 is "something we should consider."

The GOP strategy in this competitive race is to shower Yarmuth's newspaper musings with a lot more attention in 2006 than they got when he penned them years ago. The Democrat is the founder of the Eccentric Observer, an alternative newspaper that may prove to be a tad too alternative for the Kentucky 3rd's conservative voters.

The day offered a vivid -- and at times bizarre -- window into the not-so-subtle art of the political attack. Northup and her campaign team have been sitting on the columns since early in the summer, savoring their possibilities and waiting for the right moment to drop them for maximum impact.

That moment came 46 days before Election Day. The first blow was the news conference at Northup headquarters, which is sandwiched between a laser-tag playground and a comic-book store. This was followed by the biggest television-advertising buy of her campaign. Northup plans to make the columns the centerpiece of her campaign from now to Nov. 7.

The strategy's launch made for an emotional day. As the news conference continued, Northup took on an agitated, apparently angry demeanor. Her voice rose as she recited her charges and parried skeptical questions from reporters. She looked through her stack of columns, looking for the one in which Yarmuth said voters like to be "misled or spat on."

The House campaign here has only recently resumed. Northup's 30-year-old son died this summer from a heart problem, and both candidates suspended most campaign activities until a few weeks ago. At the news conference, Northup's eyes looked heavy and tired.

Usually, politicians drop their most damaging "opposition research" without fingerprints, leaking it to a reporter or airing it through a third party. Northup, by contrast, hurled her charge like an anvil through glass.

The purpose is to make Yarmuth, an antiwar liberal who disagrees with her on virtually every issue, an unacceptable alternative -- even to many Democrats. They outnumber Republicans almost 2 to 1 here, which has made Northup a prime target since her first victory in 1996.

Northup's aides were proud of their handiwork. Campaign manager Patrick Neely encouraged Washington Post reporters to make a detour on a nine-day tour of the region to be present for the news conference, where, he promised, there would be a spectacle too good to miss.

There was a 27-inch TV to play a new attack ad and a flat-screen monitor showing the new Web site that will walk voters through controversial things Yarmuth has written and said.

Yarmuth, of course, knew he had written the columns. He said he had spent six weeks mulling the consequences of his columns before deciding to run for the seat.

And he also knew that Northup wanted to use them. In July, the representative staged a news conference outside the Eccentric Observer. She demanded access to the only existing copies of Yarmuth's writings in 800 editions of the paper. In a symbolic gesture, she handed over her voting record, copies of which sit on a chair in the editor's office to this day. The paper's editors agreed to allow the Northup campaign to copy the columns, in the presence of a security guard paid for by the GOP campaign. Yarmuth no longer has day-to-day involvement with the paper, and the editor said he saw no reason not to comply. Neely spent the next two months reading thousands of pages of what Yarmuth had written and published.

Yarmuth also had an inkling that Northup was about to unveil the fruits of her research. The night before Northup's news conference, a Yarmuth spokesman warned reporters that things could "blow up."

The episode offered Yarmuth a chance to show his skill at one of the least-appreciated moves in politics: self-defense. This requires candidates to identify their weak spots before their opponents do. Some candidates hire people to examine their pasts for any potential vulnerability, be it a messy divorce, controversial votes in local government or, as in this case, columns written at a time when a political career was not an immediate concern.

Coincidentally, one of the controversial columns Northup cited included advice for politicians in a similar pickle. In January 2004, he said the first principle of damage control is, "Under no circumstance, admit you were wrong."

By lunchtime, a few hours after the Northup broadside, Yarmuth was heeding his own advice. It was Burke -- not the candidate -- who headlined a hastily arranged news conference inside the Democratic candidate's office. Yarmuth was sequestered nearby.

Burke took to a makeshift lectern facing the same group of reporters who had attended the Northup attack. He said he did not want to dignify most of the charges with a response, even though "no one wants to smack around people as much as I do." He then spent most of the conference bashing Northup and ignoring the specifics of her accusations.

Did the candidate advocate legalizing pot? "Ridiculous," he said. What about lowering the drinking age? "Silliest thing I have ever heard." He resorted to a form of political jujitsu popular among politicians under siege: Attack the attacker. He said Northup backs President Bush 91 percent of the time. He implored reporters to ask her: "What are you proud of?"

Burke said the candidate would not stoop to answering Northup's charges himself, but the campaign manager did not seem entirely confident in this strategy: "This might backfire, and people might think he is ducking," he said. "But this is not your grandfather's campaign."

AP: Shuler-linked Firm Pays Back Taxes (AP-Y)

By Tim Whitmire

AP, September 23, 2006

A real estate brokerage house associated with Democratic House candidate Heath Shuler belatedly paid over $69,000 in unpaid taxes Friday after The Associated Press raised questions with the campaign.

Shuler, a former star quarterback at the University of Tennessee, has a 20 percent stake in the Knoxville-based business, Heath Shuler Real Estate, which he founded with his brother, Benjie, in 1998. They sold it in 2003 to four men who formed HSRE and HSRE Properties but kept the football player's name.

A recent AP review of tax records in Knoxville and surrounding Knox County found the businesses had been chronically delinquent in paying their local taxes. The AP presented the information to the Shuler campaign this week.

Jason Rudd, a lawyer for Shuler in Jackson, Tenn., said he threatened the three principal owners — Robert Browder, Charlie Hicks and Jack Cornett — with legal action on Shuler's behalf if they did not pay the delinquent taxes immediately. Late Friday, Shuler's attorneys filed a lawsuit asking a judge to stop HSRE and HSRE Properties from using the name "Heath Shuler."

The complaint said the defendants have operated the business in a way that "brings into question the reputation, ethics and/or morals of" Shuler. Rudd said Friday he expects Shuler will give up his minority ownership stake, but needs to remain involved to ensure enforcement of a contract provision allowing him to remove his name.

Fred Sisk, chief deputy trustee for Knox County, confirmed Friday that HSRE and HSRE Properties had paid their county tax bills. A city spokesman, Randy Kenner, said just over $1,400 of the money owed the city was paid Thursday, but the later payment likely wouldn't show up until Monday.

Shuler is running for the House in western North Carolina's 11th Congressional District, seeking to unseat eight-term Republican Rep. Charles Taylor. The race is among those Democrats have high hopes of winning as they push to regain control of the House.

Rudd said Shuler, a former NFL quarterback, has not been involved in day-to-day management of the brokerage since 2003. But his name is prominently tied to the business throughout Knoxville, where Shuler played football in the early 1990s. The Heath Shuler Real Estate logo, seen throughout town on billboards and signs, features the distinctive orange-and-white checkerboard painted in the end zones of Tennessee's Neyland Stadium.

"I have been assured twice in the last six months that these past due taxes would be paid," Rudd wrote in an e-mail Thursday to Browder. "HSREs ongoing refusal to operate its business in accordance with the law is causing extreme embarrassment to Heath."

In an initial e-mail response to Rudd, Browder said the company did not have the money to pay its 2005 tax bills. However, he told Rudd late Friday morning that all overdue bills had been paid.

The AP review found:

· HSRE Properties had owed the City of Knoxville $38,896.89 in overdue property taxes and penalties for the 2004 and 2005 tax years for the company's 1.84-acre headquarters site in Knoxville. That debt was listed on a roster of delinquent tax payments issued earlier this month by the city.

· The city had been owed an additional $8,122.72 in tangible personal property taxes and penalties for tax years 2004 and 2005 on a pair of Heath Shuler Real Estate offices. Such taxes cover office equipment and other property owned by a business.

· HSRE Properties had owed the county $17,183.14 in unpaid 2005 property taxes, as well as $5,048.12 on overdue taxes on tangible personal property.

"Ninety-six percent of Knox County taxpayers paid their taxes on time last year," said Sisk, the Knox County tax official, before the taxes were paid. "Some people just don't have the money to pay. For those people, you feel sorry. These people can pay, they just choose not to pay."

In June, Rudd wrote to Browder and expressed Shuler's concerns "about the business, and about the continued use of his name having an adverse affect on his reputation in the community." In that letter, a copy of which Rudd provided to the AP, Rudd said Shuler wanted to exercise his right to remove his name from the business.

But after receiving assurances that the problems were being dealt with and that the taxes would be paid, Rudd said, "we kind of backed off to give them a chance" to straighten things out.

The AP's review also uncovered two unresolved tax liens held by the state of Tennessee on now-dissolved Shuler-owned companies, Heath Shuler Real Estate Commercial and Heath Shuler Auctioning. Shuler created both companies in the late 1990s with the intention of using them for spin-offs from the main real estate business, but never did anything with them, Rudd said. They were administratively dissolved by the state of Tennessee after the companies failed to file annual reports.

However, because the state never received a 1999 corporate franchise and excise tax payment for the two companies, it eventually filed liens seeking the money in 2002, Rudd said. The liens total $883.65 each. Rudd said Shuler authorized him Thursday to pay those bills after the AP contacted the campaign.

Team Clinton (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, September 23, 2006

Suddenly Bill Clinton is everywhere, solving poverty, tackling AIDS, hosting Laura Bush, crafting the Democrats' message and deflecting questions about his wife's likely run for president. He doesn't know if he wants her to run, or if she'll run, and if she runs, he doesn't know that she'll win. “A million things can happen,” he said. But he does know one thing, that if she got elected, “she would be a magnificent president,” he told CNN’s Larry King this week.

Clinton is a force of nature, the shade tree for Hillary as she ventures out of the senatorial cocoon to vie for the presidency. Shade is mostly a good thing, but not always, and the yin-yang role of the former president in his wife's political life is understood by both of them. Unlike Al Gore, Hillary is at ease with her husband’s idiosyncrasies and has learned over a long marriage how to mitigate the damages.

As for Bill, he is her best strategist, with a fingertip feel for the electorate that is unrivaled. Thanks to the therapy he went through, says a friend, "He more than anyone can be objective about himself." Clinton has settled into his postpresidential life with gusto, and an approving public is rewarding his global good works with poll ratings that dwarf the current president’s. He is in the public eye as Hillary’s stand-in. But there will be times when he needs to get out of the way. Can she win? That’s what people want to know, and Clinton is pleasingly humble about his wife’s prospects. “If she did decide to run, I have no idea if she would win,” he told King.

Can a woman do it? There’s no history to draw on. A big chunk of the Democratic Party doesn’t trust her, doesn’t know what she stands for. Another chunk loves her but doesn’t think she can win. And then there’s the black hole of her marriage, which will once again prove endlessly fascinating if not to the general public then to the media. Attitudes toward Hillary are pretty hardened, both positive and negative. There's not a lot of fluidity in how people feel about her. She has changed minds in upstate New York, which is dominantly Republican, by focusing on economic concerns. If she can do that in Ohio, a state a Democrat should win in '08, while holding the Blue States John Kerry and Al Gore won, that would put her in the White House. She'd be polarizing, but then it's hard to imagine any Democrat that wouldn't be given the stakes and the tenor of modern campaigns.

Hillary already has a bad case of front-runneritis, measuring every public utterance and seeming way too cautious and calculating—especially for party activists. Excess caution comes with the territory for anybody running for president, says Matt Bennett with the Democratic centrist group Third Way. "You cannot be a viable presidential candidate without being vague," he says. Bennett was Wesley Clark's campaign manager in '04, a race that ran aground in New Hampshire primarily over Clark's unease as a newly registered Democrat with domestic issues in general and the abortion issue in particular. "The loyalists are always aggravated," Bennett adds. Not offending party regulars while courting independents is the key to winning, a balancing act requiring more skill than conviction.

What could derail Hillary? She could lose Iowa, the first contest, to John Edwards, who is banking on a reservoir of good will toward him from '04. The ghosts of Gore past and future hover over the race, and if Hillary falters, he could enter the race late, drawing on the MoveOn.org apparatus. A Democratic dream ticket that would upend the Washington establishment—Gore and Barack Obama, the charismatic freshman senator from Illinois who everybody agrees is destined for greater things. Who better to help Gore reclaim the presidency?

Hillary could survive a setback in Iowa, and maybe she can brush off Gore's lingering hunger for the presidency. She will win the nomination if she wants it. She's tough-minded; she has the money, and former Democratic Party chairman Terry McAuliffe got caught by The Hill newspaper telling friends he'll chair her presidential campaign. She's headed for a big re-election win in New York, and according to Clinton on Larry King, she'll re-evaluate her role in the Senate after the election. She's already a player on the Armed Services Committee. If the Democrats are smart and recognize her as their likely nominee, they'll look for ways to showcase her.

If she doesn't run, or runs and loses, she is the natural heir to take over the legacy of Ted Kennedy, the liberal lion of the Senate. Untethered by presidential ambition, she could travel the world and do the Sunday shows, freed from parsing her words, confident she could keep her seat as long as she wants it. "It's the deal or no deal—do you gamble on $6 million or walk away with $1 million," says Bennett. From her sinecure in the Senate, Hillary can take the gamble. Can Democrats?

'Values Voters' Told To Know The Enemy (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

A prominent evangelical leader told more than 1,000 conservative "values" voters yesterday that they shouldn't shy away from the fact that the country is in a war with Muslims who want to kill Americans.

"We're in a war and it's time that we recognized it," James C. Dobson told a crowd gathered at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in the District. The event is sponsored by Family Research Council Action and aimed at invigorating the Republican base for November's elections.

Mr. Dobson, chairman and founder of Focus on the Family, made it clear that he doesn't think all Muslims want to kill Americans. But he said there is a percentage -- even if it's only 4 percent, or close to 50 million people -- who do.

Several Republican presidential hopefuls made stops at the weekend event to rally their own support from the conservative base, touching on topics from traditional marriage to religious freedom.

Among them was Sen. George Allen of Virginia, who told crowd members to "count on me" in the fight for conservative values, such as stopping judges from "legislating from the bench."

Later yesterday, reporters focused on Mr. Allen's heritage. The Republican senator told the public for the first time this week that he has Jewish ancestry. Mr. Allen, who is in a competitive re-election race, has fought off criticism that he was embarrassed by his heritage.

Mr. Allen told reporters that his mother concealed her Jewish heritage for years and recently swore him to secrecy about it because she was "seared" by the pain of the Holocaust and thought "that anti-Semitism, that persecution" would harm her children.

He told the reporters that he is a Christian, but, "I'm learning more and more about Jewish law."

Meanwhile, Mr. Dobson and Family Research Council President Tony Perkins sought to rally the troops for the midterm elections by reminding them that Republicans helped get two new conservative justices on the Supreme Court and that Democrats are still blocking legislation and President Bush's judicial nominations.

DOJ_NMG_0068131

Mr. Dobson evoked applause and cheers when he reminded the crowd that "we do have two new very, very exciting Supreme Court justices," referring to Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The crowd was urged not to be convinced of reports that Republicans will lose control of Congress.

"Don't believe everything you're hearing out there," Mr. Dobson said.

"I feel much better about the outcome this fall than I did three months ago," Mr. Perkins said, citing falling gas prices and votes in Congress on key pieces of legislation sought by the conservative base.

Mr. Perkins noted that senators approved a parental-notification bill for out-of-state abortions, but said Democrats are blocking the legislation from getting to Mr. Bush's desk.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, who spoke yesterday afternoon, drew loud applause when he described September 11 and then told the crowd, "We should not for one moment feel that we have to apologize for doing the right things."

The "2006 Values Voters Summit" ends tomorrow with a church service and has drawn more than 1,600 evangelical Christians and conservative activists from across the country to strategize about the upcoming elections and hear speeches from a who's who of conservative voices, including Liberty University founder the Rev. Jerry Falwell, Alliance Defense Fund Chief Executive Officer Alan Sears, evangelical leader Gary Bauer and conservative talk-show hosts such as Sean Hannity.

Tactic Uses Pulpits To Power The GOP (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Evangelical leaders, on the first day of a rally, ask pastors to advocate for a social conservative agenda despite recent IRS investigations.

WASHINGTON — Worried that discontent among conservatives and the lack of a clear standard-bearer to follow President Bush might cost Republicans in November, top evangelical leaders pleaded with their followers Friday to put aside frustrations and turn out for GOP candidates.

The appeals, coming on the opening day of a weekend-long rally and strategy conference, included entreaties to pastors to use their pulpits on behalf of the social conservative agenda.

"There is no choice, because the alternative is terrible," said James C. Dobson, founder of the influential group Focus on the Family, referring to the potential for a Democratic takeover of the House and Senate in November.

Dobson's organization recently launched a major voter recruitment drive in eight battleground states that will include placing registration tables outside Sunday worship services at conservative churches.

The Values Voter Summit — which will include appearances by several potential GOP presidential hopefuls — underscores evangelicals' growing power in national politics. The agenda serves as a road map of their tactics for energizing voters, including sessions on fighting gay marriage, attacking Hollywood liberalism and denouncing embryonic stem-cell research.

Kicking off the conference Friday, Dobson joined other evangelical chieftains in lobbying pastors to feel more free to advocate for conservative causes from the pulpit despite recent investigations by the Internal Revenue Service into alleged partisan activities by churches. One such investigation has ensnared the liberal All Saints Church in Pasadena, over a sermon denouncing the Iraq war shortly before the 2004 election.

One session today is to focus on the "role of churches in political issues." On Friday, Dobson and a representative from an evangelical-backed legal group told the crowd that churches were free to distribute fliers and other materials promoting stands on issues.

"You still can't endorse candidates, but you can do voter guides," Dobson said. "You can do all kinds of things."

Critics say Dobson and his allies are crossing the line and giving bad advice to churches. The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, mailed letters this week to 117,000 churches in 11 states warning them not to go along with voter registration drives and other activities.

"They are talking about a systematic effort to get churches involved in political activity," said Lynn, who attended the conference and met privately backstage with Dobson to debate the question. "They say this isn't partisan, but then they turn around and make it clear that their goal is to keep Republicans in power."

Friday's events showed that evangelicals intend to broaden their focus on issues that can motivate voters. Leaders framed the GOP's signature issue of terrorism as a matter of "protecting the family" and winning a war between Judeo-Christian traditions and Islamic extremism.

Dobson, whose radio show is heard by millions, said protecting the country from terrorism was a "family issue."

"If we don't have security for ourselves and for our children and future generations, we don't have a future for the family," he said.

The mention of terrorism was the latest indication that conservative strategists are looking for additional motivators beyond the issue of gay marriage, which was credited with helping Bush secure reelection in 2004 thanks to a series of ballot initiatives that year in key states such as Ohio. Republican strategists have acknowledged that they intend to mobilize the conservative base by painting Democrats as soft on "foreign threats," as one internal GOP memo recently explained.

Other speakers on Friday focused on illegal immigration and called for a border crackdown, invoking an issue that has divided the GOP's conservative core from the White House and from Capitol Hill moderates.

But Friday's events showed that gay marriage remained a central rallying cry, with Dobson and others promoting initiatives this year in eight states.

"We see America on this collision course between religious freedoms and the homosexual agenda," said Tony Perkins, president of the conservative Family Research Council.

Three possible presidential candidates, along with White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, were applauded when they raised the issue.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a likely White House contender who is viewed skeptically by many evangelical leaders because he is a Mormon and is viewed as a moderate, said the country "desperately" needed a federal gay marriage ban. He won cheers as he spoke of his opposition to a ruling by his home state's highest court upholding same-sex marriage.

Similar themes were sounded by three other presidential possibilities: Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Sam Brownback of Kansas and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Allen — whose race for reelection this year has tightened after his use of the word "macaca," a racial slur in some countries, and his reaction to revelations that he has Jewish heritage — was boisterously applauded when he asked the conference activists to come to Virginia and assist with that state's initiative this year to ban gay marriage.

But though some potential Bush successors were eager to score points with the crowd, two of the party's front-runners were noticeably absent. Neither Sen. John McCain of Arizona nor former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani are scheduled to speak — a reminder that even as the GOP seeks to mobilize its base to maintain power, the future of the party's leadership remains much in doubt.

Conservatives Confident Base Will Vote (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, September 23, 2006

Better the devil they know than the Democrats.

Critical to the Republican base, conservatives expressed confidence Friday that their rank-and-file will vote Nov. 7 even though the GOP-controlled Congress hasn't delivered this year on their core issues.

"We're disgusted somewhat with some of the Republicans, but we'd be in a whole lot worse shape with the Democrats," said the Rev. Don Wildmon of Tupelo, Miss., chairman of the conservative American Family Association. "So, if you can't get the whole loaf, take a half a loaf."

Together, fiscal and social conservatives make up a significant segment of the GOP faithful, and the Republican Party always needs them to vote in droves. That's especially important this year because turnout typically is low in a midterm election cycle and polls show the public favoring Democrats to control Congress.

"If they don't come to the polls, we're in trouble," said Bishop Harry Jackson of College Park, Md., an evangelical Christian who leads the High-Impact Leadership Coalition, which promotes "moral issues" in urban communities.

A recent Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that 42 percent of white evangelicals disapprove of the job Bush has done as president. In 2004, exit polls showed 78 percent of white evangelicals voted for him.

"Republican voters are very soft, and I have no idea what this November holds," said Phil Burress, president of Citizens for Community Values in Cincinnati, a proponent of state and federal constitutional bans on gay marriage.

The fear of low turnout has led prominent conservative groups to initiate voter mobilization and outreach efforts. In that vein, hundreds of people attended a four-day "Values Voter Summit" sponsored by the country's leading conservatives and featuring several Republicans contemplating running for president in 2008.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and Sen. George Allen of Virginia addressed the conference Friday, and Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich were on tap Saturday.

Absent from the agenda were, among others, Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican whose maverick style and votes on gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research have irked conservatives, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who also has drawn the ire of that constituency.

After speaking to the conference, Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., said in an interview that he's confident conservatives will overlook Congress' lack of final action on their main issues.

"Conservative Americans are beginning to awaken to the perils of a Democratic Congress," he said.

The House and Senate hope to adjourn next week so lawmakers can spend the final few weeks before the election campaigning. That leaves little or no time for the House and Senate to vote on passionate issues for conservatives.

Congress still hasn't sent Bush an immigration reform or border security bill. Efforts to rein in federal spending this year have been piecemeal. And, the Senate has made only marginal progress in getting the president's judicial nominees confirmed.

Divisions among Republicans in which moderates have clashed with conservatives have stalled some of the legislation.

Meanwhile, a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage is dead for the year and Congress hasn't finished a bill aimed at preventing girls from crossing state lines to get an abortion without parental notification.

To make matters worse in the eyes of conservatives, Congress also sent the president a bill expanding the scope of federal involvement in embryonic stem cell research. Bush promptly vetoed it, his first.

Said Robert Bradley of Wellesley, Mass., the founder of the Massachusetts Family Institute: "Ultimately the conservatives, as annoyed as they are, will understand how awful the alternatives are in this case."

Christian Conservatives Mobilize To Rev Up `values Voters' (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

PITTSBURGH - To the daunting challenges facing Republicans in the 2006 midterm elections, add another: angry "values voters" who feel used and abandoned.

"We put these people in power in 2004," said Sue Means, a home-school activist from suburban Pittsburgh. "I really expected more. I'm disappointed."

The failed federal marriage amendment, waffling on stem cell research, no new limits on abortion - Means sees little but broken promises from the Republican Congress. And she's far from alone among like-minded people whom many credited in 2004 with helping pass same-sex marriage bans in 11 states and being key to President Bush's re-election.

"There are a lot of people that are somewhat disillusioned and have a feeling of betrayal for having worked so hard and have Republicans be so unresponsive," Dr. James Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, said after speaking at a rally here this week. "How that will play out, I really don't know."

Such discouragement is just one of several obstacles facing Republicans in mobilizing Christian conservatives this year.

Midterm elections excite fewer people anyway. A signature issue, such as a ban on same-sex marriage, is on the ballot in fewer states this year. And the federal government has promised to crack down on church-based partisan politicking after complaints about such behavior in 2004, which could suppress religious leaders' involvement and dampen turnout.

Dobson and others are working hard to counter that possibility, even as they acknowledge their disappointment.

"Whether Republicans deserve the power they were given, the alternatives are downright frightening," Dobson told more than 3,000 attendees at the Pittsburgh "Stand for the Family" rally.

The event was the first of three designed to energize Christian conservative voters. All three are in states with hotly contested Senate races: Pennsylvania, Minnesota and Tennessee.

The Pittsburgh event was part political rally, part church revival. Held at a downtown hockey arena, it featured entertainment by the Christian pop group The Sounds of Liberty. An enormous American flag hung behind the speakers, who included Dobson, Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council and Gary Bauer of American Values. All warned of threats to religious liberty, to marriage and, as Perkins put it, of "our children being indoctrinated with homosexuality in our public schools."

All the speakers stressed that they wouldn't tell people how to vote.

But if a politician shares his principles on issues from judges to marriage "and is committed to the God of the universe, and from my perspective, Jesus Christ his only begotten son ... it would be a sin not to go to the polls and vote for him or her," Dobson said.

Attendees munched on hot dogs and fries (the arena's beer coolers sat unplugged and empty) as they cheered the speakers and swayed to the music. Many attended with church groups and studied Bibles as they waited for the program. They were encouraged to "pray, prepare and participate" by, among other things, taking bulk packages of voter guides prepared by the conservative Pennsylvania Family Institute to distribute at their churches and asking pastors to hold voter registration drives.

"We can stand for the Lord Jesus Christ!" the Rev. Ken Hutcherson, pastor of Antioch Bible Church in Kirkland, Wash., roared to thunderous applause.

It appeared to have its intended effect. Means said she was "definitely energized." Becky Schran, who came with about 20 others from Walnut Grove Assemblies of God Church outside Pittsburgh, said she hoped the rally "gets more information out to people and gets them attuned to what's going on."

Similar efforts are under way across the country. In Missouri, home of another tight Senate race, a ballot initiative on stem cell research has energized social conservative voters. There, Texas evangelist Rick Scarborough has led five church rallies, with two more scheduled, to rev up voters to oppose the initiative. In Washington this week, the Family Research Council's Values Voter Summit included a training session on "Getting Church Voters to the Polls."

And gay marriage bans are on the ballot in eight states this year, including three with close Senate races: Arizona, Virginia and Tennessee.

"When you have a marriage amendment on the ballot, it makes it that much easier" to motivate conservative Christian voters, said John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "And on balance, they'll vote for the Republican candidates in those states."

Some say such efforts go too far. Americans United for Separation of Church and State sent 117,000 letters to pastors of churches in 11 states targeted for action by conservative Christian leaders. The letter reminded pastors that IRS regulations prohibit churches from endorsing or opposing specific candidates and from intervening directly in partisan campaigns. Doing so could jeopardize a church's tax-exempt status and lead to fines, the group warned. Even seemingly benign voter guides can be a thinly veiled partisan effort, the letter said.

Earlier this year, the IRS reported that in the 2004 cycle, it investigated 47 allegations of improper church politicking; 37 were given warnings or fined, and a few cases remain outstanding.

"Houses of worship must not become cogs in someone's political machine," said the Rev. Barry Lynn, the group's executive director, accusing Dobson and others of trying "to build a kind of religious Tammany Hall."

"I don't set the Senate races and I don't set the referenda," Scarborough responded. "If that has an impact on Senate races, so be it. I hope and pray that pro-life senators get elected. That's no secret. But I don't think I'd even recognize Jim Talent," the Republican incumbent in the Missouri U.S. Senate race.

Allen Hertzke, a professor at the University of Oklahoma who studies evangelical Christians, said the IRS focus could suppress voter turnout.

Given the array of obstacles, it wouldn't be surprising if Christian conservatives show less clout in 2006, Green said.

"But we shouldn't underestimate their ability to reach their constituencies," Green added. "A lot of this happens through church networks. Unless you happen to be in the network, you wouldn't notice it."

Renouncing Bush's Failures Is A Start (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The president's onetime lapdogs should also rethink the extremist ideology that got us here.

IN RECENT MONTHS, Republicans have begun to discover that their leader is not the paragon they once thought he was.

Perhaps he is not a conservative at all but a deficit-mongering big-government advocate, a world-changing radical in disguise and a cultivator of global anti-Americanism. Perhaps, from Baghdad to Kabul to New Orleans, bungling is not the exception but the rule because he and his inner circle hold planning, the law, diplomacy and even reason in contempt.

Suddenly, Republicans as well as Democrats are urging the defenestration of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld — the Titanic chair-shifter's way of acknowledging a fiasco in Iraq. George Will savaged President Bush for a "triumph of unrealism." Embattled Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays lurched from "stay the course" to "phased withdrawal."

Just last month, conservative talk-show host Joe Scarborough asked, "Is Bush an Idiot?" In May, the popular right-wing KABC-AM (790) talk-show host Doug McIntyre declared: "I was wrong to have voted for George W. Bush…. I have been shocked repeatedly by a consistent litany of excuses, alibis, doubletalk, inaccuracies, bogus predictions and flat-out lies…. After five years of carefully watching George W. Bush, I've reached the conclusion he's either grossly incompetent or a hand-puppet for a gaggle of detached theorists with their own private view of how the world works. Or both."

Such reconsiderations are all to the good, and not only for the practical purpose of evacuating a sinking ship. The recantation mood is a sign of maturity.

But apologies, while worthy, are never enough. To help make right what has gone badly wrong, they also must lead to rethinking.

Because 1930s analogies are back in vogue, consider that it was incumbent upon conservatives who were dismayed by Neville Chamberlain at Munich in 1938 to inquire into the worldview that led him to appease Adolf Hitler. Likewise, as conservatives never cease to remind those on the left, it was perfectly reasonable to tell the Soviet Union's fellow travelers to examine the fantastical credulity with which they persuaded themselves to overlook the depredations of Lenin and Stalin. To learn from our greatest misconceptions is, of course, a prime reason we study history.

So what lessons should Bush's partisans take from his decline? Where did they go wrong when they were cheering Bush, excoriating his adversaries and devoutly assuring the rest of us that he was, as former presidential speechwriter David Frum put it in an unabashed double entendre, "the right man"?

They're obliged to have to figure it out on their own. But let me offer this for their consideration: The core of the Bush problem is an extremist worldview. Bush's aggressive go-it-alone attitude kicked in long before 9/11. "You're either with us or you're with the terrorists" was just an extension of Bush's rejection of the Kyoto Protocol (the international global warming agreement) and the International Criminal Court.

Under Bush, reality had to be bulldozed into submission. Whatever went wrong in Iraq or Afghanistan, questioning Bush's narrow understanding of the Islamist danger amounted to appeasement, cutting and running, pining for defeat. Whatever the economic conditions, the remedies were privatization, deregulation and tax cuts for plutocrats. On every front, foreign and domestic, liberals were to blame.

This attitude didn't stop with Bush alone, and it persists unaltered. Just recently, in this spirit, an e-mail from Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman warned that Democratic victories in the midterm elections would mean "government by the far left," "weaken[ing] America" thus: "Impeachment. Cutting and running from the war on terror. Key defense systems dismantled. Tax cuts repealed. Speaker Pelosi."

The logic of this paranoid worldview is a deep and awful thing to confront. But confronting it is a matter of intellectual honesty.

Today, it's morally mandatory, a matter of intellectual decency, that Bush's erstwhile partisans rethink both their credulity and their ideology and ask how they could for so long have overlooked what now strikes them as obvious. "Whoops, sorry about that" and "mistakes were made" — love that passive voice — won't do.

'The Pocketbook Conservative Is Up For Grabs' (WSJ)

By Dick Armey

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

The practice of politics is a peculiar form of juvenile delinquency. As this election season heats up, there is plenty of evidence to support this assertion. Juvenile delinquents in the liberal blogosphere are credited with taking out Joe Lieberman in his primary last month. Senate Republicans pander to the so-called "conservative base" with hollow political gestures like the recent failed votes to constitutionally ban gay marriage and flag burning. And inexplicably, one of the few recent legislative actions in the House of Representatives produced new restrictions on the slaughter of horses for human consumption.

Such silly political posturing will no doubt leave cows and chickens feeling left out of the legislative debate. The same is certainly true for the vast majority of the American electorate -- potential voters who face the very real economic challenges of earning a living, paying the mortgage and raising their children to be productive members of society. I call this neglected and abused constituency "pocketbook conservatives."

Suspicious of big government promises and irresponsible spending, pocketbook conservatives feel the real pain of taxes. They don't want bureaucrats to pick winners and losers in the market, and they resent the power of special interests seeking favors at the expense of everyone else. Pocketbook conservatives are concerned with their family's personal finances and about the health of the American economy as a whole. They value thrift, hard work, ownership and individual responsibility -- both in their personal lives and in their elected officials. They expect the same from their neighbors, and generally respect the work ethic and economic contributions of new immigrants.

Ronald Reagan was the first Republican of my generation to effectively reach out to pocketbook conservatives -- Republicans, Democrats and independents alike -- who instinctively believed that little good could come from Washington. He energized voters who wanted government to leave people alone to work, worship and provide for their families as they saw fit. In 1980, Reagan won the White House in part because he had a positive, serious economic agenda that reflected these values, believing that "all great change in America begins at the dinner table."

George H.W. Bush lost the pocketbook conservatives when he broke his promise and raised taxes. Higher taxes and new spending delayed the economic recovery, further ballooned the deficit and created a political window for Ross Perot.

In 1994, one of the major factors in the Republican's dramatic takeover of Congress, for the first time in 40 years, was the willingness to commit to a serious economic agenda. The Contract with America directly connected with pocketbook conservatives. It was a clear vision promoting economic liberty, personal freedom and a commitment to reducing the size of a bloated government. Republicans realigned with the Reagan legacy, and stood in stark contrast to the Clinton administration's agenda of higher taxes and government health-care schemes. In that election, a record nine million new voters turned up for Republicans.

Today, the pocketbook conservative is up for grabs once again. Since 2002, federal spending has increased by 47%, earmarking abuse is rampant, and the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit has created $18.2 trillion in new unfunded liabilities on future taxpayers. And while GDP growth has been good and unemployment remains low, there are a number of American households who have seen their real income remain flat for the past five years. These families feel the brunt of the softening housing market, higher energy prices and rising health-care costs. They feel less secure about their retirement, knowing that they can no longer depend on empty government promises.

This anxiety presents a real political opportunity, but Republicans, lacking credibility on fiscal reforms, seem more intent on pandering to the extreme fringes of their base. The national representatives of the social conservative movement used to be sophisticated and tolerant. Today, they are sophomoric and angry. It's an embarrassing spectacle seeing leaders bullied around by the likes of James Dobson, or watching the Christian Coalition team up with MoveOn.org in support of bigger government.

Even more embarrassing is Tom Tancredo and his hot, hateful rhetoric against immigrants. Such demagoguery feeds the worst instincts of nativists and blocks a serious solution to our nation's border security problems. Reagan, conversely, understood that America is a country of immigrants, and he famously demanded that big government's walls be torn down.

Perhaps the only thing more embarrassing than being a loyal Republican in this election season is being a loyal Democrat. Although the party has offered no proposal to fix Social Security, the aspiring House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and the Senate majority leader hopeful, Harry Reid, held yet another press conference recently denouncing the secret Republican plan to "privatize" the failing entitlement. While Democrat pollsters are no doubt telling their candidates that the P-word will effectively scare seniors and other swing constituencies to the polls, this strategy has consistently failed in past election cycles. This year, however, some Republicans may accommodate these efforts by failing to define their own position.

The only solution to collapsing pension and health-insurance programs consistent with individual dignity and real financial security is a system based on personal retirement accounts, but it looks unlikely that voters will hear much about real solutions to the retirement security crisis this fall. The same is true on the other important fiscal and economic issues facing the nation. All candidates for public office should be debating the need for new spending discipline to balance the federal budget, reforms to simplify the Byzantine tax code and boost economic savings and investment, and regulatory changes that would unleash new innovation. Instead, we have been treated to political theater.

There is still some time left in this Congress, and Republicans would benefit by completing unfinished legislative work. To their credit, the House Republicans, under John Boehner's leadership, have taken a good step in instituting earmark reforms. But extending tax relief, enacting the Pence/Hutchinson border security legislation based on a robust, free market guest worker program, and overhauling telecommunications rules to break up outdated cable monopolies are all substantive economic reforms that could appeal to pocketbook conservatives.

Win or lose, if Republicans hope to maintain the political support of a voting majority in the future, they will need to rediscover their fiscally conservative roots, and govern accordingly.

On Earmarks, Democrats Have Protested Loudly (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

In his Sept. 18 editorial-page commentary "Time for a Time Out?1" John H. Fund laments the proliferation of earmarks and new spending under the GOP Congress. He takes the Republicans to task for forgetting why they came to Washington and for refusing to curtail spending. He suggests that if they will not curtail spending, then perhaps they need a "time out" from power. I agree. However, I take exception with Mr. Fund's claim that "Democrats have been largely silent" on these issues. That's not true.

In May, Rep. Martin T. Meehan and I introduced the first lobbying and ethics reform legislation of the 109th Congress, the Special Interest Lobbying and Ethics Accountability Act of 2005 (H.R. 2412) to clean up the abuses that led to the Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham scandals. This legislation was endorsed by congressional scholars Norman Ornstein and Thomas Mann and editorial boards across the country. Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi also introduced a broad reform bill, yet the Republicans refused to allow a vote on either of these comprehensive solutions.

During the "earmark reform" debate last week, Reps. Van Hollen, Bean, Barrow, Doggett, Delahunt and I offered legislation that would have ended the "business as usual" process that has turned earmarking into a bonanza for members, their families and business associates. Our legislation prohibited earmarks that personally benefit members, their spouses and immediate family members; banned earmarks that benefit lobbyists who chair a member's Leadership Political Action Committees; prohibited earmarks to any entity or lobbying firm employing the spouse, family member or former staffer of the earmark sponsor; eliminated "sweetheart" tax provisions for a single individual or corporation; and ended the practice of adding new earmarks into conference reports in the dead of night. Again, the Republican leadership refused to allow a vote on this legislation.

Dean Expedites Courting Of Black Vote (AP-Y)

By Ron Vample, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 23, 2006

The Democratic Party can no longer sit back and wait until three weeks before an election to ask minorities for their vote, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said Friday.

"In many ways, the Democratic Party hasn't moved itself out of the '60s and '70s," Dean said in remarks to the DNC's African-American Leadership Summit, which is aimed at mobilizing black voters and encouraging more minority candidates for state offices.

"If we don't get smart about having folks on the ticket that look like the people whose votes were asking for, in meaningful positions of authority, then we're not going to win. And the party that gets to do that first is the party that's going to win," Dean said.

Annie Mae Holt, a 59-year-old Detroit teacher who attended the gathering, said Democrats must be careful not to allow Republicans to create a divide.

"We need to make sure that people who look like the diversity that is evolving in the United States is represented on our Democratic ticket," Holt said in an interview.

Black voters could be crucial to Michigan Gov. Jennifer Granholm's effort to overcome a stiff challenge from GOP challenger Dick DeVos. Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick recently promised to energize city voters for Granholm and avoid a repeat of the low 1990 turnout that contributed to Republican John Engler narrowly winning the governorship.

"In order for this party to win, we have to include more people," Kilpatrick said. "The numbers say that we need to move the African-American (and) Latino vote inside urban America. Unless we go get it, we won't win."

Analysis: Democrats Vow To Get Tough (AP-Y)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, September 23, 2006

Six weeks before elections, the Democratic strategy for the war on terror is one part attack President Bush and one part agree with him. The goal is to court voters dissatisfied with the job the administration has done, yet avoid being tagged as soft on Osama bin Laden.

"Democrats are united behind the need to work on a bipartisan basis to bring terrorists to justice, and to do it in a manner consistent with our laws, our values and our national security," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said a few hours after Bush and rebellious Republicans ended a week-long dispute and compromised on a plan for interrogating and trying terror suspects.

He didn't quite say so, but it seems likely the deal announced Thursday — and blessed by Sen. John McCain of Arizona as well as Bush — will draw significant Democratic support when it reaches the Senate floor.

Beyond the tribute to the importance of American values and Geneva Conventions protections for wartime prisoners, Democrats, particularly in the Senate, are applying painfully learned lessons of past campaigns.

"This is a Max Cleland moment," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., referring to the Georgia Democrat defeated for re-election in 2002. Republicans are "trying to produce a vote that provides a 30-second ad like the one that defeated Cleland," he added.

Cleland, a triple amputee Vietnam War veteran, lost four years ago after being attacked in a campaign commercial that included cameo appearances by bin Laden and Saddam Hussein. The ad accused the Georgian of voting against Bush's proposal for a Department of Homeland Security 11 times. In fact, he favored creation of the agency before the president did, and differed with the administration principally on issues relating to civil service rules for employees.

That was four years ago, when the country was still reeling from the attacks of 9-11, and Bush was winning strong support for the job he was doing as commander in chief in the war on terror.

Two years later, Democratic Sen. John Kerry ran for president and observed he had voted for $87 billion to pay for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan before voting against it. It turned out the electorate was less conflicted than that. Bush and the Republicans won again.

Now, the national mood has shifted. Much of the advantage Bush and the Republicans enjoyed on the issue of combatting terror has eroded, although the president has labored strenuously in recent weeks, with some success, to restore it.

The polls show deep public dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq, even if voters are split down the middle on what the next step should be.

Democrats, primed by poll-tested advice, are projecting strength this time, determined not to let Bush and the Republicans outflank them once again.

"Welcome the national security debate and engage in it," several top strategists advised in a recent memo. Another recommendation: "stress the seriousness of the threat and Democrats' determination to address it using statements such as: "We need stronger tools to monitor, hunt down and kill terrorists."

Third, Democrats were advised to accuse Bush of mismanaging the war in Iraq. Not coincidentally, they intend to hold a public forum on Monday and say former top-ranking military officers who served in Iraq will testify about mismanagement in the conflict.

Finally, the memo from Democracy Corps says "stress that Democrats offer a 'better way to fight terrorism.'" Example: call for the inspection of all cargo containers entering the country.

Given the central role of the war on terror in the campaign, the same clash is unfolding across the Capitol.

There, as in the Senate, Republicans hope for an opening to outmaneuver House Democrats on an issue the GOP has long called its own.

They thought they had an opening recently when Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, said of bin Laden: "He has done more damage the longer he has been out there. But, in fact, the damage that he has done is done. And even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer."

Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, the House majority leader, bluntly questioned whether Democrats are "are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Chavez: Bush Should Resign As President (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, September 23, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez launched yet another verbal assault against President Bush upon returning from a highly charged U.S. visit Friday, calling on the American leader to resign.

Chavez also suggested that New York city police were behind a electrical disruption during his speech Thursday in Harlem, but police denied the allegation.

"He should renounce the presidency if he has any dignity. The president of the United States has failed completely," Chavez said at the inauguration of a natural gas project in northwestern Venezuela.

It was Chavez's first appearance since returning from the United States, where he called Bush "the devil" at the United Nations' General Assembly and later criticized him in a speech to supporters at a church in Harlem.

Bush's political foes and fans alike condemned the remarks, U.S. newspapers criticized the Venezuelan leader, and one governor said his state is no longer interested in buying discounted heating oil from Venezuela-owned Citgo this winter.

In Boston, a city councilor said he wants to take down a landmark Citgo sign near the city's famed baseball park and replace it with an American flag.

"Given the hatred of the United States displayed by dictator Hugo Chavez, it would be more fitting to see an American flag when you drive through Kenmore Square," councilor Jerry McDermott told The Boston Herald, saying the sign — prominently visible over the left-field wall at Fenway Park — had to go.

On Friday, The New York Daily News' front page headline told Chavez to "ZIP IT!" and the New York Post called him a "jerk" and the "Caracas crackpot."

"I wanted President Chavez to please understand that even though many people in the United States are critical of our president that we resent the fact that he would come to the United States and criticize President Bush," Rep. Charles Rangel, D-NY., said Thursday.

Chavez appeared unfazed by the outcry.

"The imperialist government of the United States says we have failed but they are the ones that have failed in everything you see," he said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0068139

He accused the Bush administration of fueling terrorism, claimed that both the CIA and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration were "infiltrated" by drug traffickers, and urged people to divest their dollars because new bills were being "fabricated."

In an interview broadcast Friday Chavez kept up his attack.

"I think it was a rather humorous speech," Chavez told TV and radio host Tavis Smiley in a PBS broadcast. "People were smiling."

But then added, "(Bush) considers himself a god. And that is a terrible manipulation, since this is obeying interests that are against God. And since he considers himself like God, when you call him the devil, it is just to strike a balance."

During his comments in Venezuuela, Chavez also accused the New York city police of deliberately cutting off the power supply to disrupt his speech at Harlem's Mount Olivet Baptist Church, when a live transmission of the event by Venezuela's state TV station was interrupted for a few minutes.

"Contrary to his assertions, the New York Police Department did not in any way interfere with efforts to transmit information from New York," Deputy Commissioner Paul J. Browne said in a statement distributed by the U.S. Embassy in Venezuela.

Venezuelan Information Minister Willian Lara had initially accused the CIA of being behind the disruption, but Venezuelan Ambassador Bernardo Alvarez later said New York police officers were responsible.

Insults have increasingly flown between Caracas and Washington since 2002, when the U.S. swiftly recognized leaders who briefly ousted Chavez in a coup, before Chavez returned to power amid massive street protests.

U.S. officials regularly call the Venezuelan leader a destabilizing force, and Bush has said he sees Chavez as a threat to democracy. Chavez has called Bush a "devil" in the past.

Chavez: "Bush Has Called Me Worse Things" (TIME)

By Tim Padgett

Time, September 23, 2006

Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez caused a stir this week during his visit to New York City, denouncing President Bush as "the devil" in a speech at the U.N. General Assembly and, during a visit to Harlem the following day, calling him an "alcoholic." In an exclusive interview with TIME's Tim Padgett, Chavez defended his controversial rhetoric as a necessary part of his leftwing revolution's effort to counter what he calls Bush's "global imperialism."

"Bush has called me worse things — tyrant, populist dictator, drug trafficker, to name a few," Chavez said. "I'm not attacking Bush; I'm simply counterattacking. Bush has been attacking the world, and not just with words — with bombs. I think the bombs he's unleashed on Baghdad or Lebanon do a lot more harm than any words spoken in the United Nations."

On the growing support in Latin America for his brand of "21st-century socialism," Chavez said: "After seeing the failure of Washington-backed capitalist reforms in Latin America, I no longer think a third way between capitalism and socialism is possible. Capitalism is the way of the devil and exploitation. If you really want to look at things through the eyes of Jesus Christ — who I think was the first socialist — only socialism can really create a genuine society."

Chavez expressed confidence that the U.N. will vote to give Venezuela a non-permanent seat in the Security Council next month. "It's because of the moment we're living right now, the need to block the cannons of the U.S. empire," he said. "The U.N.'s members believe we can have the most impact on that debate. The U.S. fears Venezuela's presence on the Council because it knows we'll be an independent vote for the Third World."

Chavez also had some pointed comments on his country's role as the hemisphere's largest oil producer. "Bush wanted Iraq's oil and I believe he wants Venezuela's oil," Chavez said. "But the blame for high oil prices lies in the consumer model of the U.S. Its reckless oil consumption is a form of suicide."

Voices Of Discontent: Anti-U.S. Leaders Seek Allies (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 22 — The podium of the General Assembly has long been a platform for the world's strongmen to prove their anti-American credentials.

Fidel Castro did it in 1960, as did Idi Amin in 1975. And this week Hugo Chávez, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Omar Hassan al-Bashir — of Venezuela, Iran and Sudan, respectively — took up the mantle left by their predecessors, presenting themselves as Davids of the third world seeking to slay the American Goliath.

American officials were quick to dismiss the speeches as chest thumping, noting that all three men were from countries with vast oil reserves and other resources, well able to thumb their noses at Washington but hardly representative of the poorer countries that rely on American aid.

"I think it's important frankly for people to hear this, because I do think it's a reflection of what some of these governments think," said John Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations.

But others here wondered whether they might be witnessing the birth of a new anti-American bloc, something that may eventually succeed the Nonaligned Movement, which originated in the cold war.

The aggressive steps the Bush administration has taken on national security, as well as more general resentment against the world's strongest power, have made the United States vulnerable to charges of racism, hypocrisy and imperialism, particularly in the non-Western world, diplomats here said.

"Wherever he looks, he sees extremists," Mr. Chávez said Tuesday about President Bush to a roomful of General Assembly delegates, most of them from Africa, Latin America and Asia. "And you, my brother — he looks at your color, and he says, 'Oh, there's an extremist.' Evo Morales, the worthy president of Bolivia, looks like an extremist to him."

When Mr. Chávez says Washington sees imagined enemies in darkskinned people, he is capitalizing on international anger over issues like secret C.I.A. prisons and the Bush administration's attempts to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions.

"Things like Guantánamo make people question whether we believe our own values, and whether what the president says about protecting civil liberties is actually true," said Edward Luck, head of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University. "That gives people like Chávez an opening that they can exploit."

Sarah Stephens, director of the Center for Democracy in the Americas, says that when Mr. Bush and American officials talk about " 'the axis of evil,' saying, 'You're with us or against us,' that rubs people the wrong way, and Chávez knows how to capitalize on that."

A survey by Latinobarómetro, a Chilean opinion research firm, found that the percentage of people in Latin America with a positive image of the United States fell to 61 percent in 2005 from 68 percent in 2000.

"Although good opinions gained ground between 2000 and 2001, due to the Sept. 11 attacks and sympathy for the people of the United States, the region's general opinion worsened again in 2003 and has since remained at around 60 percent," the survey found. From 1,000 to 1,200 people took part in the poll in each of 18 countries, with a margin of sampling error of about three percentage points.

So while there was official outrage over Mr. Chávez calling Mr. Bush "the devil," there was also a lot of applause and giggling, from dignitaries including the president of the General Assembly herself, Haya Rashed al-Khalifa of Bahrain, who was caught chuckling from her seat on the dais behind Mr. Chávez.

"Most unseemly," one United Nations official said with mock seriousness, then started laughing himself.

Officially, most diplomats here were quick to frown on the Venezuelan leader's remarks. But in quieter moments officials and diplomats said they feared that he was reaching a receptive audience of poor countries that felt exploited and bullied by the United States.

The Nonaligned Movement emerged during the cold war among countries that were trying to escape the orbits of the Soviet Union and the United States. But rather than build on that, Mr. Chávez and Mr. Ahmadinejad seem to be going in another direction: to build a coalition of countries aligned against Washington.

Some of that was on display last week in Havana at a meeting of leaders and diplomats from 118 countries in the Nonaligned Movement. The Times of London joked: "America might well call it the Axis of Evil summit."

The host of the Havana meeting was Mr. Castro — who was too sick to attend the actual meetings — and among those attending were Mr. Ahmadinejad, Mr. Chávez and officials from North Korea, Belarus and Syria. Raúl Castro, who took over from his brother as acting president of the movement, criticized what he called Washington's "irrational pretensions for world dominance."

The question now, though, is whether the Castros, Chávezes and Ahmadinejads of the world will succeed in wooing more countries to their camp. United Nations officials said member countries were becoming increasingly frustrated that the five permanent members of the Security Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — call all the shots, a point that Mr. Chávez and Mr. Ahmadinejad made repeatedly.

A movement to increase the number of permanent seats on the Council seemed to have died last year amid wrangling over who supported whom, but officials say the issue may now be resurrected. "It's very interesting that after everyone declared Security Council reform over, it's one of the top issues raised by heads of state this year," a senior United Nations official said.

A secret ballot next month to fill the 10 nonpermanent seats on the Council may provide an early indicator of the influence of the anti-American bloc. Five seats are up for change every year, and Venezuela is in a battle with Guatemala for the Latin American one. Needless to say, the United States is backing Guatemala.

Venezuela has received the backing of Brazil, Paraguay, Argentina and several other countries, while Guatemala can count on the United States, Mexico and Colombia, among others. If the Latin American countries cannot reach a consensus — and they have not yet — the General Assembly will hold a secret ballot among its 192 members.

A win by Mr. Chávez, United Nations officials said, would not only mean livelier debate in the Security Council. It might also signal potential trouble for many Americansponsored issues before the Council, from putting a peacekeeping force into Darfur to efforts to reining in Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Fiery Chavez Aims For A Global Role (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia, Sept. 22 -- Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez's blistering attack on President Bush at the United Nations this week marked a striking crescendo in a campaign to project Venezuela as a country with the global reach to counter American initiatives.

Swimming in wealth from an oil bonanza, Venezuela has bestowed billions of dollars in aid and preferential deals across Latin America, burnishing ChÃ¡vez's image as heir apparent to President Fidel Castro of Cuba, his mentor and close friend.

But in recent months, ChÃ¡vez has been traveling the world -- not just seeking the economic deals his internationalist government has always wanted, but also pressing for influence in affairs far from Latin America, political analysts say. His immediate goal is to obtain enough backing to secure a two-year spot on the 15-member U.N. Security Council, a campaign the Bush administration is vigorously opposing by backing tiny Guatemala for the seat. But his long-term goal appears to be more far-reaching.

"Venezuela was too small for him; now I think Latin America is too small for him," said Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington policy group. "He wants to be a global leader who can shape the international agenda. This is sort of a shift to being involved in decision-making on very sensitive international and political affairs."

In one of the most derisive and caustic speeches in U.N. history, the Venezuelan leader on Wednesday labeled Bush "the devil" and "dear world dictator," leading to sustained applause at the General Assembly. On Thursday, speaking to the congregants of a church in Harlem, he called Bush an alcoholic and a sick man, "but very dangerous because he has lots of power."

Since July, ChÃ¡vez's feverish travel schedule has taken him to Iran, Syria, Russia, China, Vietnam, Belarus and other nations whose governments are often on less than favorable terms with the United States.

He has come away with support for his bid to gain the Security Council seat next month -- among his backers are Russia and China, who hold permanent council seats -- and solidified alliances against the Bush administration. ChÃ¡vez has railed against American efforts to neutralize Iran's nuclear efforts and the administration's support of Israel in its invasion of Lebanon.

Obtaining a Security Council seat would only further empower ChÃ¡vez. "This is why he's putting on the full-court press for the Security Council," said Riordan Roett, director of Latin American studies at Johns Hopkins University. "He sees this as a launching pad for Venezuela on the U.N. stage, which is a global stage. And there's no question that he would use the U.N. as a personal hobbyhorse to harass the White House."

Venezuelan officials cast ChÃ¡vez's diplomatic efforts as a high-minded necessity in the face of American imperialism. And they predicted that the General Assembly would approve Venezuela's entry into the Security Council.

"The president's discourse and metaphors can leave people surprised, but they also generate a lot of solidarity, too, which will be put to the test in the Security Council vote," Francisco Arias CÃ¡rdenas, the Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations, said by telephone from New York. "Saying these truths do not do damage."

Yet the Venezuelan leader's foreign policy has had mixed results.

In Latin America, he has mined widespread aversion to the Bush administration and capitalized on American blunders, such as the White House's decision to give tacit support to the opposition leaders who briefly overthrew ChÃ¡vez in 2002.

American financial backing of the opposition has also strengthened ChÃ¡vez, since he rarely misses an opportunity to portray his foes as lap dogs of the Bush administration. Foreign governments from Argentina to tiny Dominica have also benefited from Venezuelan largess.

But ChÃ¡vez's meddling in Peru's presidential election earlier this year doomed the candidacy of Ollanta Humala, a leftist whom Venezuela openly supported. AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador, the Mexican populist, saw his popularity fall ahead of July's election after his opponent, Felipe CalderÃ³n, portrayed him as the second coming of ChÃ¡vez. CalderÃ³n won a close election.

Two more presidential elections in which leftists close to ChÃ¡vez are running could also serve as a barometer of his appeal. In Ecuador, Rafael Correa, an economist, has a slight lead going into the Oct. 15 vote. And in Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega, the fierce Cold War opponent of the United States, has also led in polls as the country prepares for a Nov. 5 election.

"If he gives the impression of openly interfering or intervening in the elections in Ecuador and Nicaragua, it will backfire," said Wayne Smith, a former U.S. diplomat in Latin America who tracks ChÃ¡vez. "Maybe he will learn from his mistakes."

In Venezuela, ChÃ¡vez's railings against Bush have played well among his most fervent backers.

But pollsters in Caracas, the capital, say that while Venezuelans support the government's social programs, they do not back many of his international initiatives. More than 60 percent of Venezuelans reject the country's antagonistic relationship with the United States, according to the Datanalisis polling firm, while nearly 80 percent do not see Cuba as a model for Venezuela.

"Despite his popularity, he has some weaknesses, and Venezuelans complain that he is too aggressive verbally, and they frankly find it unpresidential," said Mark Feierstein, a former State Department official who works for Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, a Washington polling and political consulting firm that has operated in Venezuela.

ChÃ¡vez, first elected in 1998, is running for another term in December's election. He enjoys a sizable advantage over the main opposition challenger, Manuel Rosales, the governor of oil-rich Zulia state. But Rosales has chipped away at the president's lead by highlighting crime, corruption and social decay.

Opposition leaders predict that ChÃ¡vez's speech at the United Nations will only solidify support for Rosales. "This type of discourse just makes Venezuelans more and more worried about the future of our country," Antonio Ledezma, an opposition leader, said by phone from Caracas. "The president wants to be a world leader, and he sees little in Venezuela to occupy him."

Yet Luis Vicente Leon of Datanalisis said that focusing on international affairs is a tactical move designed to keep Rosales from effectively engaging ChÃ¡vez on domestic issues. "When he attacks, he attacks Bush, not Rosales," Leon said. "He ignores Rosales completely."

U.S. Best Seller, Thanks To Rave By Latin Leftist (NYT)

By Motoko Rich

All the authors currently clamoring for a seat on Oprah Winfrey's couch might do well to send copies of their books to the latest publishing tastemaker: Venezuela's president, Hugo Chávez.

The paperback edition of "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance," a detailed critique of American foreign policy that Mr. Chomsky published two years ago, hit No. 1 on Amazon's best-seller list yesterday, and the hardcover edition, published in 2003, climbed as high as No. 6. At both Borders Group and Barnes & Noble, sales of the title jumped tenfold in the last two days.

"It doesn't normally happen that you get someone of the stature of Mr. Chávez holding up a book at a speech at the U.N.," said Jay Hyde, a manager at Borders Group in Ann Arbor, Mich.

In his speech, in which Mr. Chávez excoriated President George W. Bush as the "devil," he held up a copy of "Hegemony" and urged his audience "very respectfully, to those who have not read this book, to read it."

Calling it an "excellent book to help us understand what has been happening in the world throughout the 20th century," Mr. Chávez added, "I think that the first people who should read this book are our brothers and sisters in the United States, because their threat is right in their own house."

Julia Versau, 50, a real estate writer in Valparaiso, Ind., said she saw Mr. Chávez holding up the book during a newscast on CNN. Although she had read Mr. Chomsky's work on propaganda at least a decade ago, she said, Mr. Chávez's speech reminded her to try the book.

"I saw the title and I went darn, I haven't read that one," Ms. Versau said in a telephone interview. "If he's reading that I better go check it out." She said that she had previously found Mr. Chomsky's work "a little dense," but said that "our democracy could use more people telling the truth and more people taking the time to read and get themselves educated."

Mr. Chomsky, who has retired from teaching full time at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, did not return calls or an e-mail message yesterday seeking comment. In an interview with The New York Times on Thursday, he said he would be happy to meet Mr. Chávez.

Demand for the book seemed to be spread across the country. In Florida, Mitchell Kaplan, owner of Books & Books, an independent bookseller with locations in Miami Beach, Coral Gables and Bal Harbour, said he had already ordered 50 more copies of "Hegemony," while he usually keeps only about 3 per store. In Denver, Andrea Phillips, a manager at the Colfax Avenue branch of the bookseller the Tattered Cover, said "Hegemony" had sold three times as many copies this week as it normally would in a month.

On the University of Wisconsin campus in Madison, Rainbow Books, a workers' collective that specializes in leftist topics and carries many of Mr. Chomsky's works, the last copy of "Hegemony" was sold on Thursday.

Allen Ruff, a manager at Rainbow Books, said "Hegemony" had not sold particularly well when it was first published three years ago, because many regulars were already familiar with Mr. Chomsky's other works. But Mr. Ruff said the recent news media attention has meant that "people are now discovering him for the first time," and the store has ordered a dozen more copies.

Mr. Chomsky's publisher, Metropolitan Books, a unit of Henry Holt & Company, is printing an additional 25,000 copies of "Hegemony," of which it said there are currently 250,000 in print in hardcover and paperback. A Holt spokeswoman said that print run could go higher after consultation with booksellers.

Up until now, the book, which Samantha Power, writing in The New York Times Book Review in 2004, called "a raging and often meandering assault on United States foreign policy," has been a steady seller but never hit the best-seller lists. To date it has sold about 66,000 copies in hardcover and nearly 55,000 in paperback, according to Nielsen BookScan, which tracks bookstores and other outlets that usually account for 60 to 70 percent of a title's sales.

Mr. Chomsky, 77, is hardly an obscure writer. Many people have heard of the outspoken professor, who is a darling of the left, even if they have not yet read his work. "I think Chávez speaking to it renewed interest and made people say, 'I know that author and I'm going to check it out,' " said Bob Wietrak, vice president of merchandising at Barnes & Noble.

But Alan M. Dershowitz, the lawyer and Harvard Law School professor, said he doubted whether many of the current buyers would ever actually read the book.

"I don't know anybody who's ever read a Chomsky book," said Mr. Dershowitz, who said he first met Mr. Chomsky in 1948 at a Hebrew-speaking Zionist camp in the Pocono Mountains where Mr. Dershowitz was a camper and Mr. Chomsky was a counselor.

"You buy them, you put them in your pockets, you put them out on your coffee table," said Mr. Dershowitz, a longtime critic of Mr. Chomsky. The people who are buying "Hegemony" now, he added, "I promise you they are not going to get to the end of the book."

Regardless, most authors would be happy for a plug like Mr. Chávez's. "All world leaders should be enlisted in book publicity," said David Rosenthal, publisher of Simon & Schuster.

As a matter of fact, it is a growing trend. At a press conference in the East Room of the White House yesterday, Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan, dodged a few questions by joking that Simon & Schuster, which is publishing his memoirs on Sept. 25, had barred him from commenting until his book is out. President Bush played along: "In other words, 'Buy the book' is what he's saying," Mr. Bush said.

Chomsky Book Sales Skyrocket (LAT)

By Chris Lee

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Noam Chomsky's 2003 book, "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance," shot to No. 1 on the Amazon.com bestseller list Friday, two days after Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez held it up during a vitriolic speech to the United Nations.

At the start of his talk Wednesday, Chavez recommended that anyone wishing to understand "what has been happening in the world through the 20th century" should read Chomsky's book.

"Hegemony or Survival" posits that American foreign policy over the last half-century has pursued a strategy to control the world, and that by its own definition of terrorism, the U.S. has been a terrorist state.

The book rocketed from the 20,664th place on the website's list, past preorders for the perennially popular John Grisham's "The Innocent Man," to achieve the top position. As of Friday evening, the 2004 paperback edition of "Hegemony or Survival" was No. 1 and the hardcover edition was No. 10 at Amazon. On the Barnes & Noble bestseller list, the paperback was No. 3 and the hardback No. 30.

As an aside to the General Assembly address in which Chavez pronounced the U.N. "worthless" and referred to President Bush as "the devil," the Venezuelan president mentioned his regret at never having met Chomsky before he died.

An icon of the American left, Chomsky is, in fact, alive and well and living in Lexington, Mass. "I continue to work and write," Chomsky told the New York Times on Thursday.

His wife, Carol, declined to put Chomsky on the phone when a reporter called Friday, explaining that he had been "flooded" with interview requests.

Chomsky, 77, is often called the father of modern linguistics. In his political writings, he has been a frequent and fierce critic of American establishment politics. His many books include the bestseller "9-11," a collection of interviews conducted soon after the tragedy, and this spring's "Failed States: The Abuse of Power and the Assault on Democracy."

A Scholar Is Alive, Actually, And Hungry For Debate (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

At a news conference after his spirited address to the United Nations on Wednesday, President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela expressed one regret: not having met that icon of the American left, the linguist Noam Chomsky, before his death.

Yesterday, a call to Mr. Chomsky's house found him very much alive. In fact, he was struggling through "10,000 e-mails" he had received since the remarks by Mr. Chávez, who urged Americans to read one of Mr. Chomsky's books instead of watching Superman and Batman movies, which he said "make people stupid."

At 77, Mr. Chomsky has joined the exclusive club of luminaries, like the actor Abe Vigoda and Mark Twain, who were reported dead before their time, only to contradict the reports by continuing to breathe.

"I continue to work and write," he said, speaking from his house in Lexington, Mass.

Mr. Chávez, while addressing world leaders at the United Nations, flagged "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance," which Mr. Chomsky published in 2003, as a must-read. Mr. Chomsky said he was glad that Mr. Chávez liked his book, but he would not describe himself as flattered.

"We should look at ourselves through our own eyes and not other people's eyes," he said.

Mr. Chomsky said he had taken no offense at Mr. Chávez's remarks about his being dead. In fact, Mr. Chávez's promotion of the book propelled it yesterday into Amazon's top 10 best sellers.

While retired from teaching full time, Mr. Chomsky still goes to his office at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, occasionally lecturing and also working on a new book.

At the United Nations, the remarks by Mr. Chávez on Wednesday set off a firestorm that almost overshadowed the visit by Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose country has been under intense global scrutiny for its nuclear ambitions. From the podium of the General Assembly, the Venezuelan leader said he smelled lingering sulfur, left by President Bush, who had spoken there the day before and whom he branded "the devil."

Mr. Chávez continued mocking Mr. Bush yesterday in Harlem, where he announced the expansion of a program to send cheap Venezuelan oil to poor families in New York. He told a group gathered on the street that the president was an "ex-alcoholic" who had "a lot of hang-ups" and tried to walk "like John Wayne."

Mr. Chomsky said that he would not choose to use the same harsh oratory, but added that the Venezuelan leader was simply expressing the views of many in the world. And he said Mr. Chávez's anger was understandable.

"The Bush administration backed a coup to overthrow his government," he said. "Suppose Venezuela supported a military coup that overthrew the government of the United States? Would we think it was a joke?"

Proving that he was still up for a lively debate, Mr. Chomsky then went on to talk about income inequality in Latin America, the history of the United Nations, Iraq, Iran, Fidel Castro and, finally, the man who so fervently admires him, Mr. Chávez.

"I have been quite interested in his policies," Mr. Chomsky said. "Personally, I think many of them are quite constructive." Most important, he said, Mr. Chávez seems to have the overwhelming support of the people in his country. "He has gone through six closely supervised elections," he said.

So would Mr. Chomsky oblige Mr. Chávez's wish for a meeting, helping ensure that the South American leader will not have that regret to live with anymore?

"I would be happy to meet him," Mr. Chomsky said.

But that encounter may have to wait: Mr. Chávez was to return to Venezuela as soon as today.

The World Is As Hot As The Devil (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

This is what I was thinking as I walked this week along the siren-filled streets of New York: The temperature of the world is very high.

DOJ_NMG_0068145

We have a global warming problem, and maybe it's due to an increase in the output of heated words. And they too can, in the end, melt icecaps.

"The Pope must die." "The Holocaust is a lie." "I can still smell the sulfur."

The last of course from the democratically elected president of the republic of Venezuela, population 26 million, which helps keep America going economically by selling it, at significant profit, oil.

His remarks were startling. No one wants to dignify them with a response. But that's a mistake. Because the world heard them.

U.N. speeches are, by history and tradition, boring. You daydream to them. This is not all accident, not only the result of the fact that a nation's diplomats don't usually come from the more scintillating parts of its elites. (They rose to the U.N. in the first place because they didn't fatally offend anyone back home.) Their speeches are dull because they know divisions can be dodged or blunted by a heartening vagueness. And so their words are blankets, not bullets; meant to envelop, not pierce.

But here was Hugo Chávez Wednesday to the General Assembly:

The "pretensions" of "the American empire" threaten "the survival" of mankind. The world must "halt this threat." The American president talks "as if he owned the world" and leads a "world dictatorship" that must not be allowed to "be consolidated." Bush will spend "the rest of [his] days as a nightmare." The U.S. government is "imperialist, fascist, assassin, genocidal," a "hypocritical" empire that only pretends to mourn the deaths of innocents. But not only the Mideast will rise. "People of the South," "oppressed" by America, must "strengthen ourselves, our will to do battle."

That's not vague. It's a call to arms.

The administration quickly moved to dismiss it: More bilge from the buffoon, more opera bouffe. We won't comment or dignify.

The right doesn't want to take him seriously (we don't need more problems), and the left doesn't want to see him clearly (we gave birth to that?). But Chávez's speech achieved a great deal, and it is foolish to pretend otherwise.

He raised his own standing. He got the world to look at him. He emerged in the speech as heir to the dying Fidel Castro, who he was careful to note is still alive and kicking. Chávez doesn't want to be the current Fidel, the old man in soft fatigues, but the Fidel of 1960, who when he went to the U.N. pointedly camped in a hotel in Harlem, and electrified the masses. Chávez even followed his speech with the announcement he was giving heating oil to the needy of the Bronx. You know what they said in the Bronx? Thanks! It went over big on local TV.

He broke through the clutter. Everyone this weekend will be discussing what he said -- exactly what he said, and how he said it.

He shook things up. His speech was, essentially if implicitly, a call to resistance, by any means, to the government of the United States.

He broadened his claimed base. Chávez made the argument that it is not America versus Saddam or America versus terrorists but the American Empire versus all the yearning people of the world. He claimed as his constituency everyone unhappy with the unipolar world.

He acknowledged a particular reality by putting distance between the current administration and the American people. This is not so much new as shrewd, and telling. It is an unacknowledged fact known to every diplomat in the world that the people of the world like Americans. Old Europe and new, Africa, people on the ground all over, have some acquaintance with the particular American character of openness and generosity. We turn our faith, and guilt at good fortune, into do-gooding. We send money, bring bandages and overtip. The world has met us. (This by the way is our biggest foreign-policy strength.) Those who attack America are forced to speak highly of Americans, and Chávez did, which allows him to reach potential new allies here. People don't mind being told they are very fine but their government is very wicked. He gave new cover to critics of America. Jacques Chirac to Condoleezza Rice the next time he throws a snare: "You think I'm bad? Chávez would kill you!"

America has seen this before, seen Khrushchev bang his shoe on the table and say "We will bury you." We grew up watching our flag being burned on TV. So it's tempting to think this is part of a meaningless continuum.

But the temperature of the world is very high, and maybe we're not stuck in a continuum but barreling down a dark corridor. The problem with heated words now is that it's not the old world anymore. In the old world, incompetent governments dragged cannons through the mud to set up a ragged front. Now every nut and nation wants, has or is trying to develop nukes.

Harsh words inspire the unstable.

Coolants are needed. Here is an idea. Don't try to ignore Chávez, answer him. With the humility that comes with deep confidence, with facts, and with some humor, too.

There is an opportunity for the Democratic Party. Some Democrats responded with spirited indignation the day after Chávez spoke, and it was rousing. But Chávez's charges were grave, and he claimed America's abuses could be tracked back a century. If the Democrats seek to speak for America, why not start with a serious and textured response, one that isn't a political blast-back but a high-minded putting forward of facts? This would take guts, and farsightedness. Rebutting a wild-eyed man who says you can find redemption reading Noam Chomsky is a little too much like rebutting a part of your base.

As for the administration, it is so in the habit of asserting, defending and repeating, it barely remembers how to persuade and appeal. It speaks starkly and carries a big stick. It feels so beleaguered on a daily basis, and so snakebit, that even its mildest players have taken refuge in gritting their teeth and tunneling on. They take comfort in this: They think Chávez helps them. See what we're up against? But that's not a response, it's a way not to respond. It doesn't help, because it doesn't even try to cool things down. Which is no good, because the temperature of the world is very high.

Sanction Talks Underway If Iran Balks (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 23, 2006

Key nations trying to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions are hoping Tehran will agree quickly to suspend uranium enrichment and return to negotiations, but they are planning for sanctions if it does not, diplomats said Friday.

Russia, the United States, Britain, France, Germany and China are pressing for a meeting next week of top negotiators from both sides and hoping for an answer from Iran. Senior diplomats from the six nations met Friday to discuss what sanctions should be imposed on Tehran if it refuses to suspend its enrichment program, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said.

Oil-rich Iran says it needs uranium enrichment to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that would generate electricity and insists its program is peaceful. Enrichment can also create material for atomic bombs, however, and the United States and other nations suspect that is Tehran's real goal.

The U.N. Security Council set an Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to suspend enrichment or face mild initial sanctions. It urged the Iranian government to respond positively to a package of incentives put forward in June by the six parties. Iran responded in a lengthy document that raised many questions.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters in New York that she was confident that "everybody is committed" to the provisions of the resolution.

"If Iran is not willing to suspend ... its enrichment and reprocessing activities and enter negotiations, then we will have Security Council action under Article 41 Chapter 7," she said, referring to the article for sanctions. "I am absolutely certain of that and we will do so. We want to give diplomacy its best chance but I can assure you the time is not endless."

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said the six parties let the deadline slip after the European Union's foreign policy chief Javier Solana described his initial meeting with Iran's top negotiator Ali Larijani as "constructive."

The parties had expected Solana and Larijani to meet this week on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly's ministerial meeting, but the Iranian negotiator never made it to New York. Douste-Blazy said no specific date was set for a Solana-Larijani meeting, but "we do hope for next week, and I hope the beginning of next week."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Solana "is looking to find out where Larijani is, and then see if they can agree on a mutually convenient great city of Europe where they can meet."

Douste-Blazy opened his meeting with reporters, noting that Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said for the first time at a press conference Thursday that Iran is prepared to negotiate the suspension of its enrichment activities — if there are fair conditions.

Ahmadinejad told reporters "our position on suspension is very clear."

"In the package given to the Europeans, we've discussed that. We have said that under fair conditions and just conditions, we will negotiate about it — under fair and just conditions, I repeat," the Iranian president said.

French President Jacques Chirac has proposed that at the start of negotiations, Iran could suspend uranium enrichment and the Security Council could suspend its push for sanctions.

"I believe that it is important to see rather fast whether the Iranians do wish or not to suspend enrichment," Douste-Blazy said.

If the Iranians are not open to the package of incentives, he said, then the Security Council should move ahead with sanctions.

Burns said he did not expect the foreign ministry political directors to make a decision Friday on what sanctions should be included in the first round, should that be necessary.

"We're very much hoping Iran will do the right thing," he said. "Rather than rely on words, we're going to look at deeds. That would be full suspension."

At Home, Tehran Deals With A Restive Arab Minority (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

TEHRAN — "Help my young child — please help me," cried Yabrra Banitamim, 65, in a conference room in the north of this city crowded with a dozen relatives of two men found guilty of participating in a string of deadly bombings in Iran.

The men, Malek Banitamim, 30, and Ghasem Sallamat, 42, are from Khuzestan Province, in the country's southwest. They are Arabs in a country that is predominantly Persian and that is accused by segments of its Arab population of treating them like second-class citizens, thereby creating a separatist backlash.

Iran wants to be a leader in the Islamic world, spreading its reach and influence among Arabs and Indonesians, Sunnis and Shiites. And with its support for Hezbollah in Lebanon and its defiance of the West, it has made some progress.

But at home, Iran has often had to labor to unify its own people under one national identity, restricting the expression of ethnic variations — like languages — that it views as undermining that unity. The problem is often most apparent with its Arabs.

"There is a contradiction in Iran's behavior toward Arab countries and toward the Arabs in the south of Iran," said Mustafa el-Labbad, an expert in Iranian affairs who is based in Cairo.

Iran is a multiethnic nation. More than half of its 70 million people are Persian, and about 3 percent are Arabs. Other groups include the Azeris, Kurds, Turkmen, Baluchis and Lurs. Iran has recently faced strong protests from some ethnic groups, like the Azeris, with several demanding greater autonomy and cultural freedom.

In the Arab region, the authorities say, separatist groups became violent last year, setting off a string of terrorist bombs that killed or wounded many people. Mr. Banitamim and Mr. Sallamat were convicted and ordered hanged for their involvement in those attacks.

But to relatives of these men it is impossible to talk only about the crimes they were charged with. Their families see the acts of terrorism as intimately linked with the frustration and lack of hope that stems from the poverty that they say is forced on them by a majority that discriminates. This is a reality that the Iranian authorities have tried, but not succeeded, in reconciling.

"The Islamic Republic is dealing with its own terrorism problem the same way the U.S. is dealing with Al Qaeda," said Emad Baghi, a former cleric who now heads the Tehran-based Organization for the Defense of Prisoners' Rights.

What he meant, he said, was that both governments were using force rather than understanding.

Mr. Banitamim and Mr. Sallamat were arrested on March 11, along with 15 other men and two women. Six of that group remain under investigation, while the rest have been convicted and sentenced to death, the relatives said.

Fearful and frustrated, more than 150 family members and friends of the convicted came to Tehran to urge the authorities to lift the death sentences. Their first stop was to visit Mr. Baghi.

"The prisoners are sentenced to death because of their confessions," said Mr. Banitamim's older brother Yaghoub, as he opened the conversation with Mr. Baghi. "Their confessions were made under torture. They didn't do anything."

Mr. Baghi, who spends his days listening to the sorrows of prisoners' families, gently asked if, indeed, the men were part of the organization that had been connected to bombings in Ahvaz, the capital of Khuzestan. "We don't know," the brother said, his gaze cast down.

Then, perhaps aware that Mr. Baghi already knew the answer, that the men were members of the group, he said: "They can sentence him to life in prison. We just want to stop the execution."

Iranian officials insist that there is no discrimination against Arabs or, for that matter, any of Iran's ethnic minorities. They note, for example, that classical Arabic is taught in schools. They point out that the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, is of Azeri descent.

And they accuse Western governments of financing and helping to incite groups responsible for the violence in Ahvaz. That charge may sound self-serving, but a European diplomat in Tehran said intelligence reports from the diplomat's home capital confirmed that there was Western support for at least one of the separatist groups.

But that has not diminished what many Iranians say is the broader need to address the social, political and cultural concerns of many ethnic groups, including Arabs. "I believe," Mr. Baghi said, "that instead of labeling people terrorists, we should also try to understand the reason why."

Khuzestan is a place that illustrates the contradictions that can breed anger. The region sits atop most of the country's oil wealth, yet its Arab residents are mostly poor. At the same time, many Arabs complain that they see their country's wealth helping to rebuild Lebanon.

The London-based pan-Arab newspaper Al Sharq al Awsat recently reported that in Khuzestan, "residents launched slogans condemning Hezbollah and the government and asked for the rebuilding of their own destroyed homes instead of interference in the internal affairs of Lebanon."

Similar grievances could be heard from the relatives of the condemned men. "We suffered a lot because of the war with Iraq," said Mr. Sallamat's wife, Samira, referring to Khuzestan's proximity to the border with Iraq. "This is not fair. We have done nothing wrong. God knows we've done nothing wrong."

Mr. Baghi could do no more than advise her on a strategy. But he represented an authority figure, a bridge from the deprivation of Ahvaz to the power of Tehran. Her anger exploded. “Our problems are not only economic, they are cultural,” she complained. “They even find fault with the way we dress.” The “they” she was referring to were her Persian neighbors.

The complaints, the crying, the charges of discrimination went on around the room. A child’s eyes filled with tears every time someone mentioned that his father was to be hanged, or that his relatives could not find work because, the charge went, they were Arab.

When the relatives left, Mr. Baghi cautioned against sympathy. He said that the terrorists had taken a video of the explosions and that it had fallen into the hands of the authorities.

But it is also often much easier to make friends with strangers than to settle differences with people living under the same roof. Mr. Labbad of Egypt said that was exactly the case with Iran. When Iran addresses Arabs outside its borders, he said, it can focus on common enemies in the United States and Israel. It has no obligation beyond giving voice to feelings that already exist.

But when it comes to its own Arab population, its first responsibility is to provide life’s essentials — food, work and shelter. And that is what the families of the two condemned men tried to say, why the grievance over the sentence had become a catalyst for venting their frustrations.

“I have nine brothers and sisters, and out of all of us one brother — the brother who was arrested — was working,” said Yaghoub Banitamim. “What is the reason? Only because we are Arabs.”

Israeli Calls Ahmadinejad Invite Wrong (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 23, 2006

Israeli Ambassador Daniel Ayalon criticized the Council on Foreign Relations on Friday for providing a forum for Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and what he called abhorrent views.

In a letter to Richard Haass, a former high-ranked State Department official who now heads the think tank, Ayalon called the decision to host the Iranian leader a "terrible mistake," even though Ayalon said he was sure neither Haass nor any member of the council endorsed Ahmadinejad's views.

"Rather than make clear that his abhorrent views are unworthy of so much as a hearing, the very fact that an organization like the council convened to listen to his ranting provided Ahmadinejad legitimacy," the ambassador wrote.

In New York mostly to address the special session of the U.N. General Assembly, the Iranian leader met with 19 council members Wednesday. He also gave several media interviews.

Haass said afterward, "I am not sure we learned anything new." But Haass said in a statement that the Iranian leader may have learned about American attitudes from those with whom he sparred.

The chairman of the conference, Peter G. Peterson, said Wednesday he had told Ahmadinejad that a majority of Americans were "horrified" by his assertions.

In the past, these have included calling the Holocaust, in which 6 million Jews perished, a myth and calling for Israel to be wiped off the map.

Ayalon said meeting with Ahmadinejad was worse than if the council had met with Hitler, the leader of Nazi Germany. Hitler did not call openly for genocide in the 1930s, the ambassador said.

"Appeasing fanatics like Hitler and granting them legitimacy leads to genocide and war," Ayalon wrote.

A copy of the letter was obtained by The Associated Press.

Coffee With The Enemy (LAT)

By Richard N. Haass, Richard N. Haass, Former State Department Director Of Policy Planning, Is President Of The Council O

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Council on Foreign Relations chief explains why his organization hosted a discussion with Iran's president.

THE COUNCIL on Foreign Relations has hosted literally tens of thousands of meetings in its 85-year history, but few have generated as much interest or controversy as the session held Wednesday night in New York with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Critics said the meeting was immoral because it bestowed a degree of legitimacy on a man who does not deserve any, given his refusal to accept the reality of the Holocaust and his rejection of Israel. Others predicted that any time spent with Ahmadinejad would be a waste; that the statements of those there would have no effect on him and that we would learn nothing in return.

Nevertheless, we decided to go ahead with the meeting. This reflects the mission and nonpartisan tradition of the council. Exchange does not constitute endorsement. We have a long history of meeting with controversial leaders, including Fidel Castro, with whom many of our more than 4,000 members — and many Americans — disagree.

The reason is simple: Face-to-face meetings are often valuable. In my experience as a government official, I learned that leaders too often become isolated. Meeting with them ensures that they and those around them get to hear what you have to say, unfiltered. Equally important, meeting with someone provides you with a better understanding of their substance and style. Rarely do you leave an encounter exactly as you came in.

I believe the decision to host the meeting this week was justified by what, in fact, happened. For nearly two hours, about two dozen members of the council challenged Ahmadinejad on his denial of the Holocaust, his refusal to recognize Israel, human rights abuses inside Iran, Iran's nuclear ambitions and its activities in Iraq.

Ahmadinejad, for his part, gave as good as he got, challenging Americans on everything from our own nuclear program to U.S. policy in Iraq to American democracy.

Did we learn anything? I heard three things of considerable interest. Ahmadinejad said that Iran was open to cooperating to stabilize Iraq; that Iran believed it had a right to enrich uranium but that, for religious reasons, it was prohibited from having nuclear weapons; and that Iran is open to relations with the United States if Washington is prepared to take the initiative.

The last statement in particular is worth considering. It is one thing for a private, independent group of individuals not associated with the U.S. government to meet with Iran's president; it is something else for U.S. officials to meet with various representatives of Iran's government.

In my view, they should. There is little evidence that the alternative policies have worked or show any promise of working. The Iranian regime is entrenched despite years of American hopes for change. Using military force might not succeed in destroying Iran's nuclear installations, but it would lead Iran to reconstruct them in a more difficult-to-attack fashion, trigger terrorism and likely lead to far higher prices for oil and a global economic crisis.

Direct dialogue is also worth exploring because of Ahmadinejad himself. Effective leaders have both the will and the ability to make deals. Ahmadinejad, more than any of his predecessors, has the ability. The question here is one of political desire. The best way to gauge this is through dialogue.

For one thing, it may work. The two countries may be able to agree on a formula that places a mutually acceptable ceiling on Iran's nuclear activities and on ways to stabilize both Afghanistan and Iraq.

But dialogue also makes sense even if it fails. It is important to be able to demonstrate to American citizens and the world alike that the United States made a good-faith effort to resolve differences diplomatically before turning to sanctions or other policies.

It is time to see dialogue and diplomacy as what they are: not as a favor to bestow but as a favor to ourselves. Diplomacy is not a moral judgment but a tool with the potential to advance U.S. interests. We should have the confidence to employ it; if we do, we are more likely to isolate others than ourselves, which too often is now the case.

Iranian Rhetoric Aside, It May Be Time To Talk (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

NEW YORK At some point these past few years, diplomacy went out of fashion. I'm not sure precisely when, but all the signs are that it's time for a rethink. The world needs a bout of bridge-building.

A little incident this week illustrated the current confrontational climate. Richard Haass, who ran policy planning at the State Department during President George W. Bush's first term, got himself into a tight spot by inviting President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran to the Council on Foreign Relations.

Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, disapproved. An outrage, said Jewish groups that boycotted the meeting. Glib the-next-Hitler rhetoric did the rounds. Ahmadinejad rambled on for almost two hours, giving vent to some odious blather and leaving open the fundamental question: is he all talk or is his menace for real?

Haass, the president of the council, is unrepentant. "I don't see diplomacy or talking as a favor or an endorsement or a gift," he said. "To me, it's a tool, and I'm confident that if used right, it can advance our interests."

He continued: "The United States gets itself in trouble when it limits its options and approaches diplomacy as a value judgment. It's not obvious to me, looking at the last 50 or 60 years, that we paid a price for talking to the Soviets. At the end of all the talking, we won the Cold War."

At a time when the Bush administration uses every opportunity to cast the current war against Islamic fanaticism as comparable in scope and possible duration with the fight against communism, that's an important point. If we are really in a Cold War rerun of some sort - a disputed idea - let's at least deploy some of the lessons we learned.

The first is that non-communication is dangerous. The long-term upshot of the Cuban missile crisis of 1962, which almost brought nuclear Armageddon, was the notion that engagement can be useful.

In their various ways, cycles of U.S.- Soviet arms control talks, the Helsinki Accords of 1975 and the concept of peaceful coexistence enshrined in the policies of détente all brought the world back from the brink.

Sure, Helsinki comforted a totalitarian regime by declaring the inviolability of borders, but it also provided an avenue for the Western monitoring of human and civil rights issues, and so chipped away at the communist empire. Sometimes little things produce big results over time.

The second lesson is that the enemy may be large but that doesn't mean it's monolithic. Richard Nixon understood in 1972 that the United States could divide its enemy by reaching out to part of it, and so he headed for China.

Just like communism, Islamic fascism, to use the Bush administration's current favored term for a motley band of anti-Western jihadists, is by no means one bloc or movement. It's several.

"Until we accept that we're not facing one enemy, we'll just be banging our head against the problem," Philip Gordon of the Brookings Institution said. "Bush likes moral clarity, and of course it's easier to talk of good guys and bad guys. But sometimes you have to deal with the bad guys to get at the worse guys, and Bush doesn't want to admit that, or the fact that some of his enemies are killing each other."

They certainly are. Insurgent Sunnis and radical Shiites are heavily into the mutual slaughter business in Iraq. Along the same Sunni-Shiite divide, Al Qaeda eyes Hezbollah with suspicion. All the shared slogans - eternal Palestine, ephemeral Israel, evil America - elide but do not erase these fault lines.

It is the role of diplomacy to probe at fault lines in order to weaken the enemy and, over time, incline it to compromise. The braggadocio of with-us-or-against-us rhetoric has a ring to it and may win elections, but it ends up creating a mass of people who make the choice: They're against us. That's costly and potentially dangerous. The world's drift since 2001 is anything but comforting.

Neoconservatives have a foreign policy hero: Ronald Reagan. He's the man who won the Cold War by standing up to the enemy. He called a spade a spade: the communist empire was "evil." He deployed Pershing II medium-range missiles in Europe, starting in 1983, to focus the Soviet mind. And he embarked on a far-fetched program to shoot down Soviet missiles in space.

But Reagan also went to Reykjavik and embraced Mikhail Gorbachev and accepted the so-called "double- zero option" that involved removing those Pershing missiles. In short, he engaged. He talked.

Perhaps the Bush administration, chastened by Iraq, feels it is following a similar arc. A softening of Bush's tone was discernible at the United Nations this week. Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns said talks with Iran had gone into "extra innings." He added, "We are seeking a diplomatic solution."

For that, the West may have to drop its insistence that Iran end all nuclear enrichment activities before negotiations begin. "I would simply suggest that we not worry so much about preconditions," Haass said. "Who cares about the entry costs? It's the exit results that matter."

Burns knows about effective carrot- and-stick diplomacy. He was a central member of the team led by Richard Holbrooke that a decade ago cudgeled the warring parties in Bosnia into a compromise that has held. That exercise involved sitting down with mass murderers. Up to now, Ahmadinejad has only talked the talk.

Let's think about this. Any chance of controlling the mayhem in Iraq without Iranian cooperation? Nope. Any chance of a peace between Israel and Palestine without Iran putting a brake on its surrogates? Nope. Any more promising potential partner on the other side of the widening abyss between the West and radical Islam? Nope.

In the Bush-led quest to transform the Middle East, a stick has been applied in Iraq. Its corollary almost certainly has to be a carrot deployed in Iran. It's time to swallow hard and start talking.

U.S. Sees Diminishing North Korea Threat (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 23, 2006

North Korea's military has grown markedly less capable of a successful attack on South Korea, in part because the U.S. has been choking the North financially, says the top U.S. commander in the Pacific.

The military mismatch between an economically powerful South Korea and a declining North Korea is widening year by year, Adm. William Fallon, commander of U.S. Pacific Command, told a group of defense writers Friday.

"I'm not going to discount this threat," he said of the North Korean military. "But their ability to sustain major combat for a lengthy period of time I believe is much less than it was in the past, particularly given the growth in South Korean capabilities."

DOJ_NMG_0068151

His comments echoed in some ways an assessment of the military situation on the Korean peninsula offered by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld said Aug. 27 that South Korea no longer needs to regard the North as an immediate military threat. While the North is a threat to spread ballistic missiles and other dangerous technologies, its conventional military strength is eroding as its economy crumbles, he said.

Fallon cited two reasons behind the North's decline as a conventional military threat. First, its economy is starved.

"As I look at their people, just the physical appearance of them, they appear year by year to be physically diminished," he said. "There's also a major financial problem. We've been choking them financially from the outside. So their ability to get resources has been diminished. The trend lines are pretty obviously going in different directions" in the North and South.

Much of the public focus on North Korea in recent years has been its nuclear weapons program. Fallon did not discount the importance of the nuclear problem, but said it is unclear whether the North actually has nuclear weapons that it could place atop a missile capable of reaching American territory.

Fallon said he saw no reason to believe the North would invade the South. The fear of an invasion has been the main reason the United States has kept thousands of troops in the South since the Korean War ended in July 1953.

As the South has grown stronger, its reliance on U.S. forces has lessened in some respects.

"It's very clear — and we've known this — that the (Koreans) want to put on the table" the issue of when they would regain full command of their own troops during wartime, Fallon said.

Under the current arrangement, the South Koreans have full control during peacetime but in time of war they would place their forces under Combined Forces Command, a headquarters controlled by the top U.S. commander in Seoul, Army Gen. B.B. Bell.

Prior to 1994, the U.S. commander also had authority over South Korean forces even in peacetime. The arrangement has evolved from the Korean War, which began when North Korea invaded the South in June 1950.

The Bush administration wants the command change to occur as early as 2009, but the Seoul government favors a later date. The issue was discussed Thursday when President Bush met with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun, who has said regaining full Korean control is a matter of national sovereignty.

There are now about 29,500 U.S. troops in South Korea. That is set to decline to 25,000 by 2008.

Whether the transfer of wartime control to the South Koreans leads to a further reduction of U.S. forces "is something you deal with after the fact," Fallon said.

North Korea's Strike Range Cast In Doubt (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The U.S.'s top Pacific commander says Pyongyang's missiles can't reach the States.

WASHINGTON — The admiral in charge of American forces in Asia said Friday that he believes North Korea has no missile capable of reaching long distances and is unlikely to have one "for a while."

Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, the military's top officer in the Pacific, said that although the U.S. has limited intelligence on North Korea's missile program and even less on the secretive government's intentions, the failure of Pyongyang's test of a long-range missile in July was a sign that such technologies remain out of the regime's grasp.

"The fact that it failed, and the fact that apparently the last time they did this, which was eight years ago, it was also a failure, indicates some problems," Fallon told a group of military writers. "Before we could credibly give them a capability, or assign a capability, they'd have to demonstrate an ability to actually get a missile off the pad and have it fly at long range."

Fallon's position varies in some respects from that of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has continued to warn of the threat of North Korea's Taepodong 2 long-range missile even after the recent test firing in which the rocket blew up less than a minute after liftoff.

"The Taepodong 2 is estimated to have the range that conceivably could reach the United States," Rumsfeld said shortly after the launch. "And the fact that it failed is a fact, but it does not change the nature of the launch."

North Korea's ability to launch long-range missiles has become highly politicized, with Bush administration critics saying Rumsfeld has overstated the threat to gain funding for the Pentagon's multibillion-dollar missile defense system.

Fallon said the July launch may have been meant primarily as a provocation rather than a genuine test of capabilities. He added that the U.S. military was taken by surprise by the multiple firings of several different missiles during the Taepodong 2 test. A total of seven missiles were fired over the course of several hours on July 4.

The Pacific commander also cast doubt on North Korea's ability to launch a successful invasion of the South, saying Pyongyang's ground forces have gradually degraded in recent years, thanks in part to international economic sanctions.

Since taking over Pacific Command 18 months ago, Fallon has traveled to China three times and has emerged as a leading proponent of more active engagement with Beijing, particularly between the two militaries.

Pentagon planning documents issued in February describe China as the country with the greatest potential to become America's military adversary in the future, but Fallon said the U.S. should be working to increase the number of visits and exchanges with the Chinese military. He acknowledged, however, that his view was not shared by others in the U.S. government.

Though he did not mention specific policymakers, Fallon said "institutions of our government" still tended to treat China as they once treated the Soviet Union, an approach he disagreed with. "It isn't a clone of the Soviet Union," Fallon said. "If you are basing most of your relationship on assumptions, you have a high probability of being incorrect, just on the law of averages."

This week, two Chinese naval ships docked in San Diego, a port visit that was followed by one of the first joint military exercises between the two countries in years. Fallon said China would reciprocate with a more complex joint exercise off its coast this year.

US Threatens To Send Fighter Jets Out Of South Korea (AFP)

AFP, September 23, 2006

The United States has threatened to move its jet fighters out of the Korean peninsula unless Seoul offers a new, exclusive firing range for US airmen within a month, reports said.

The warning from Lieutenant General Garry Trexler, deputy head of US troops here, was construed as an ultimatum to South Korea ahead of high-level security talks in Washington next month.

South Korean newspapers quoted Trexler as saying in a forum Friday that US pilots in South Korea have gone abroad to conduct firing exercises since their firing range closed in August last year.

"I think we are very close in coming to closure on this issue but if it's not done within the next 30 days, we'll be forced to send aircraft which are critical to the deterrence of this peninsula off this peninsula," he was quoted as saying.

South Korea promised to build an electronic weapons scoring system for US bombing exercises on Jikdo, 70 kilometers (42 miles) off the southwestern port of Kunsan, but construction has been delayed due to protests over the move.

Under a mutual defense pact, South Korea has provided training facilities for some 29,500 US soldiers stationed here to help South Korean troops face up to North Korea's 1.2 million-strong army.

"If a nation has a military, that nation has a sacred obligation to ensure that they provide adequate training areas for that military training. That is true for the Republic of Korea military," the US air force commander said.

South Korea is in talks with the United States to regain wartime operational control over South Korean troops by 2012, a major change in their alliance which dates back to the 1950-1953 Korean War.

South Korea would currently put its troops under the US-led Combined Forces Command if war broke out on the peninsula.

The issue has split society between supporters of Roh, who say the transfer is a matter of national pride, and conservative opponents who fear it will weaken defences against North Korea, a self-proclaimed nuclear-armed state.

Rice, Others Press Sudan To Open Darfur To U.N. Force (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 22 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday renewed her call for Sudan to halt a military offensive in Darfur and yield to international pressure to allow more than 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers to protect civilians there.

Rice spoke at a gathering of representatives from 25 governments that she and her Danish counterpart, Per Stig Moller, convened to maintain international pressure on Sudan. Khartoum has defied repeated U.S. and U.N. appeals over the past nine months to allow U.N. peacekeepers into the Darfur region to help halt an outbreak of violence that has left hundreds of thousands of civilians dead.

"It is now time for the Sudanese government to accept the will of the United Nations," Rice told participants at the meeting, which was held at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel. "Time is running out. The violence in Darfur is not subsiding. It is getting worse."

The remarks came as senior U.N. officials and diplomats expressed increasing skepticism about the prospects of obtaining Sudan's approval for a U.N. peacekeeping force. U.N. officials turned their attention to providing reinforcements to a small African peacekeeping force of 7,000 troops that has been unable to stop the killing. The African Union has authorized the force -- whose mandate had been set to expire this month -- to remain in Darfur at least through the end of the year.

The United Nations will send nearly 200 civilian, police and military advisers, primarily recruited from Africa, to help the African peacekeepers monitor atrocities in a region as large as France. It will also supply the force with logistics, communications and other equipment, including 36 Global Positioning System devices, 360 night-vision goggles and 37 armored vehicles.

"We continue to try very hard to convince the Sudanese government to accept an eventual transfer to a U.N. peacekeeping force," said Stephane Dujarric, the chief U.N. spokesman. "At the same time, our practical focus is on beefing up the capacity and strength of the African Union mission."

At Friday's meeting, Rice and Moller pressed governments to ramp up their support for the African Union mission and urged countries with influence on Sudan to press it to accept U.N. peacekeepers, a European diplomat said. The group is planning a ministerial-level meeting within a month to gauge progress, the diplomat said.

U.N. officials said privately that there is little hope that Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir will invite the United Nations into Darfur without greater pressure from African and Arab leaders. "We don't have the muscle to make him move, and I doubt if the Americans do," said one senior U.N. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "The message has to come from the Arab League and the African Union."

Jan Egeland, the United Nations' chief emergency relief official, said he is appealing to Asian, African and Muslim leaders to persuade Sudan to accept a U.N. force. "I'm telling non-Western powers to help us or else see that we collectively fail," Egeland said. "They have to fight for us."

Egeland said the African force, though vital, is not strong enough to protect civilians and ensure the safe distribution of relief.

Fighting in Darfur began in February 2003, when two rebel groups took up arms against the Islamic government, claiming mistreatment of the region's primarily black tribes. The Sudanese government, backed by Arab militia, launched a bloody counterinsurgency campaign that the Bush administration has called genocide.

As many as 450,000 people have died since 2003 from violence and disease in Darfur, and more than 2 million have been forced to flee their homes.

This week, U.N. officials warned that a new Sudanese military campaign is fueling the worst outbreak of violence since the conflict began. U.N. human rights monitors reported on Friday that Sudanese planes were indiscriminately bombing villages.

President Bush reiterated his call for Sudan to allow the United Nations into Darfur in a speech on Tuesday, and he appointed a special envoy to press for peace. But Sudan has dismissed Bush's pleas.

"You do need a go-ahead from the Sudan government. How can you do otherwise?" French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said in an interview on Thursday.

Rice: Violence Getting Worse In Darfur (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 23, 2006

Violence is getting worse in Darfur despite international peace efforts, and Sudan's central government can no longer resist the world's will to send in peace forces, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday.

"Time is running out," the top U.S. diplomat told participants in an emergency international meeting on the three-year-old conflict in the African nation.

Rice called the meeting of about two dozen nations and international organizations on the sidelines of the United Nations opening session to push for a stronger international peace force despite objections from Sudan's government.

The U.N. Security Council passed a resolution last month that would expand the mission from 7,000 to more than 20,000 troops and give it new authority to protect civilians.

But Sudan's government vehemently opposes the introduction of U.N. forces in Darfur, where fighting between rebels and government-backed militias has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million since 2003. The U.N. has called it the world's worst humanitarian disaster, and the United States has labeled the attacks genocide.

"The violence in Darfur is not subsiding, it is getting worse," Rice told the gathering. "If the notion of our responsibility to protect the weakest and most powerless among us is ever to be more than an empty promise, then we must take action to save lives."

After the meeting, Rice hinted at stronger action if Sudan will not back down.

"There are other measures at the disposal of the international community should we not be able to get the agreement of Sudan," Rice told reporters.

A group of Darfur-born exiles called Rice's efforts a good first step, but it also criticized the United States and other world powers for doing too little too late to stop a daily tide of killings and rapes in Darfur's ravaged villages and teeming refugee camps.

DOJ_NMG_0068154

"Our call today is to the entire world ... to extend their hands to save these people," said Yahya Osman. "What is happening in Darfur is a silent genocide."

Other refugees at a press conference in Rice's Manhattan hotel described the deaths of cousins, uncles and other relatives at the hands of Sudanese government forces or the mounted Arab militiamen known as Janjaweed that they support.

The conflict in the remote Darfur region began in 2003, when ethnic African tribes revolted against the Arab-led Khartoum government. Militias, sometimes backed by helicopter gunships, have leveled villages and burned fields.

President Bush repeated the charge of genocide in one of the most pointed portions of his address to world leaders at the United Nations earlier this week. He named a special U.S. envoy to bring added pressure on the Khartoum government of President Omar al-Bashir.

The U.S. approach is hitting some resistance, especially from nations that argue that Sudan will respond best if it does not feel that its sovereignty or authority is being challenged.

Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa alluded to the difference of opinion in remarks to reporters Friday.

"I really want to contribute to the creation of ... a quiet atmosphere, a working atmosphere," Moussa said.

"We have suffered at certain stages of this problem of either exaggeration or misinformation," he added. "We have a major problem in Darfur, but not all what you hear, not all the information circulated, are really accurate."

Rice said no one is coddling Khartoum.

"No one intends to appease anyone," she told reporters. "We intend to have the government of Sudan act."

Al-Bashir denies there is a major humanitarian disaster in Darfur and said Tuesday that death rates there were no worse than anywhere else in Sudan. He said he would not allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur under any circumstances.

In a compromise reached this week, an African Union peacekeeping force will remain in Darfur through the end of the year. Human rights groups said the agreement didn't go nearly far enough to stop the suffering.

The African Union had hoped to turn over control for peacekeeping in Darfur to the United Nations when the mission's current mandate expires Sept. 30.

Chad's foreign minister, Ahmad Allam-mi, said in a speech Friday night at the U.N. that the Darfur crisis threatened not just the security of his country but that of the entire sub-region of Central Africa. He said Chad had suffered a lack of security, economic loss, environmental destruction and Janjaweed incursions.

"We can only welcome the extension until the end of December 2006 of the African Union mission in Darfur," he said. "It's better than nothing."

In urging the U.N. to take over from the African Union pursuant to the Security Council resolution, Allam-mi said such action "is simply dictated by common sense, in order to bring assistance to the innocent victims of the war. And also because more than anyone, we have every interest in restoring peace in Darfur, if only to enable the hundreds of thousands of Sudanese refugees located on our territory to return to their country and thereby put an end to the sacrifices to the Chadian hosts."

US Rallies Nations To Back Drive For UN Force In Darfur (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 23, 2006

Warning that "time is running out" to halt a resurgence of violence in Darfur, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought to build international pressure on Sudan to let UN peacekeepers into the war-torn region.

"The violence in Darfur must end, and it must end now," Rice told a special ministerial meeting of two dozen nations plus the European Union and the United Nations on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly.

The meeting notably discussed sending one or more delegations to Khartoum in an effort to convince President Omar al-Beshir to drop his opposition to deployment of the UN force, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"There was a discussion in the ministerial meeting about the desire to have a delegation to go to Khartoum to press upon them the importance of working together with the international community," he said.

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said a separate meeting of US and European Union foreign ministers also discussed sending a high-level delegation to Khartoum.

The ministers "considered how to organize a ministerial mission with several participants" to Khartoum, he said, without elaborating on who would take part in the trip.

The Security Council adopted a resolution last month demanding the deployment of some 20,000 peacekeepers to end more than three years of violence sparked by a revolt among Darfur's mostly black African population.

Much of the violence has been carried out by Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed, which are armed and funded by the Khartoum government.

DOJ_NMG_0068155

Beshir reaffirmed at the UN this week his refusal to authorise the UN deployment, which would replace an under-funded African Union force of 7,000 that has failed to halt the violence.

Rice said Friday that government forces had recently launched a new offensive against rebels in Darfur and that the fighting had cut humanitarian aid to hundreds of thousands of displaced persons.

"Time is running out," Rice told the meeting. "The violence in Darfur is not subsiding, it is getting worse."

Rice reiterated a statement made Tuesday by President George W. Bush that if Sudan does not quickly approve the deployment of the peacekeeping force, "the United Nations must find a way to act" without Sudan's consent.

She said several representatives at Friday's meeting acknowledged the possible use of measures to take if Sudan refuses to budge.

"There was a very clear indication by several speakers today that there are other measures at the disposal of the international community should we not be able to get the agreement of Sudan," she said.

But other US officials said the deployment of peacekeepers without Sudan's consent -- a possibility repeatedly raised by the United States -- was not discussed on Friday and the emphasis was rather on incentives that could draw Beshir's government into the process.

"We are considering a diplomatic solution and if that does not work, we will take another approach," said Andrew Natsios, a former head of the US Agency for International Development who was appointed by Bush on Tuesday to be the US special envoy for Darfur.

A defiant Beshir argued this week at the United Nations that the AU force now in Darfur was sufficient to deal with the violence and accused the international community of backing a "Zionist" plot "to dismember Sudan" and plunder its abundant resources, particularly its oil reserves.

But Natsios said that despite such public statements, "we're getting signals" in private of possible flexibility from Khartoum.

The African Union this week agreed to extend the mandate for its mission in Darfur to the end of the year and Friday's meeting discussed ways to strengthen the force with logistical and other support pending an eventual UN deployment,Natsios said.

The United States is at the same time planning to organize a series of informal meetings of potential troop contributors to the UN mission, to be held in parallel with diplomatic efforts to gain Khartoum's consent for the force, he said.

Rice Seeks Sudan's Consent (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

NEW YORK -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed Sudan to accept a United Nations force in Darfur yesterday, saying that Khartoum's consent would be welcome but is not necessary.

"It is now time for the Sudanese government to accept the will of the United Nations, to work with us fully in implementing Resolution 1706," Miss Rice told reporters after a meeting of European Union foreign ministers and others.

She was referring to the U.N. Security Council resolution authorizing a U.N. peacekeeping mission of up to 20,000 to halt what the United States and other nations have called a "genocide." The new force would replace about 7,000 African Union peacekeepers, whose mission was extended this week until the end of the year.

Miss Rice said there are "other measures available to the international community" to send the troops into Darfur, should the Sudanese government continue to refuse.

The meeting on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly session in New York took place amid new charges by U.N. human rights officials that Sudan's army continues to bomb villages in north Darfur.

The latest campaign, U.N. officials said, targets parts of the vast region in western Sudan that are not covered by a May peace agreement between the government and one rebel faction.

"Our intention, I want to underscore, is not to impinge upon Sudan's sovereignty. But let there be no doubt about our resolve," Miss Rice said.

Hours before the ministers met at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, 10 Darfur refugees wearing blue berets held a press conference in the same building to appeal for U.N. troops to save family members who are still alive.

"Words and meetings won't help," said Rahama Deffallah, president of Darfur People's Association of New York. "Please Secretary Rice, you can help save millions of lives."

Hundreds of thousands of civilians have already been killed in the conflict, which has forced millions into squalid refugee camps protected by the small AU force.

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said the AU had asked the alliance to give more support to the AU peacekeepers.

DOJ_NMG_0068156

Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said NATO should "answer positively and favorably" to the request from Republic of Congo President Denis Sassou-Nguesso. He is also the current head of the AU.

"I promise the president of the African Union that I, as secretary-general, will do everything I can with the allies to see that NATO can respond positively to these kinds of requests," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said.

In Geneva, U.N. human rights spokesman Jose Luis Diaz told reporters that survivors told U.N. monitors of bombings near Tabarat in north Darfur earlier this month, which drove some 400 people into a refugee camp.

"People talk about this white plane and bombs being dropped out of the back of the plane. This is a recurrent feature of reports of attacks on villages," he said. "All indications are this kind of attack is continuing."

U.N. monitors also reported that sexual violence, which has been a permanent feature of the conflict, continues in south Darfur, particularly near the town of Gereida.

"This has become almost a cliche: women go outside of [refugee] camps to collect firewood or engage in commerce, and they become vulnerable to attacks by what are said to be military personnel or militia," Mr. Diaz said.

As World Talks, More Violence Racks Darfur (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

With new reports of killings, U.N. officials and regional leaders debate how to intervene.

UNITED NATIONS — Amid attacks on civilians in the Darfur region of western Sudan, the Security Council and regional leaders remained stymied Friday by that country's refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers into the region to protect villagers caught in the conflict.

The U.S. and Denmark gathered senior officials from 20 "concerned countries," the African Union and the United Nations to discuss possible next steps, such as sanctions, a no-fly zone over Darfur or a forcible intervention.

"Time is running out. The violence in Darfur is not subsiding, it is getting worse," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the officials at the emergency session.

The meeting was aimed at winning support from Arab countries, especially those that have been silent or have backed Sudan's refusal to accept more than 20,000 peacekeepers by January. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak told Sudanese President Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir this week that he sided with Sudan.

A statement by the U.S. and Danish co-chairs said: "The killings, violence and atrocities must end. The intolerable suffering of the people of Darfur must stop."

But the meeting broke up without agreement on how best to persuade Sudan's government to halt attacks on the people in Darfur, or at least allow U.N. troops to protect them and aid groups to help them.

Amr Moussa, head of the Arab League, made it clear that there was no support in the region for an armed intervention, even if it were under a U.N. mandate. He said any solution must come with the consent of Sudan's leaders in Khartoum, and public threats would only increase Bashir's intransigence.

That leaves the question of what should happen next.

Rice said Bashir's government should recognize that the world is trying to help Sudan, not occupy it.

"The Sudanese government needs to understand that no one is trying to impinge on Sudanese sovereignty. That is not the issue here," she said. "But there is a responsibility to protect the weakest and Sudan has not done that, and so there will have to be a U.N. force."

As the diplomats debated this week, U.N. human rights monitors reported that Sudan's army was bombing areas in northern Darfur, causing civilian casualties and driving hundreds of people out of their villages. The rights monitors also reported that sexual violence continued in southern Darfur, particularly near camps for displaced people near the town of Gereida, and that African Union forces were not able to stop it.

Bashir said this week that U.N. troops were not welcome under any circumstances, but he would allow more African Union troops in Darfur.

There are about 7,200 African Union troops there now, but they are too underfunded and ill-equipped to effectively protect people scattered throughout a barren region the size of France. More than 200,000 people have been killed in the three-year conflict between government-aligned militias and rebel groups, and about 2.5 million have been displaced.

A peace agreement between one of the rebel groups and the government is all but dead, say U.N. officials, and the government is massing its military in the region to put down other anti-government factions.

Sudan's government has accepted a separate contingent of U.N. peacekeepers to stabilize southern Sudan, which is slowly rebuilding after two decades of civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0068157

On Friday, the Security Council extended the peacekeeping troops' presence there just until Oct. 8 in an attempt to keep pressure on Khartoum. The council may extend it after that, depending on Khartoum's cooperation in Darfur.

The new October deadline "would give us more time, I think, to build up momentum and pressure on the government of Khartoum to accept the inevitability that there is going to be a U.N. peacekeeping force," said U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John R. Bolton.

The U.N. announced Friday that it would send 100 additional personnel to help the African Union force with communications and logistics. The Arab League promised new funding, though earlier pledges fell through and caused unpaid African Union forces to essentially stop working last spring.

Rice said that the international community was determined to stop the violence in Darfur, with incentives, or with sanctions. "Clearly, no one intends to appease anyone," she said after the meeting at the Waldorf Astoria hotel in New York. "We intend to have the government of Sudan act."

U.S. Urges Arab Help On Darfur (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration has begun quietly urging Arab countries to help overcome Sudan's resistance to deploying 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers and police to the troubled Darfur region, the new U.S. special envoy for Sudan said Wednesday

In a telephone interview with The Associated Press, Andrew Natsios said U.S. contacts with Arab countries have begun. He declined to identify the countries.

"We are engaging and we are going to continue to engage with them," Natsios said. The initiative is based on the premise that as the humanitarian crisis in Darfur deepens, the Islamic government in Khartoum will be more receptive to pressure from fellow Arab countries than from non-Muslim countries.

The U.N. Security Council approved a resolution three weeks ago for the deployment a U.N. force, but the Sudanese government has rejected the plan.

Natsios expressed disappointment that China, a permanent member of the Security Council, has shown little willingness to lobby Sudan to accept peacekeepers. The two countries have close economic and political ties.

"The role of China cannot be overstated," said Natsios. "They are the country with the most influence with the Sudanese government."

With the humanitarian situation in Darfur worsening by the day, President Bush appointed Natsios as special envoy this week. Natsios was deeply involved in Darfur policy as administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, a post he held from 2001 until early this year.

The African Union agreed Wednesday to extend the mandate of its underequipped peacekeeping forces in Darfur through the end of 2006.

The United Nations and many human rights groups say that since 2003, fighting between rebels and government-backed militias in Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million.

In Protest, AU to Limit Investments in Sudan

The American University Board of Trustees voted yesterday not to invest directly in companies doing business in the oil and gas sector in Sudan, to protest military attacks on the nation's Darfur region.

The board also named the 15 members of the committee that will search for a successor to Benjamin Ladner, the president who was ousted last year after an audit.

The search committee -- which includes trustees, professors, alumni and students -- will hold its first meeting Monday.

War With Hezbollah Has Left Jewish, Arab Israelis More Divided Than Ever (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068158

JERUSALEM - For two years, author Sayed Kashua, an Arab-Israeli, has been writing a popular weekly newspaper column for one of Israel's largest Hebrew-language newspapers, Haaretz. The column often takes a lighthearted look at discrimination, racism and the challenges facing the Arab minority in this largely Jewish nation.

But a few weeks ago, as Israel's summer war with Hezbollah in Lebanon wound down, Kashua made what was for his Jewish readers a startling confession. He confessed he'd been hoping Israel would lose.

"My hands tremble as I write, but in this war I was against Israel - make no mistake - my country," he wrote. "You can say it's treason, you can say what you want, but I am still unable to understand how I can be happy when I hear that another IDF (Israel Defense Forces) tank has been hit and, at the same time, be afraid that I have friends inside it."

The piece generated scores of angry e-mails, letters and phone calls. It also exposed the simmering anger that Israel's Arab citizens feel over how their country treats them and became one more provocation for an anti-Arab backlash that's still unfolding.

Conservative Israeli lawmaker Effi Eitam denounced Arab-Israelis as "a band of traitors of the first degree" and a dangerous "fifth column" that should be barred from participating in Israeli politics.

The Israeli parliament's ethics committee last week suspended two Arab-Israeli lawmakers, one for a day, the other for three days, after one called the defense minister a "child-murderer" and the other denounced opposition politician Benjamin Netanyahu as an "angel of death."

Israel's attorney general has launched an investigation into a group of Arab-Israeli lawmakers who took a postwar solidarity trip to Syria, a journey that may have violated the country's ban on visits to "enemy nations."

And in Haifa, a city that touts its long history of Arab-Jewish co-existence, the city council ousted its Arab-Israeli deputy mayor after he repeatedly went on television during the war to criticize Israel.

"Jews and Arabs did not come out of this war more united," said Elie Rekhess, director of the Adenauer Program for Jewish-Arab Cooperation at the Dayan Center of Tel Aviv University. "Instead, the mistrust between Jews and Arabs has deepened."

Arab-Israelis suffered more than their share of casualties from Hezbollah rocket attacks during the war. Arabs make up about 1 in 5 of Israel's population. But more than 1 in 4 of those killed by Hezbollah rockets - at least 14 of the 54 Israeli dead - were Arabs.

Even so, relatives of the Arab-Israeli victims didn't blame Hezbollah for their losses; they blamed their government. Arab-Israeli politicians criticized Prime Minister Ehud Olmert for unleashing an overpowering military response after Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in the July 12 cross-border ambush.

Many Jewish Israelis felt as though they'd been betrayed.

Kashua said they shouldn't have been surprised.

"You have to be a really, really very stupid Israeli to think that Arabs like you," Kashua said at his home outside Jerusalem. "I think the Israelis did all their best to make Arabs hate this country."

Although they are full citizens of Israel, Arab-Israelis face subtle and concrete discrimination in housing, jobs and society. Arab-Israeli towns within range of Hezbollah rockets were never equipped with the bomb shelters and well-run early warning systems that were commonplace in other communities.

The sense of estrangement became especially clear six years ago when violent confrontations between police and Israeli-Arabs left 13 people dead during the opening days of the Palestinian uprising.

A special committee set up to investigate the clashes sharply criticized Israel's treatment of its Arab minority as "primarily neglectful and discriminatory." The report urged the government to do more to ensure Arab-Israelis weren't treated as second-class citizens. But critics say the country has done virtually nothing to address the problems.

"The six years that passed from October 2000 until now could have been used in order to include them in a civic state hug, but the state of Israel did not manage to do this," said Shuli Dichter, co-director of Sikkuy, an Israeli nonprofit that promotes Arab-Jewish cooperation. "And now they have very little reason, if at all, to feel affiliated with the state of Israel."

Both Dichter and his co-director, Ali Haider, said the war had brought the years of neglect back to the surface, and they urged their country to take steps quickly to prevent a recurrence of the 2000 clashes.

"I see this as a rather painful turning point that can help us redefine the relations between Jews and Arabs in Israel and put us on a more solid basis," Dichter said.

Kashua, for one, is skeptical that the war will do much to change things in a nation ever struggling to reconcile its often-competing identities as a Jewish and democratic country.

"For me, at least, there is nothing secure about being a citizen of Israel," Kashua said. "If it's not going to change as a Jewish country, I don't see how we can fit."

DOJ_NMG_0068159

The father of two young children went through a very public soul-searching process during the war. At first, the author of two novels used his self-effacing style to make a plea for peace.

"I'd be the state's first defeatist chief of staff," he wrote two weeks into the 34-day conflict. "I'm one of those people who's ready to do anything so as not to see one mother cry."

Two weeks later, Kashua bemoaned his status as an Israeli-Arab during a war in which his fellow citizens were questioning his loyalty.

"When it comes to the Israeli media, the best thing an Arab can do in wartime is shut up," he wrote.

A week later, as the cease-fire took effect, Kashua wrote his contentious column opposing the war.

"I really am glad that Israel now looks a bit less frightening," he wrote. "I truly believe that the less monstrous Israel appears, the better the prospects of it being treated as human. I know very well that if Israel had won in a knockout the hatred for the country would have spiraled and the desire to arm and plan for the next attack on it would be far stronger."

Kashua has continued to write his column, with his editors' encouragement, and has tried to gently defuse the anger with humor.

In a recent column, he blamed his denunciation of Israel on a gang of "genuine Arabs" who'd taken his children hostage, compelling him to submit the offensive articles under his name.

"I swear to you, you can even ask my wife: I was totally in favor of the war - that is, for Israel in a war against the Axis of Evil," he wrote. "I admit: I made a mistake and should not have yielded to temptation and written about that accursed war."

Hezbollah Chief Defiant At Huge Rally (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, September 23, 2006

BEIRUT, Sept. 22 -- In the mix of theater and pulpit that makes for a Hezbollah rally, the group's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, appeared Friday before hundreds of thousands of supporters for the first time since its war with Israel ended last month.

His message was defiant, with the bravado the crowd expected: Hezbollah was stronger than before the war, he said, and it still possessed more than 20,000 rockets. Only the creation of a strong Lebanese government, he added, would lead to its disarmament, as demanded by the United Nations.

Kamal Ribai, a shy, soft-spoken businessman in the crowd with his son and two daughters, thrust his fist into the air.

"At your command, Nasrallah!" he shouted, as six balloons floated above him carrying Lebanese and Hezbollah flags.

In an anxious and unsettled time in Lebanon, the Shiite Muslim group organized its largest show of force since a cease-fire went into effect Aug. 14. The spectacle filled a 37-acre lot, about a mile from the group's war-wrecked headquarters in a Beirut suburb, with flag-waving, boisterous supporters.

For the movement and the rest of the country, the rally signaled Hezbollah's direction after a battle it has proclaimed a "divine victory." Sounding less strident than some had expected, Nasrallah said he would seek a government that better represented his group and its allies, ridiculed the prime minister and scoffed at the attempts of "any army in the world" to seize its weapons.

But the country's future was perhaps better suggested by the scenes that unfolded among people in the crowd, some of whom had trekked two days on foot from southern Lebanon to join what Hezbollah called a festival of victory. In moments sometimes quiet, sometimes shrill, Lebanon's fault lines were exposed: Here was a country perched between a culture of resistance to Israel and a desire to reach an accommodation with it. Chants and iconography reflected the cult of personality around Nasrallah and confidence in the power of the long-downtrodden Shiite community in a country whose various sects -- Christian, Sunni and Druze -- often see one's strength as the other's weakness.

"This is all of Lebanon you see around you," Ribai said confidently, waving his hand. "It's all of Lebanon. Look at it."

"The real majority," he said, referring to Hezbollah and its allies. "As long as they stay united, nothing will go wrong."

Hezbollah's call for the rally this week unleashed a wave of anxiety and anticipation in Beirut. Some saw Nasrallah's appearance as a way to reinforce the notion of victory to his supporters, who bore the brunt of a 33-day conflict. Others saw it, more darkly, as a first step toward delivering the state to Hezbollah.

"What will Nasrallah say at the festival of victory?" read the banner headline in Friday editions of as-Safir, a leading Beirut daily.

"It's a big moment," Ribai said. "It's a big moment for all of Lebanon."

The mood has shifted in Lebanon in the weeks since the war ended. Most politicians tried to maintain a facade of unity while the battle raged, but it evaporated within days of the cease-fire. With little more than the rubble cleared and makeshift bridges built, the extent of the damage has sunk in. The mood has sobered: While Israel may not have won, to many here the notion of victory is more ambiguous.

In subtle ways, Hezbollah's message has changed, too. At the rally Friday, the group's slogan about a coming victory -- "The Truthful Pledge" -- had become "Our Truthful Pledge." One of its professionally produced posters read, "America and its tools have been defeated." In a country used to reading between the lines, "tools" could mean allies both abroad and at home.

"If Hezbollah wanted to fight, in one hour it would take all of Lebanon," said Mahmoud Birjawi, a 35-year-old Lebanese expatriate who flew from Venezuela two days ago, in part to attend the rally. He scoffed at the idea of strife inside the country, memories of its 1975-90 war still vivid. But he added that "the future is for the resistance," the name Hezbollah uses for its militia.

As Birjawi waited with the crowd in the sun-drenched lot, supporters cheered and waved Hezbollah's yellow flags each time a taped recording of Nasrallah's speech was played. "This is our country," he said. "We defended this country."

A Hezbollah rally is many things: a show of force, of discipline, of empowerment and of the loyalty of its following. The group's followers have a mantra -- What Nasrallah says, he does -- and that credibility was on display even on the posters overhead. Four depicted battle scenes, reading, in order: "Our water," "Our air," "Our earth," "With fire, we defended." In the top left corner of two, "reconstruction" was written, acknowledging that pictures of a helicopter and ship exploding did not depict actual events.

To a degree unmatched in the Arab world, Hezbollah can mobilize supporters, who answer its call with almost martial precision.

"Every drop in the ocean counts," Ribai said.

Ribai and his family are from Tibnin, a southern village scarred by the fighting this summer. As with many Shiites from the poorer south, the 50-year-old emigrated to Liberia and Sierra Leone to earn money, then returned to Lebanon. He now lives in Beirut. At the rally, he was earnest, even retiring, doting on his three children -- ages 20, 19 and 9 -- who accompanied him.

"When Sayyid Hasan called everyone, I decided to come," he said, using an honorific. "I didn't think twice about it."

More pronounced than before the war, a cult of personality has grown up around Nasrallah. T-shirts in the crowd with his picture read, "Hero of the resistance." Some people wore miniature portraits of him as necklaces. As with many, Ribai talked of Nasrallah with a certain awe. Nasrallah's son, Ribai pointed out, had been killed fighting Israeli troops occupying southern Lebanon in 1997.

"Somebody who sacrificed his own son's life? He did everything he could for this country. He asks you to come celebrate this victory. Why would I think twice about it?" he said.

His daughter Zeinab, 20, leaned into the conversation. "He's one of us," she said.

At the first words uttered by Nasrallah, perhaps the most skilled orator in Arabic today, the crowd erupted, the cries drowning him out. Speakers broadcast his words at each end of the field, awash in a sea of fluttering yellow, interspersed with the flags of allies. Some people flashed V-for-victory signs. Others joined chants. "O God, O God, protect Nasrallah!"

"No army in the world will be able to make us drop the weapons from our hands!" Nasrallah shouted.

In a black turban, with a slight lisp, Nasrallah has an almost innate sense of a crowd. He builds an argument with highly formal Arabic vocabulary, then delivers a point in almost conversational slang. His most emotional refrains are delivered bluntly, in a stentorian staccato. Then he mixes in jokes, a few words in a softer voice, and sometimes a quick aside.

In his speech Friday, he said he had debated whether to attend the rally until a half-hour before it began.

"But my heart, mind and soul did not allow me to address you from afar," he said.

Hezbollah's opponents in Lebanon feared a harsher speech. Although Nasrallah ridiculed Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora for crying in public during the war -- "Tears don't protect anyone" -- he tempered his strongest statements.

"When we build a strong and just state that is capable of protecting the nation and its citizens, we will easily find an honorable solution to the issue of the resistance and its weapons," he said.

He demanded the resignation of the government, saying it "was incapable of protecting Lebanon, rebuilding it or uniting it." But there was no threat that Hezbollah's two ministers would resign, nor any warning that the movement would engage in street protests.

Every so often, he played to the crowd, which followed his words as if at a lecture. At each mention of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the United States or Israel, the audience erupted in catcalls. At the mention of Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez, a critic of America, cheers went up, repeated when Nasrallah defended Hezbollah's alliance with Iran and Syria.

Toward the end of his speech, he called the resistance more powerful than before the war.

"The resistance, pay attention," he said, "has more than 20,000 missiles."

At that, fists went into the air, and some clambered onto chairs. Ribai turned to his younger daughter and kissed her head. Zeinab waved Nasrallah's portrait overhead.

"It's the majority that counts," Ribai said. "The real majority, I'm talking about the people who are here."

"I hope that everyone can stay like this," Zeinab added. "One hand joined together."

DOJ_NMG_0068161

The speech ended in an hour. Within minutes, the group's workers were stacking tens of thousands of chairs. Honking cars soon lurched away, blaring Nasrallah's older speeches and flying flags. Some people on balconies threw rice on the crowd, as firecrackers and celebratory gunfire went off along the street. Overhead, as the crowd left, only three balloons of the original six were left.

All of them carried Hezbollah flags.

Vast Lebanon Throng Hails Hezbollah Chief, Who Calls The Militia Stronger (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 22 — Hundreds of thousands of people stood Friday and chanted "God, God, protect Nasrallah." It was the moment they had waited for: Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, in person, declaring that his militia was stronger than ever and that no army in the world could force it to disarm.

This was Sheik Nasrallah's first public appearance since the war with Israel started in July, and it was steeped in defiance: at Israel, the United States, Arab heads of state and those political forces in Lebanon aiming to clip Hezbollah's political and military power.

If there was any thought the war weakened Hezbollah, Sheik Nasrallah had a different message: "It is stronger." Even after Israel's 34-day bombardment of Lebanon, Hezbollah, he said, still has more than 20,000 missiles. "Not a single army in the world will be able to dismantle our resistance," Sheik Nasrallah said, as he stood beneath a big banner that read "The Victory Rally." "No army in the world will be able to make us drop the weapons from our hands."

The crowd was mammoth, packing every corner of the 37-acre square in the southern suburbs of Beirut. There was a plastic chair for nearly everyone, and a baseball cap for protection from the sun. Hezbollah's martial choir belted out chest thumping music. The crowds waved flags, wildly cheering for Sheik Nasrallah, who has become a folk hero to many here and throughout the Arab world. The audience came on foot, by car and by bus from the south and the north, and in every case, people said they came because Sheik Nasrallah asked them to.

"Whatever Sayid Hassan wants Sayid Hassan gets," said Hossain Zebara, 29, using a title reserved for descendants of the prophet Muhammad. Mr. Zebara said it took him 24 hours to walk from his home in the southern part of Lebanon to be at the rally. "We came to show the American administration, the British administration, the French administration, that the resistance population is increasing, not decreasing."

That was exactly Sheik Nasrallah's point — a show of strength to those who would challenge him from abroad, and those who would challenge him at home. In a country of about four million, turning out hundreds of thousands of people in a disciplined, highly orchestrated event, is a sign of strength.

But the rally also highlighted some of the deep divisions among Lebanon's different factions, as the crowd at times chanted slogans calling the Druse leader, Walid Jumblatt, a "worm" and "Jew" and calling for the prime minister to leave office.

Sheik Nasrallah sought to overcome some of that by calling for unity in a speech that tried to define him as leader who is not just a local force, but a regional force as well. He gave voice to one of the primary feelings that has fueled anger throughout the Muslim world: a sense that Muslims are being victimized in places like Iraq and Gaza, and the world does not care. "How long will it go on that the world keeps quiet?" he asked.

And he aimed hard at Arab leaders, criticizing them for not being willing to fight Israel. "These Arab leaders prefer to protect their thrones as opposed to protecting Palestine," he said, taking a shot at the traditional power brokers, like the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak.

In Israel, Sheik Nasrallah's speech was condemned as defying the international community by refusing to disarm.

Sheik Nasrallah had multiple messages to deliver: He said that Hezbollah would not disarm because the state was too weak to protect the people against Israel. He warned the international force deploying along the border with Israel not to spy on the "resistance." He castigated Arab heads of state who recently asked the United Nations Security Council to help restart the peace process with Israel. He cautioned the Lebanese people about allowing political differences among sectarian leaders to become sectarian differences that might tear the country apart. And he repeatedly criticized the American-backed government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, saying it needed to be replaced by a national unity government, which would in turn give Hezbollah even more power.

No one knew if Sheik Nasrallah would appear. People here talk about his assassination by Israel as though it is not just a matter of if, but when. The rally, billed as a celebration of the "divine victory," presented him a chance to re-energize his supporters, to enhance his standing as a pan-Arab leader, and to try to buttress Hezbollah's domestic political position. When he entered, he stood on a platform and appeared almost regal in finely tailored religious robes and a black turban. He was taken to the stage where he was protected by a wall of blastproof glass. He said that up until 30 minutes before the rally there were still discussions going on over whether he would attend.

"I couldn't talk to you from afar," he said. "I insisted to be with you."

Israel began the war after Hezbollah crossed the border and captured two Israeli soldiers. The Israeli onslaught caused heavy damage to the mostly Shiite areas in the south and the north, and cost more than 1,000 lives, mostly civilians. But Hezbollah's fighters never stopped, shooting hundreds of rockets into Israel, destroying Israeli tanks, an Israeli naval vessel and killing many Israeli troops.

Judging from the size of the rally, and the remarks of the participants, Hezbollah's base did not blame Hezbollah for the death and destruction. They blamed Israel and the United States. "This is good, good," said Fatima Saad, 50, whose son, Kasem, was killed. There was no hint of sadness in her bearing. "I am very proud," she said as she patted a picture of her son pinned to her chest. He was 20 when he was blown up.

Ahmed Hussein, 78, made the trip to Beirut from his southern village of Kafr Kila. He said his house and most of his neighbors' homes were destroyed, but that Hezbollah gave them tents and water tanks to help them get by. "All of us whose houses were destroyed we came here for Nasrallah, to tell him what we lost is nothing," Mr. Hussein said.

While Hezbollah and Sheik Nasrallah have been hailed as heroes throughout the Arab world, the group's position in Lebanese politics is more complex. They have been attacked by opponents who fear that an empowered Hezbollah would exert even more influence over the country. Some of Sheik Nasrallah's opponents said they thought the rally might help undermine his chance of reaching out beyond his Shiite base because he said he was comfortable being aligned with Syria and Iran. For his part, Sheik Nasrallah seemed to try to both embrace his benefactors in Syria and Iran and to distance himself from them. He said it made him angry when his detractors charged that the battle with Israel was a proxy war for Iran, or Syria. "We are with the Iranians, we are with the Syrians, but this was our war," he said, as he thrust his right hand into the air, and the crowd cheered.

Hizbollah Leader Delivers Defiant Speech (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hizbollah, delivered a defiant speech in front of hundreds of thousands of supporters on Friday , passionately reiterating that the group would not disarm and claiming it still had 20,000 rockets.

In his first public appearance since the Shia militant group's 34-day war with Israel, Mr Nasrallah said the movement had recovered all its organisational and military capabilities, and added that its focus would be now to push for a government of national unity – a direct challenge to the administration led by the prime minister, Fouad Siniora.

"It is stronger than it was before July 12 [the day the conflict began]," he said, gesturing with his right arm towards crowds of people in a sea of yellow Hizbollah flags. "The resistance will never bow down to conditions. Any words about giving [up] the arms of the resistance in the present state would mean Lebanon will be exposed in front of Israel."

The huge display of support for the group was viewed by some as a deliberate attempt by Hizbollah leaders to intimidate the government with a show of strength following weeks of political bickering between the pro-western parliamentary majority that backs Mr Siniora and Hizbollah and its allies.

"The current government is unable to protect Lebanon, or to reconstruct Lebanon or to unify Lebanon," he said.

Earlier, as the crowd waited for the Hizbollah leader, chants of "Siniora get out" rang around the square.

Mr Nasrallah also warned against rising sectarian tensions. Some Sunni and Christians blame Hizbollah for triggering the war, but Mr Nasrallah said anybody talking about divisions was "playing into the hands of Israel".

"Please do not let anybody make the disunity that is politics become sectarian," he said.

Hizbollah and its allied Christian leader General Michel Aoun have been calling for a unity government since the war ended as they seek to turn the conflict to their political advantage.

Lebanese officials and diplomats say the move is designed to give the group a blocking minority in the cabinet that would enable it to gain greater leverage and reduce the influence of the bloc that backs Mr Siniora. At present Hizbollah has two ministers in the 24-member cabinet. Amal, another Shia group also has two, while the foreign minister is a Shia approved by Hizbollah. Gen Aoun's party is outside the government.

A Lebanese official said that while Hizbollah had not been specific, "the indications are that they want to do it, implying they need change in the government that will give them a blocking minority".

The official said the group could also still be hedging its bets, saying Mr Nasrallah's main concern was to stem the government's insistence that Hizbollah's disarmament stay on the agenda.

The government says it will not try to disarm Hizbollah forcibly, but deems disarmament, as well as the Lebanese army asserting its authority in the south, as essential to future security.

Mr Siniora has insisted there will be no change of government. The danger is that the tensions could push the country into a political crisis with an administration unable to function effectively.

Nasrallah: No Army Can Disarm Hezbollah (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, September 23, 2006

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah defied the international community in his first major appearance since the war with Israel, telling hundreds of thousands of supporters at a "victory" rally Friday that no army could disarm his militia.

Nasrallah said his guerrillas have replenished their arsenal and have more than 20,000 rockets which they will never give up unless a stronger Lebanese government takes over.

The Iranian-backed leader's tough stance was aimed at demonstrating that Hezbollah was not weakened by U.N. peacekeepers and Lebanese troops deploying across southern Lebanon with a mandate to rein in the Shiite guerrillas.

The gathering that sprawled over a swath of bombed-out south Beirut was a defiant show of Hezbollah strength and a challenge to the government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

Police officials estimated 800,000 people — mostly Shiites but including some Christians — filled the 37-acre lot to hear Nasrallah, forming a sea of waving yellow Hezbollah banners, mixed with a smaller number of Lebanese flags.

In his first public appearance since Israel launched its offensive against Hezbollah on July 12, Nasrallah called for formation of a new government. He repeatedly attacked Saniora's administration, saying it was weak and unable to protect Lebanon from Israel.

"Tears don't protect anyone," the black-turbaned cleric said in a jab at Saniora, who wept several times in speeches during the Israeli assault as he pleaded for international support.

Nasrallah said his group would keep its arms until Lebanon has a stronger government. Giving up weapons now "under this government ... means leaving Lebanon exposed before Israel to kill and detain and bomb whomever they want, and clearly we will not accept that," he said.

Hezbollah's push for a larger presence in government could deepen tensions in a country already sharply divided over the war that killed hundreds of Lebanese.

The guerrillas' tough fight with Israel sent their support soaring among Shiites. But a large sector — particularly among Christians and Sunni Muslims — opposes Hezbollah and resent it for starting the fight by capturing two Israeli soldiers.

A stronger Hezbollah political role would also snub efforts by the United States and Israel to weaken the group and decrease the influence of its ally Syria.

Former President Amin Gemayel said parts of Nasrallah's speech were "dangerous."

"He is linking giving up Hezbollah's weapons to regime change in Lebanon and ... to drastic changes on the level of the Lebanese government," Gemayel said. "This is very surprising and dangerous, and leads us to ask, what kind of government does (Nasrallah) want for what kind of Lebanon?"

Faris Soueid, a Christian politician close to Saniora, insisted the government would not bend to Hezbollah. "I believe it will not scare the government of Fuad Saniora," he said on Al-Arabiya television. "It will not fall, not in the street and not because of political speeches."

Despite his tough rhetoric, Nasrallah offered an olive branch, saying he did not want to bring down the government — only to hold discussions on including more factions.

Saniora has repeatedly rejected a new government. A terse statement from his office said Nasrallah's focus "on dialogue in his speech is a good and constructive thing and opens future horizons."

Although Nasrallah said in an interview that he would not have authorized the Israeli soldiers' capture if he had known it would trigger such a response, the Hezbollah leader proclaimed that his forces now are not weaker.

"No army in the world will be able to make us drop the weapons from our hands," Nasrallah told the crowd, which cheered and waved hundreds of Hezbollah flags.

He boasted that his fighters would not be affected by the U.N. and Lebanese troops monitoring the borders and airport and patrolling the coast with warships to prevent Hezbollah from rearming.

"I say to all those who want to close the seas, skies and the deserts and the border and the enemy, the resistance today possesses more — I underline that — more than 20,000 rockets," Nasrallah said.

"The resistance ... has regained all its military, organizational and weapons capabilities. The resistance today is stronger than it was on the eve of July 12," he said.

The 20,000 figure was even higher than the number of rockets Hezbollah claimed to have before the fighting — between 10,000 and 12,000 — and Nasrallah suggested he had hidden the true size of the arsenal. The guerrillas fired nearly 4,000 rockets into Israel during the fighting.

Israel lashed back after the speech, saying Nasrallah was issuing a challenge to the Lebanese government and the international community.

"The international community can't afford to have this Iranian-funded extremist spit in the face of the organized community of nations," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said in Jerusalem.

Of Nasrallah's claim to 20,000 rockets, Regev said that under the cease-fire, Hezbollah "shouldn't have any rockets."

The U.N.-brokered cease-fire that ended the war Aug. 14 calls for Hezbollah to eventually disarm. U.N. peacekeepers and Lebanese troops say they won't hunt out and confiscate hidden Hezbollah arsenals. But they do intend to take weapons they encounter and stop new ones from coming in.

Hezbollah has been demanding formation of a national unity government that would presumably add more Hezbollah members and bring in its allies, including a Christian faction led by Michel Aoun.

That would relieve pressure on Hezbollah to surrender its weapons and likely lead to an administration friendlier to Syria.

Israel threatened to assassinate Nasrallah during the offensive. The Hezbollah leader went into hiding during the month of fighting, though he issued videotaped speeches and gave interviews to Lebanese television.

The rally filled a vast lot in Beirut's southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold where entire blocks were leveled by Israel during the war.

"We are with him (Nasrallah). I am here to say no to disarming Hezbollah," said a 42-year-old Shiite, Mira Ali, waving a Hezbollah flag.

"We came to participate in the victory for all of Lebanon. We came to show we are the majority," said Roy Abi Khalil, a 21-year-old Aoun supporter.

Sheik Claims 20,000 Rockets (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

BEIRUT -- Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah told hundreds of thousands of supporters at a "victory" rally yesterday that his guerrillas have 20,000 rockets left after the war with Israel and will not surrender their arsenal unless a stronger Lebanese government is in place.

The gathering that sprawled over a swath of bombed-out south Beirut was a defiant show of Hezbollah strength and a challenge to the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

It also aimed to demonstrate that Hezbollah was not weakened by U.N. peacekeepers and Lebanese troops deploying across southern Lebanon with a mandate to rein in the Shi'ite guerrillas.

Hezbollah Leader Affirms Strength Of His Militia At Mass Rally (MCT)

By Hannah Allam

McClatchy Newspapers, September 23, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah on Friday rejected calls to disarm and told a massive rally in the bomb-ravaged suburbs of Beirut that his militia still has more than 20,000 rockets after its 34-day war with Israel.

Nasrallah's first public appearance since the end of the conflict drew hundreds of thousands of supporters to a confetti-sprinkled celebration of the Shiite Muslim militant group's "divine victory." In an emotional speech that ran long past an hour, Nasrallah refused to disarm his guerrillas under the weak government led by Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and warned international peacekeepers to keep their distance.

"They want to dissolve Hezbollah, but we've seen that no army in the world can do that. No army in the world will be able to remove the weapons from our grip, as long as we have the loyalty of the people," Nasrallah said, as the crowd broke into deafening cheers and whistles.

The immense turnout at the rally, broadcast live on satellite channels throughout the Middle East, cemented the militant Shiite leader's postwar status as one of the most powerful leaders in the region. He chided Sunni Arab regimes for failing to defend Lebanon and expressed gratitude to Shiite Iran for supporting Hezbollah.

Iran is a major supporter of Sunni and Shiite militants who oppose Western intervention in the Islamic world, Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, and in some cases Israel's very existence. Many Arab leaders, mostly Sunnis already bitter over the rise of Shiite Islam in Iraq, view Hezbollah as an Iranian proxy that's helping to spread Persian influence throughout the Middle East.

"How can you ask for equality when you won't fight for Gaza or Jerusalem?" Nasrallah asked of fellow Arabs. "The Lebanese resistance left no excuse for Arab armies. The Arab armies, combined, are able to liberate the West Bank and Gaza and Jerusalem."

Nasrallah stressed in his speech that Hezbollah is a homegrown Lebanese movement, but he defended the group's close ties to the Shiite theocracy in Tehran.

"Delegates from all over the world come and tell us this was an Iranian war," Nasrallah said. "We are proud of our relationship with the Islamic Republic of Iran. We support them in leadership and people, and our history shows this."

Mention of Iran elicited a smattering of boos among the cheers. Several Hezbollah supporters at the rally said they weren't thrilled over Iran's donations of cash, weapons and training to the Lebanese group, and said the relationship was born only out of necessity.

"We respect the people of Iran and the country of Iran for always supporting us," said Abu Yusuf Imad, 45, whose young son carried a large Iranian flag at the rally. "The others can think about this what they want, but we are the owners of the territory. It was our buildings destroyed, our land occupied and there is no government here to defend against anything."

"These words of Hassan Nasrallah show us this was an Iranian-American war," said Khalil Basha, 30, a merchant. "It was a proxy war. Nasrallah thinks differently from the Iranians, but if he doesn't work with Iran for financial and military support, then who can he work with?"

Nasrallah chose his words carefully in calling for a new Lebanese government. He said the Saniora administration is unable to protect, rebuild or unify Lebanon and said a more representative alternative must be found. Yet he was quick to defend the embattled Lebanese army, saying its relationship to the resistance is like "two dear brothers."

"Our weapons are not for the inside and they'll never be used for the inside," Nasrallah said, addressing fears among Lebanon's often-quarreling Sunni, Christian and Druze communities over the Shiite show of force. "These are Lebanese arms. These are the arms of the Muslims and the Christians, here to protect Lebanon."

Members of the Lebanese government expressed exasperation over Nasrallah's remarks, saying it wasn't plausible for the Saniora administration to remake itself.

"How can we form a national unity government when we already have an established presence with important tasks at hand: the task of guarding the border and reconstruction," Elias Zogby, a pro-government Christian politician, told al Jazeera television after the rally. "Are we to stop and form a new government, a process that would take at least three months, while the country's in a transitional period?"

Nasrallah assumed a variety of roles before the crowd. He spoke as a nationalist, promising Lebanon's fractious sects that his victory was theirs. He spoke as an Arab, urging support for Palestinians and Iraqis. He spoke as an international player, lavishing praise on Venezuela's leftist president, Hugo Chavez, and condemning U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

But Nasrallah's most heartfelt words were reserved for the Shiites, who bore the brunt of the devastating Israeli bombing campaign provoked by Hezbollah's abduction of two Israeli soldiers on July 12. Israeli air strikes ripped through villages along the border with the Jewish state, flattened Beirut's southern suburbs and destroyed airport runways, bridges and other infrastructure.

More than 1,000 Lebanese, most of them civilians, died in the bombings. Hezbollah fired nearly 4,000 rockets into northern Israel during the war and killed 157 Israelis, most of them soldiers. Fighting displaced nearly 1 million Lebanese and wiped out thousands of homes and businesses.

"Bless your martyrs and the families of your martyrs. Bless your orphans, your broken homes, your lost fortunes," Nasrallah said. "Today, we celebrate a divine victory, a strategic and historic victory. Nobody would imagine that a few thousand of your people, your resistance, stood up for days in front of the strongest army in the region."

The words resonated with Shiite families, many of whom walked or hitched rides from southern villages to attend the rally. Thousands waved the yellow banners of Hezbollah or hoisted placards that read, "Here we are, Nasrallah." Celebratory gunfire crackled throughout the suburbs.

"He represents our views as if he's speaking from our own hearts. We feel he's one of us, somebody we know," said Ferial Faqih, a secular Shiite in a midriff-baring top.

Faten Mansour, a 25-year-old Shiite mother who'd draped a Hezbollah flag over her black chador, said she brought her three young children to see Nasrallah and to teach them "to defend our country and to walk in the footsteps of the resistance."

Mahdi Allam, 23, a pizza chef whose uncle and best friend were Hezbollah guerrillas who died in battle, waved a gigantic yellow flag long after the crowd had left the rally.

"The most important thing is what he didn't say: Go give your lives for the lands that still aren't free. I was waiting for it, ready, and so were all my friends," Allam said. "But he showed us he's a grounded man who does things slowly and with reason."

The rally had been timed to coincide with the withdrawal of the last Israeli troops from southern Lebanon, but Israeli officials said earlier this week that the pullout would take longer than expected.

Hamas Rebuffs Palestinian President Over Israel (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 22 — The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, and other Hamas leaders said Friday that the group would not be part of a Palestinian government that recognizes Israel, a position that could complicate efforts to form a unity government and win renewed Western assistance.

Just a day earlier at the United Nations, the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, said that a new Palestinian government would recognize Israel and honor previous agreements with it.

Mr. Abbas spent most of the past week in New York and received support from world leaders, including President Bush, for his efforts to establish the new government. But Friday's developments pointed to fundamental differences that remain between Hamas, the radical Islamic movement that currently leads the government, and Fatah, the rival party led by Mr. Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0068167

Despite months of on-again, off-again talks, it is still not clear that Hamas and Fatah can agree on the makeup and the platform of a new government, and whether it will be acceptable to Western countries, which have set three basic conditions for restoring aid: recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

"We have accepted the establishment of a Palestinian state on the 1967 borders and the return of refugees, and the condition will be a truce, not the recognition of Israel," Mr. Haniya said, restating a long-held Hamas position following midday prayers at a Gaza City mosque.

Mahmoud Zahar, the Palestinian foreign minister, was even more explicit in remarks Friday evening. "We will not participate in a 'recognition' government," he said.

Hamas and Fatah have tried to come up with a platform for the new Palestinian Authority government that allows for broad interpretation. The goal is for the Palestinian government to meet the conditions set by the West, while Hamas, as a party, would not have to explicitly embrace those positions. There is still no agreement on how the senior positions will be allotted in the new government, though Mr. Haniya is expected to remain as prime minister, with Hamas getting the largest share of the cabinet posts.

Previous Palestinian negotiations with Israel were handled by the Palestine Liberation Organization, and this would continue to be the case. Fatah is the main component of the P.L.O., which includes numerous smaller factions.

Hamas, which has always rejected negotiations with Israel, would not have to take part in any talks.

The United States and Israel are skeptical about this approach. Israeli officials view the internal Palestinian negotiations as an attempt to gain renewed funding and international support without any substantive change on the part of Hamas, which is classified as a terrorist group by Israel, the United States and the European Union.

Israel collects more than $50 million a month in taxes and customs revenue for the Palestinians based on previous agreements, but began withholding the money after Hamas won the Palestinian elections in January.

The European Union also contributed sizable sums to the Palestinian Authority before Hamas came to power. The United States, meanwhile, was directing its assistance through agencies such as the United Nations and the World Bank.

Fatah officials have said they do not expect Hamas to explicitly recognize Israel. But Hamas would have to allow Mr. Abbas and others in the new government to act on the basis of existing agreements with Israel.

Mr. Abbas, widely known as Abu Mazen, held talks with Mr. Haniya in Gaza earlier this month, and Fatah officials came away believing Hamas had made such a commitment.

"Hamas agreed with Abu Mazen before he traveled" to the United States, said Maher Miqdad, a Fatah spokesman in Gaza. "While he has been away, Hamas has been making different statements to the media."

A draft platform for the new Palestinian government published this week makes no mention of Israel. The draft does not specifically renounce violence, saying that the Palestinians seek a state in all the territories captured by Israel in the 1967 war, "using all legitimate means and methods."

The program says that the new Palestinian government will "respect" previous agreements "in a manner that protects and safeguards the higher interests and the rights of the Palestinian people."

This appears to give Hamas leeway to accept agreements, or parts of agreements that it likes, while rejecting parts it opposes.

If a new Palestinian government is established, a crucial test will be winning acceptance from the quartet of Middle East peace brokers, which consists of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia.

The quartet met in New York on Wednesday and expressed support for Palestinian efforts to form the unity government "in the hope that the platform of such a government would reflect quartet principles and allow for early engagement."

In another development Friday, the border crossing between Gaza and Egypt, which has been closed for most of the past three months, reopened. Large numbers of Palestinians passed in both directions.

The Palestinians assumed control of the Rafah crossing last November, but Israel has kept it closed most days since its soldiers entered southern Gaza at the end of June, in response to the seizure of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants.

Hamas Backs Away From Unity Coalition (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Ruling Palestinian party says it won't participate in a government that would recognize Israel.

JERUSALEM — The ruling Hamas party said Friday that the radical Islamist group would not take part in a Palestinian unity government whose platform recognized Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0068168

The comments, by Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and other Hamas officials, came after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had declared in a United Nations speech that the proposed coalition with his Fatah movement would recognize Israel.

The exchange highlighted the lingering differences between the two parties despite a tentative agreement to join forces in an effort to end the West's months-long aid embargo against the Hamas-led government.

"We will not participate in any government that would recognize Israel. I can confirm that Hamas will never be part of the 'recognition government,' " Mahmoud Zahar, the foreign minister and a member of Hamas, said in Gaza City.

Haniyeh said Hamas was prepared to observe a long-term truce but not recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas would accept a Palestinian state along the borders that preceded the 1967 Middle East War — meaning one having control of the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem — he said. The latter position at times has been read to mean an implicit recognition of Israel; but Hamas leaders repeatedly have said that is not their organization's intention.

The remarks came a day after Abbas, who favors peace talks with the Israelis, had told the U.N. General Assembly that a unity government would abide by earlier agreements with Israel that call for mutual recognition and an end to violence.

Abbas said any peace talks would be left in the hands of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which he heads, and ratified by a PLO assembly or put to a vote among Palestinians.

An accord, he said, would be based on the outlines of a 2002 Arab League initiative that envisioned a two-state solution along the 1967 borders and normal ties between Israel and Arab nations.

"What we have achieved so far should be adequate to lift the oppressive siege imposed on our people and which has caused major and grave damage to our society, its standard of living and its means of growth and progress," Abbas said in the speech.

He and Haniyeh announced last week that they had agreed to form a unity government, though not on the details of its platform. The quartet of Middle East peace intermediaries — the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia — has said international aid would be renewed when the Palestinian government recognized Israel, swore off violence and agreed to honor past agreements.

The quartet said this week that it supports efforts to create a unity government and hopes the new Palestinian platform will "reflect" the three conditions.

Abbas is to resume talks with Hamas when he returns, and the back-and-forth declarations appeared to be part of that haggling. The two factions face a difficult chore: to come up with a formulation on Israel that is vague enough for Hamas but satisfactory to the international community and Israel.

The proposed platform refers to the right to a Palestinian state along the 1967 borders and to the Arab initiative — wording that could be read as tacit recognition of Israel. But the draft does not address Israel explicitly.

Haniyeh praised the 2002 initiative's call for Israel's withdrawal from territories occupied after the 1967 war and for a negotiated agreement on Palestinian refugees. But he said a truce was as far as Hamas would go for now.

"All that is nice, but not in return for recognition — in return for a truce," Haniyeh said.

Hamas' charter calls for Israel's destruction, and its leaders have consistently refused to recognize the Jewish state. The United States and European Union cut off aid after Hamas won parliamentary elections in January because they classify it as a terrorist group.

The aid cutoff has left the Palestinian treasury empty and prompted strikes by thousands of unpaid public employees. Rising public discontent has placed intense pressure on Abbas and Hamas' leaders to act soon to solve the deadlock.

The financial crisis has been aggravated by Israel's decision to withhold about $50 million in tax and customs revenues that it collects monthly on behalf of the Palestinian Authority under a 1994 agreement.

Zahar warned Abbas against dissolving the government, saying such a step could lead to civil war.

Abbas's Mission Impossible (TIME)

By Tim Mcgirk

Time, September 23, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas found out the hard way that applause and accolades for being "a man of peace" at the United Nations don't automatically win him friends back home. Just hours after Abbas raised hopes for restarting the Middle East peace process by vowing on Thursday at the U.N. General Assembly that a new Palestinian government would recognize Israel, his future coalition partners, the Islamist militants of Hamas, killed the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0068169

A Hamas senior advisor, Ahmed Yousef, bluntly said: "There won't be a national unity government (with Abbas) if Hamas is asked to recognize Israel." Hamas now leads the Palestinian government; it won the majority of votes in last January's elections, and the beleaguered president cannot get a new cabinet approved by the legislature without the support of the militants.

At the U.N., Abbas perhaps should have been more cautious. But his words were directed toward the White House, say Palestinian advisers close to him. Prior to his speech, Abbas was warned by the Bush Administration — his only protector these days — that he would risk trouble with the U.S. if he drew too close to a Hamas that refuses to recognize Israel. So, to please the White House, Abbas made a promise at the U.N. he could not keep.

And Palestinian public opinion may be behind Hamas on this issue: one of the most respected Palestinian polling organizations released findings last week showing that although 54% of Palestinians are dissatisfied with Hamas's performance in government and its share of the popular vote remains steady at 38%, a majority of 67% believe that Hamas should refuse Western demands that it recognize Israel.

Faced with the impossible gymnastics of trying to satisfy both Hamas and the Bush Administration, Abbas has few options. If he invokes his presidential powers to dissolve the current Hamas government, it could lead to anarchy and perhaps civil war among dozens of armed militias, according to worried Palestinians in Gaza and in the West Bank. Meanwhile, an economic blockade on the Palestinian territories, imposed by the international community after Hamas took office in March, has squeezed off all but a trickle of aid to millions of desperate Palestinians. Only by bringing Hamas on board in a government that recognizes the State of Israel can Abbas persuade the Bush Administration and other international donors to resume the flow of funds and supplies to keep the Palestinian administration from collapsing.

Hamas militants are willing to bend, slightly. Prime Minister Ismael Haniyeh said that while Hamas would never openly recognize Israel (the militants' credo, in fact, vows to destroy the Jewish state), Hamas would be willing to sign a truce with Israel lasting up to 10 years and honor past peace accords that Palestinians signed with Israel. While prospects for changing Hamas's position as a movement are slim, Abbas is hoping to persuade it to make a de facto gesture of recognition by joining a government that accepts previous Palestinian agreements with the Jewish state. The U.S. and Europe have made the renunciation of violence and recognition of Israel preconditions for lifting their punishing sanctions on the Palestinian territories.

Meanwhile, the situation in those territories continues to deteriorate for people like Abed, a Gaza housewife who says her husband has been without his government salary for five months. "At first we borrowed money from our relatives for food," she says. "But now they have no money. So I sold my wedding jewelry and the TV. Now, we're selling the furniture. Next, our clothes." For Abed and a million other Palestinians, the question of whether or not they should co-exist with Israel has been reduced to something far more elemental: finding a shekel or two so they can feed their family a plate of beans. -With reporting by Jamil Hamad/Bethlehem

Pope Invites Muslim Envoys For Meeting (AP)

By Frances D'emilio

AP, September 23, 2006

Pope Benedict XVI has invited Muslim envoys to meet with him at his summer residence Monday for what the Holy See says is urgently needed dialogue following the crisis ignited by his remarks on Islam and violence.

Turkey and Iran immediately said their representatives would attend.

Benedict's attempt to talk through the controversy comes as Christian-Muslim tensions rose in Indonesia over the executions of three Roman Catholic militants. Benedict had appealed to the mostly Muslim nation to spare the men.

Thousands of Muslim worshippers staged marches against Benedict in Jerusalem, the West Bank, Gaza and the Sudanese capital on Friday. The Palestinian protesters waved green Hamas banners and denounced the pontiff as a "coward" and an "agent of the Americans." But much of the Middle East was quiet.

In the West Bank city of Nablus, Palestinian police guarding a Roman Catholic church exchanged fire for 20 minutes with would-be assailants and chased them away, residents said. There were no immediate reports of injuries or damage to the shrine.

The Vatican announced the pope's invitations Friday, saying they were extended to ambassadors to the Holy See from largely Muslim countries for a meeting at the papal palace at Castel Gandolfo, near Rome.

Leaders of the Muslim community in Italy, who have advised the Italian government on politically delicate issues of Muslim integration in the largely Catholic country, also were invited.

Benedict's chief aide on inter-religious dialogue, French Cardinal Paul Poupard, also will participate.

Because of the Muslim holy day Friday, many diplomatic officials could not immediately be reached for comment. Turkey said its ambassador would attend, and Iran said its charge d'affaires would participate.

The invitation "will help clear the field of misunderstandings," Indonesia's ambassador, Bambang Prayitno, told the Apcom news agency.

DOJ_NMG_0068170

Vatican Radio described the meeting as an "appointment totally dedicated to the urgency for dialogue today, between the cultures and religions of all the world, as Benedict XVI has repeatedly reiterated."

The brief Vatican announcement made no mention of the uproar over Benedict's remarks during a Sept. 12 speech to professors at the University of Regensburg in Germany, where he used to teach theology.

During the speech, which explored the relationship between faith and reason, Benedict cited a Byzantine emperor who characterized some of the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith."

The pope told faithful at Castel Gandolfo on Sunday that he was "deeply sorry" that Muslims were offended by the words, which he said did not reflect his own opinions. Later in the week, he told pilgrims his comments were open to misinterpretation and that he had "deep respect" for Islam.

Monday's meeting with the pontiff "is an invitation that we sought," said Hamza Roberto Piccardo, who is secretary of the Union of Islamic Communities in Italy, an umbrella group for Italy's Muslims that has a reputation for radicalism.

"From the beginning we have kept a reasonable profile, we have spoken of misunderstanding, of the fact that there was no ill will by the pope toward Muslims," Piccardo told The Associated Press by telephone.

After initial efforts by the papal spokesman and then his secretary of state to make clear Benedict's regret over the interpretation of his remarks, the pope has been speaking directly about the tensions in his public appearances.

Earlier in the week, papal envoys stationed in countries with large Muslim populations met with leaders to try to placate anger.

Mario Scialoja, president of the Muslim World League in Italy, predicted Monday's encounter would help end the controversy. "The reactions have gone beyond reasonable for a phrase that was taken out of context."

While Benedict is determined to repair the damage, he is also intent on working for religious freedom for tiny Catholic communities in Muslim countries, including Saudi Arabia where Christians worship with difficulty.

"The creation of stable channels of communication between the Holy See and countries with Muslim majorities along with greater esteem can work to favor protection for Christian minorities," said Mario Marazziti, a spokesman for Sant'Egidio Community, a Catholic organization in Rome that works for inter-religious dialogue.

In largely Muslim Indonesia, Christians angered by the execution of three Catholic militants went on a rampage Friday, torching government buildings and looting Muslim-owned shops. The men were convicted of leading a Christian militia that launched attacks in 2000 that left at least 70 people dead.

Faith In Power Of Reason (FT)

By Christopher Caldwell

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

After another wave of protests on Friday, it is fair to ask what Pope Benedict XVI hoped to achieve with his lecture on “Faith, Reason and the University”, delivered in Regensburg last week. It outraged the Muslim world in a way that resembles the Danish cartoon controversy of last winter. Morocco recalled its ambassador to the Vatican, six churches were burnt in Palestine and an Italian nun was shot dead in Somalia. Equally striking, though, was that the reaction of the west did not run along expected lines. The former archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Carey, a champion of inter-religious dialogue, praised Benedict’s “extraordinarily effective and lucid” lecture; and even José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, the generally anti-clerical Spanish premier, offered his “full understanding and support”.

Benedict cited a 14th-century dialogue in which the Byzantine emperor Manuel II Palaeologos inquired of a learned Persian what was new in Islam besides the commandment to spread faith by the sword. Manuel II’s argument against conversion through violence, according to the Pope, is: “Not to act rationally is against the nature of God.” Things are different in Islam, says Benedict, in which “God is absolutely transcendent. His will is not bound to any other category, not even to rationality.” The Pope was not gloating. The choice of illustration may have been mischievous, but it was not smug. Benedict’s lecture was a lesson to Christianity, not an attack on Islam.

It is no secret that the Pope worries about Islam. He has doubted publicly that it can be accommodated in a pluralistic society. He has demoted one of John Paul II’s leading advisers on the Islamic world and tempered his support for a programme of inter-religious dialogue run by Franciscan monks at Assisi. He has embraced the view of Italian moderates and conservatives that the guiding principle of inter-religious dialogue must be reciprocità. That is, he finds it naive to permit the building of a Saudi-funded mosque, Europe’s largest, in Rome, while Muslim countries forbid the construction of churches and missions. But Benedict is not among those who sees Islam’s resurgence as a function simply of all the money Saudis are throwing around. For him, Islam’s strength comes mainly from “people’s conviction that Islam can provide a valid spiritual foundation to their lives”.

By contrast, in Without Roots, a book he wrote with Marcello Pera, the Italian politician, he points up two problems for Christianity in Europe. First, "its model for life is apparently unconvincing". Second, "it seems to have been surpassed by 'science' and to be out-of-step with the rationalism of the modern era". This scientific thinking, he warns, is often intolerant. You could say that western thinkers look on the metaphysical concerns that antedate the scientific revolution much as Islamists view the world before the time of Mohammed – as barbarous. Within Catholicism, Marxist "liberation theologists" sought not long ago to claim the church for "scientific" socialism. What the Byzantine anecdote allowed the Pope to do, quite elegantly, was to present, on the one hand, a God without rationality and, on the other, a rationality without God. Although he was setting up Christianity as the happy medium, he was not claiming it was the Christianity we have just now.

Benedict's predecessor, John Paul II, looked at the essential cleavage in the world as being between religion and unbelief. Devout Christians, Muslims and Buddhists had more in common with each other than with atheists. John Paul sought dialogue with leaders of other faiths, visited mosques and apologised for the Crusades. Benedict does not agree. He thinks that, within societies, believers and unbelievers exist in symbiosis. Secular westerners, he implies, have a lot in common with their religious fellows. The Pope refers to the mutual incomprehension between western cattolici (or believers) and laici (or secularists) as a schism – a schism "whose gravity we are only now grasping". It seems to be Benedict's top priority to heal it. If rationalism is at the root of Christianity, hyper-rationalism (secularism) is a problem specific to Christianity. It may even be a form of Christianity – one that over-emphasises what we render unto Caesar and under-emphasises what we render unto God.

The Pope has been criticised for ignoring the way Muslims live their religion as an identity, not a doctrine. But that gets things the wrong way round. Benedict seeks to strengthen, not weaken, the identitarian conception of religion. "In the times of Jesus," he writes in Without Roots, "the Jewish Diaspora was filled with 'God-fearers' who reported in varying degrees to the synagogue and who, in different ways, lived the spiritual treasure of the faith of Israel. Only a few of them wished to enter fully into the community of Israel, through circumcision, but for them it was a reference point that indicated the way to life." When Benedict argued at Regensburg for "the profound harmony between what is Greek in the best sense of the word and the Biblical understanding of faith in God," he was inviting the non-religious to avail themselves of Rome's inheritance.

It is not by accident that secular ideologies such as human rights and democratic socialism bear a resemblance to Christian ethics. They have their roots in Christian ethics, after all. Secular intellectuals should be in sympathy with the church, Benedict's thinking goes, even if they are not in communion with it. That is why he has spent so much time in public dialogue with such secular philosophers as the Italian Paolo Flores d'Arcais and the German Jürgen Habermas. That was what the Regensburg talk was about. Rather than convince secular-minded people to join the flock, he seems to be trying to convince them that they are in it already.

Paulson Ends China Visit With Little Progress But Gratified To Be Talking (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

BEIJING, Sept. 22 — Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., winding up a four-day visit to China, met Friday with President Hu Jintao and Prime Minister Wen Jiabao and said afterward that he was encouraged by their willingness to engage in a new effort to resolve economic disputes between the countries.

Mr. Paulson and his aides, many with long experience in China, said his 50-minute session with Mr. Hu and 55-minute session with Mr. Wen were highly unusual for a Treasury secretary. Mr. Paulson's predecessor, John W. Snow, met with Mr. Hu for only a couple of minutes when he was Treasury secretary.

But United States officials continued to acknowledge that the trip was ending with no signs of progress on issues like Chinese currency policy, restrictions on China's capital markets, trade disputes and the widespread piracy in China of software, movies and pharmaceuticals from the United States.

"I enjoy meetings when they are not scripted, when there is a give and take and when they are substantive," Mr. Paulson told reporters after the sessions, soon before leaving for Washington. "These two leaders knew their stuff, and there was a real discussion."

He was careful to provide few details of his talks, but his aides said that "this was a big deal," as one put it, for the meetings to have taken place and for there to have been a considerable presence from the Chinese media.

The main accomplishment of Mr. Paulson's visit, which began Tuesday, was a new strategic economic dialogue between the United States and China. But officials acknowledge that the creation of a process does not equal achievement of results.

Mr. Hu welcomed establishment of the dialogue, according to remarks reported by the official Xinhua news agency. Mr. Hu said the dialogue would serve the purpose of "making suggestions and supplying advice for high-level policy making by the two nations," Xinhua said.

Mr. Paulson summarized his visit to China as successful but said the results would not be seen until later. However, the issue has some urgency for the administration, with critics of China in Congress preparing to introduce legislation to punish the nation because of its currency practices.

The main focus of the legislative action is a bill sponsored by Senators Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, that would raise tariffs on Chinese imports by nearly 30 percent if China does not allow its currency to appreciate against the dollar. Such a shift would make exports from China more expensive and imports to China cheaper.

Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, said Mr. Paulson would speak to Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham next week to try to persuade them to pull back their bill. Both have vowed to proceed with it if Mr. Paulson did not achieve progress.

The bill is expected to be approved in the Senate but not the House. President Bush has vowed to veto it.

Mr. Paulson argues that even Senate passage would be counterproductive, making the Chinese less likely to accommodate United States interests because they might be seen as yielding to pressure.

Paulson Hails 'real Discussion' With China (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Beijing And Richard Mcgregor In Beijing

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

Meetings with Hu Jintao, China's president, and Wen Jiabao, prime minister, exceeded the expectations of Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, who said on Friday they had engaged in a "real discussion" on substantive issues.

Mr Paulson did discuss the issue of China's currency valuation directly with Mr Hu, alongside other issues including intellectual property and financial sector liberalisation.

Mr Paulson's position is that greater currency flexibility would be in China's national interest and would facilitate a long-term strategic relationship bet-ween China and the US.

He said he was "encouraged" by the meeting with Mr Hu and a separate discussion with Mr Wen in Beijing. "For me, because I think I had realistic expectations, this broke to the high side," he said.

He refused to say whether he thought China's leaders had changed their position as a result of his trip, but insisted the meetings were not formalities.

"We have all seen pre-arranged minuets," he said. "These two leaders knew their stuff and there was a real discussion."

Mr Paulson's goal for his visit – his first since leaving his post as head of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank, for the US Treasury – was to set up a process that would allow the two countries to tackle issues arising from China's growing strength as a world power, rather than to come home with a specific political or economic policy win. His chosen method was a semi-annual dialogue held between top-level officials to discuss long-term concerns.

While Mr Paulson has repeatedly warned against expecting immediate results from the talks this week, his comments could heighten market expectations that China will allow its currency to appreciate more rapidly in the months ahead. The Treasury secretary said the meetings were "substantive, unscripted and spontaneous".

The Chinese account of the meeting made no mention of the currency, which has edged up to record highs every day this week since Tuesday.

A senior administration official said Mr Paulson was "fully cognisant that he will be judged on results" and in particular on whether the new strategic economic dialogue with China he announced on Wednesday helped the two sides work through their differences.

"This is going to take a little bit of time," the official said. "But as he [Paulson] said at his press conference on Wednesday, he is not someone who is famous for being patient."

The official said the Treasury secretary would try to explain his strategy to Congress on his return home.

"We have a challenge of educating people about this," he said, adding "we are all aware there will be criticism" of Mr Paulson for returning without any specific policy commitments from the Chinese.

Mr Paulson said there were few, if any, issues on which the two sides disagreed in principle. "Where there is discussion is on the timing," he said. The US wants China to move faster towards currency flexibility and to accelerate its broader reform programme.

No previous US Treasury secretary has had a full meeting with China's president, and other meetings between Mr Hu and US leaders have tended to focus on geopolitical issues.

Clark Randt, the US ambassador, said Mr Hu was now "directly involved" in the US-China economic dialogue.

Mr Hu, who was quoted on Xinhua, China's official news agency, praised Mr Paulson for his "positive contributions to exchanges and co-operation between our two countries in the economic and financial field."

DOJ_NMG_0068173

"China will make joint efforts with the United States to expand common interests, respect and address each other's concerns to push forward the China-US constructive partnership," Mr Hu added.

Paulson To Push Senators To Drop China-Tariff Bid (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson turns this coming week from negotiating with Chinese leaders to pressing two persistent U.S. senators to back off a bill that would levy tariffs on Chinese goods to punish Beijing for its currency policies.

Senators Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) appear intent on forcing a vote this coming week on legislation to impose a 27.5% tariff on China-made goods -- if Beijing doesn't allow its currency, the yuan, to rise against the dollar. On three previous occasions, the senators have been on the brink of bringing the issue to a vote, only to step back after appeals from the Bush administration, which fears the bill could ignite a trade war.

Mr. Paulson's mission now is to convince the senators they should give the newly announced U.S.-China economic dialogue time to work. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) sees a possible compromise: kicking the bill into a lame-duck session after the Nov. 7 elections.

But the senators say they are running out of patience. Unlike the previous three episodes, this time they have made a written request to Mr. Frist for a vote next week. "We've had dialogues for years and years, and we've had no movement," Sen. Schumer said. "A dialogue is not good enough." A spokesman for Mr. Graham says he, too, is committed to pressing forward. The two lawmakers are to confer with Mr. Paulson early in the coming week.

Treasury officials say Mr. Paulson is getting unprecedented access to Chinese decision makers and needs time to make those connections work. On Friday, the secretary held talks in Beijing with top leaders -- including a session in which he and President Hu Jintao spontaneously dismissed their staffs after 30 minutes of conversation and conferred in private for 20 more.

Mr. Paulson described the Hu meeting, as well as an earlier session with Premier Wen Jiabao, as "substantive" and "unscripted." U.S. officials said the conversations touched sensitive issues ranging from China's lack of enforcement of intellectual-property rights to concerns that Beijing is keeping the value of the yuan low to give Chinese exporters an edge.

"I find it quite encouraging that there are very few issues -- I can't think of any -- where there were differences on the principles," Mr. Paulson said. "Where there are differences is on timing."

Early in his trip, Mr. Paulson suggested he might not have to persuade Congress to get on board. "I know there's a short-term mentality in the world today, but I don't think many people are going to judge me by what comes out of one visit," he said. "And if they do, heaven help this country." By the time he headed home, though, the secretary had changed his tune. "It's my job to communicate with people up on the Hill," he said. "They're clients."

A senior administration official traveling with Mr. Paulson was more blunt about the political challenge. "Any time we do anything related to China, we know that there are those groups and individuals out there who want nothing short of us coming here and taking out the baseball bat on the Chinese," the official said.

Alarmed at the prospect of a Senate vote, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the Business Roundtable are rallying opposition. Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) says passage is likely if the bill is brought up, in part because "China hasn't delivered on" on past promises.

With the elections looming, concerns about China and the economy are helping to stoke voter angst. As a result, said Business Roundtable President John J. Castellani, the tariff bill is "attractive politically" to some lawmakers. "The problem is that not always does good politics make good policy," he said.

Business lobbyists also fear some senators see the vote as a chance to send a shot across China's bow, knowing President Bush can block the measure from becoming law -- if it gets through the House, where the outlook is uncertain.

To Build Trust, U.S. Navy Holds A Drill With China (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 22 — The United States Navy reached a modest but noteworthy milestone this week when it conducted an exercise with a Chinese ship off the coast of southern California, the top American commander for the Pacific region said Friday.

The exercise, conducted Wednesday, was the first time that ships from the two navies have worked directly with each other in a search and rescue training session. In the operation, the crews of an American ship and a Chinese ship practiced how to save a third ship from fire and flooding while evacuating casualties.

The regional commander, Adm. William J. Fallon, cast the exercise as a step toward a deeper relationship he hopes to foster between the militaries. The admiral has visited China three times and said he achieved a minor breakthrough in May when the Chinese allowed him to sit in the cockpit of China's advanced FB-7 warplane.

"Frankly, from the military side we have not been very engaged with these folks in the last five years," he told a group of reporters. "We are attempting to build a new relationship to try to establish a foundation and hopefully at some level of trust."

But the American government has never been of one mind on the value of military exchanges with Beijing. The heads of the United States Pacific Command have favored establishing a channel of communication with their Chinese counterparts, figuring it would enable them to dispel misperceptions about American intentions and defuse the sort of crisis that erupted in 2001 when a Chinese fighter and an American reconnaissance plane collided off the coast of China.

But some Bush administration civilians and advisers have been far more skeptical, calculating that the principal Chinese interest is to glean what they can about American military technology and operations while withholding useful information about their own activities and budgets.

Admiral Fallon alluded to those differences.

"It isn't a clone of the Soviet Union," he said, referring to China. "However, there are institutions of our government that seem to act in a manner that has just transferred whatever we thought the Soviet Union was, and we have moved it into China and we kind of do things in the same manner, which I think is incorrect."

The exercise off the coast of California is to be followed by a more complex search and rescue exercise off the coast of China, Admiral Fallon said. But there is a long way to go to build stronger ties.

American and Chinese officials have never drafted procedures on avoiding military incidents like the 2001 episode with the reconnaissance plane.

Congress has also imposed restrictions on the scope of military exchanges, forbidding contacts that would enhance the Chinese military's combat, logistical or surveillance capabilities. Exercises involving search and rescue and humanitarian operations are exempt from the ban, and Admiral Fallon indicated that he would favor relaxing the restrictions if the Chinese demonstrated that they would be more transparent about their armed forces.

Admiral Fallon encountered the limits of the relationship in July when he tried to call his Chinese counterpart this past summer to encourage Beijing to warn North Korea not to test its long-range missiles.

"I tried to get hold of their senior leadership back in July," he said. "It was 'We will get back to you.' " The Chinese eventually responded by arranging for a statement to be read to an American official in Beijing expressing appreciation for Admiral Fallon's interest in the matter.

James Mulvenon, an expert on the Chinese military, said there was value in meeting with the Chinese to try to dispel notions that the United States was engaged in dark conspiracies against China. But he argued that establishing a high-level channel for crisis management was not possible.

"The Chinese value strategic dialogue, but we can't hope that these connections can be used in crisis," Mr. Mulvenon said. "Their system is structured differently. The counterpart of Admiral Fallon would not feel comfortable having independent communication with Pacific Command."

In the Wednesday exercise, the crew of the American destroyer Shoup worked with the crew of the Chinese destroyer Qingdao. The Swamp Fox, a torpedo recovery vessel, played the role of the ship in distress. The Qingdao and the Hongzehu, a Chinese oiler, visited San Diego as part of the exchange.

UK In Secret Deal With Italy On China Trade (FT)

By George Parker And Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

Britain has offered a secret deal to Italy under which it would back Rome's demand for punitive tariffs on cheap Chinese shoes in return for Italian support for the UK's long-hours work culture.

The classic example of European Union horse-trading has dismayed retailers, who claim a deal with Italy could force Britain to support Rome in future trade disputes with China over imports of low-price furniture and ceramics.

The fact that Britain is prepared to put aside its free-trade principles in the shoe dispute is a sign of its fear that other member states could try to axe its "opt-out" from Europe's maximum 48-hour working week when the issue is debated in November.

Britain has just enough EU member states ready to support its exemption from the working time directive – seen as a vital part of Britain's flexible labour market – but the coalition is flaky.

Romano Prodi's new centre-left government told the UK this year that Italy was withdrawing its support, leaving Tony Blair's government relying on Germany and the unstable Polish coalition as its main backers.

DOJ_NMG_0068175

The Financial Times has learnt from a number of sources that Britain is desperate to bring Mr Prodi back on board, offering to back a protectionist bloc of EU countries – led by Italy – that wants anti-dumping duties on Chinese and Vietnamese shoes.

But the proposed deal has hit a hitch: Italy has so far refused to give Britain the written assurances it wants on working hours. Communists and socialists in Mr Prodi's coalition believe the UK's working time "opt out" exploits workers and gives Britain an unfair advantage over countries where the 48-hour limit applies.

Meanwhile, Emma Bonino, the Italian trade minister, hopes to assemble the necessary majority of EU countries to support duties on Chinese shoes without Britain; yesterday Italy and other southern European countries applied pressure on Cyprus to defect from the free-trade camp.

Cyprus would make the difference.

A proposal for anti-dumping duties from Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, has left governments deadlocked, with 12 countries in favour and 13 against his plan to impose five-year duties of 16.5 per cent for leather shoes from China and 10 per cent for Vietnam.

EU ambassadors will learn next Wednesday if Italy, Spain and other shoe producers have secured a majority with or without Britain. A new agreement is needed before interim shoe duties expire on October 6.

A British spokesman declined to confirm or deny the talks with Italy. We don't comment on confidential discussions," he said.

The Footwear Association of Importers and Retail Chains said: "This case should be decided on its merits, not on desperate horse-trading, which makes the EU look ridiculous."

Hillary Clinton Stars At Husband's Meeting On World's Ills (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 23, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton made a star turn yesterday at former President Bill Clinton's conference on global challenges, calling for a concerted attack on the "feminization of poverty" to destroy political and economic barriers that trap women.

President Clinton also marked the conclusion of the three-day conference by announcing that participants had committed $7.3 billion to climate, health and antipoverty programs, and to efforts to foster ethnic and religious tolerance.

A similar conference last year, Mr. Clinton's first, raised $2.5 billion in total commitments.

While the day included remarks by former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and the media baron Rupert Murdoch, it was Mrs. Clinton who drew a standing-room-only crowd of hundreds for a session called "Women and the Power of Economic Opportunity."

That theme led to a discussion of political opportunity as well, and audience members applauded when Mrs. Clinton, a possible presidential candidate in 2008, suggested that the time would come for more women to assume high office.

(She did not mention when, however.)

In her opening remarks, the senator set the tone for the panel by lamenting that women in many countries cannot vote, run for office, or secure credit or capital to start business ventures.

"Far too many women are stuck in a cycle of poverty from which there is no escape," she said. "How do we help overcome that condition of poverty and dependence?"

Panel members said the goals and solutions for empowering women and fighting poverty were fairly obvious: With greater economic strength, women gain greater power to improve conditions for themselves and their families and to press for political reforms — in part by seeking elective office, where they can spur new laws and programs in areas like education and health.

But getting there has been a stubborn problem, Mrs. Clinton and the panel members agreed.

"Women do 66 percent of the work in the world, produce 50 percent of the food, but earn 5 percent of income and 1 percent of the property," said Ann M. Veneman, the former secretary of agriculture in President Bush's administration, who is now executive director of Unicef. "We need to convince not only governments, but major multinational corporations who do business in these countries, to help be a partner in changing conditions."

The theme of politically empowered women led to the only moment in the session when Mrs. Clinton's own political future seemed to stir the room — that is, if you ignored all the photographers snapping photos of Mrs. Clinton.

Helene Gayle, the president of CARE, the international poverty-fighting organization, echoed comments by others when she said that nations needed "more women in government to start with."

Ms. Gayle paused as Mrs. Clinton was nodding affirmatively, and several audience members laughed and applauded.

"While we're waiting for that ...," Mrs. Clinton said by way of a winking transition, and Ms. Gayle resumed.

Clinton Initiative Wins $7.3bn Pledges (FT)

By Andrew Jack

Financial Times, September 23, 2006

Former US President Bill Clinton's global initiative conference wound up in New York on Friday with 215 commitments from companies, governments and non-profit groups totalling $7.3bn, nearly three times its inaugural 2005 level.

The pledges mostly concentrated on the four themes of the fight against global warming, disease, poverty and religious conflict. They varied from Rupert Murdoch and the singer Barbra Streisand jointly backing an effort to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to a planned future summit between African women to Sir Richard Branson's $3bn promise over a decade to reinvest proceeds from his transport groups into alternative fuels.

Many of the 1,000 in attendance, including nearly 50 former and current international leaders or heads of state, were drawn from Mr Clinton's circle of acquaintances from his White House years and his more recent activities through his Clinton Foundation.

The event tried to be bipartisan, but remained political. Laura Bush, US first lady, spoke on the first day, and Mr Clinton's wife Hillary, a possible Democrat presidential contender, on the last.

Some have criticised the gathering for its glitzy "photo ops" with world leaders and telethon-style pledges backed by certificates signed by Mr Clinton, as well as a sense that many of the commitments made were repackaged, publicity-seeking or would have happened in any case.

Despite efforts to make this year's pledges more original and measurable, many remained vague. But a number of participants argued that if this was what it took to recruit or sensitise even a few more powerful fence-sitting business groups to their cause, or push them into making commitments, it was a price worth paying.

"Cynics will say we are latterday Don Quixotes," said Mr Clinton in his closing address. "But if you build me another windmill, I will tilt it."

CGI's intimate scale and public policy focus makes it arguably a more useful forum for networking, as long as it draws from beyond the circle of those already converted on the issues. Its increasing use of the internet to draw others into its "eBay of philanthropy" model could boost its potential in the future.

However, for all the policy discussions and individual initiatives, the Clinton Global Initiative has its limits. Speakers including the heads of state of Pakistan and Colombia argued that the single greatest help they could receive to fight poverty and disease and reduce tensions was highly political: market access for their goods to the US and the EU.

Europe New Memberships To Test EU Resolve (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2006

The European Union looks set to give a green light Tuesday for Romania and Bulgaria to join the bloc in January, adding 30 million more people to the union's 450 million and testing the willingness of "old" Europeans to welcome ever-poorer cousins from the East.

Reflecting public concerns over further expansion, the European Commission in May gave the two Balkan nations until this month to show progress in fighting corruption and other areas, or be kept waiting for another year. Diplomats say the Commission will recommend membership in January, but will condition the offer with fine print requiring crackdowns on corruption, illegal state aid and, in the case of Bulgaria, violent crime.

Roughly the size of Britain and with a population of 22 million, Romania is weighed down by rural poverty. Bulgaria's population of around eight million is less of a burden, but Sofia has its own set of problems, starting with recent gangland-style killings and heavy corruption. The top official for expanding the EU, Olli Rehn, has issued repeated warnings to the socialist government that took power last year that it must do better in imposing the rule of law.

Officials in Brussels say they'll disclose on Tuesday how they plan to punish Bulgaria and Romania if they don't comply with the Commission's fine print. Some analysts are skeptical, though. Subsidies to build roads and bridges and fund farmers are locked in by legally binding treaties that are difficult to change, says Michael Emerson of the Brussels-based Centre for European Policy Studies. Moreover, Hungary's economic woes and political violence during the week showed that joining the EU doesn't guarantee an end to turmoil.

The expansions also will play on sore feelings in Western Europe, where some people feel competitive heat from their new Eastern neighbors. In a recent EU poll, 55% of French citizens said they believe enlargement will "lower our standard of living."

Even the United Kingdom, one of the few countries to open up its borders to workers from the 10 countries that joined the EU in 2004, is mulling whether to use its right to block workers from Romania and Bulgaria for as long as seven years. About half a million citizens from countries brought in by the EU's last expansion, in May 2004, have since registered to work in the U.K.

Acknowledging the concerns, Romania's labor minister promised that Romanians wouldn't invade Western Europe seeking jobs in a bid to reassure voters in the big EU countries.

The EU has little choice but to let the two countries in, however. At a summit last year, the 25 member states pledged to welcome Romania and Bulgaria before 2008. Going back now would require unanimous consent, which is highly unlikely. If, as expected, the Commission recommends the two countries join in January, no further vote is needed.

Other aspirants to EU membership such as Turkey, Croatia and Serbia have no such assurances and will be watching Tuesday's Commission report closely for any signs of how hard Europe's enlargement fatigue is biting.

Effort To Join EU Loses Inertia (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The sputtering locomotive pulling Turkey toward Europe is losing steam amid signs of increasing problems in Turkey's talks to join the 25-nation European Union.

In an effort to stave off a major crisis, the European Union has postponed by a month its much-awaited report on Turkey's accession progress. The idea, according to diplomats, is to "give diplomacy another chance" despite negative signals from Ankara and Brussels.

The tangle of issues involves what the European Union considers to be inadequate human rights progress in Turkey and its refusal to open its ports and airports to Greek Cypriot traffic despite a binding trade convention.

The apparent hardening of Turkey's attitude in the face of EU demands has caused a series of crisis forecasts and predictions of a "train wreck" in Turkey's path toward Europe.

While compromise on some of Turkey's laws dealing with women and minority rights still appears possible, diplomats say there is little hope that Turkey will recognize the Greek Cypriot government without concessions to the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, an entity recognized only by Turkey.

"Nobody should expect Ankara to open its airports and harbors to the Greek Cypriots unless the isolation of the Turkish Cypriots is ended," Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said recently.

Turkey's refusal to compromise on the Cyprus issue has revived Greek Cypriot calls to veto its EU application, although at present the Cypriot government considers such a gesture as extreme.

Cyprus joined the European Union two years ago but without the Turkish Cypriot part of the island. Some EU member countries asserted at the time that the "European Club" should not have admitted a fractured country with an unsolved problem likely to weigh heavily upon Europe.

Turkey says the overwhelming Turkish Cypriot approval of a United Nations plan to unite Cyprus in a referendum was a major concession. The plan was rejected by the Greek Cypriots.

A special EU negotiating team is to visit Turkey in October to discuss its admission credentials a year after accession talks started.

There is growing concern in Europe that the bloc may encounter serious problems in digesting, economically and politically, the number of countries anxious to join it. Turkey has complained that its application has been subjected to inordinately demanding scrutiny compared with that of other recently admitted countries.

Remaining U.S. Soldiers To Vacate Tuzla Area (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The United States will pull its last 150 soldiers out of Bosnia-Herzegovina by December, a U.S. general said.

The troops of Eagle Base near Tuzla are all that remains of the 38,000-member force that deployed as part of a NATO-led peace mission in late 1995. A European Union force of about 6,000 assumed peacekeeping duties two years ago.

The United States has about 1,600 troops stationed close by in Serbia's U.N.-run province of Kosovo. About 100 mostly U.S. intelligence officers will remain in Bosnia attached to NATO headquarters in Sarajevo, the capital.

U.S. Doubts Moscow On Energy (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068178

The State Department yesterday sharply criticized a recent move by the Russian government to curb a major Western oil-and-gas-investment project in Siberia, saying it put in doubt Moscow's willingness to honor major energy deals with foreign investors.

Spokesman Tom Casey said the Bush administration was "very concerned" by a Russian government move earlier this week to revoke the environmental permits for a $20 billion liquefied natural gas project being developed by the Royal Dutch Shell Group and two Japanese investment houses on Sakhalin Island.

Analysts fear revoking the environmental permit could be tantamount to killing the deal or forcing the international partners to sell out.

"Frankly, these actions cast doubt on Russia's willingness to uphold its recent commitments that were made by all the G-8 countries at the St. Petersburg summit," Mr. Casey said.

Those commitments, he added, included a pledge to develop "transparent and efficient global energy markets," as well as "specific obligations to uphold contracts."

Officials at the Russian natural resources ministry yesterday raised fresh questions about a second Sakhalin project being developed by U.S.-based Exxon Mobil Corp., complaining the rising company estimates of the cost of the project were cutting into Moscow's promised share of the returns.

Mr. Casey said the U.S. government was not aware of any action against the Exxon Mobil project, but that the actions taken against the Dutch-led project, the largest single foreign investment in Russia, were worrisome.

The commercial dispute comes against a backdrop of alarm in the United States, Europe and Japan that Russia under President Vladimir Putin is increasingly ready to use its clout as a global energy superpower to further its commercial and diplomatic interests.

Western European countries faced a brief supply scare at the beginning of the year when Russia's state-controlled oil company cut off supplies of natural gas to neighboring Ukraine in a bitter pricing dispute. Many suspect that Gazprom is angling to control the network of pipelines supplying natural gas to Europe.

Exxon Mobil, Royal Dutch Shell and the French energy company Total SA won contracts to develop three huge oil and natural gas fields in the Russian Far East in the 1990s, before the Kremlin under Mr. Putin began a concerted effort to reassert state control of the country's vast energy resources.

Mr. Casey's remarks followed similar criticism this week of the Russian action against the Shell project from the European Union and the governments of Britain, Japan and the Netherlands.

Mr. Putin is in Paris today for a summit with French President Jacques Chirac and German Chancellor Angela Merkel. The meeting will include talks on Russia's energy policy toward Europe and Russian hopes to expand its investment in EADS, the European aerospace consortium.

Panamanians Likely To OK Canal's Expansion Project (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

Polls show growing support for a 5-year government plan facing voters next month. The upgrades could ease traffic at L.A.-area ports.

PANAMA CITY — Support is building among voters for expansion of the Panama Canal, a five-year, $5.2-billion project that could ease overcrowding at the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex.

Recent polls show that support for the plan, which goes to a nationwide vote Oct. 22, is at nearly two-thirds of those intending to cast ballots. Approval has risen 6 percentage points in the last month, and some say the public has put aside initial fears that graft and indebtedness could swamp the nation's most important resource and symbol.

"It's our Statue of Liberty and Golden Gate Bridge all in one," said pollster Leopoldo Neira. His firm published an opinion survey in the local La Prensa newspaper Sunday that showed yes votes among probable voters outnumbered noes 63% to 33%.

The wild card is the generally negative results of past Panamanian plebiscites, Neira said, a reflection of ingrained public distrust of the government. Still, he believes only a major scandal tainting the government of President Martin Torrijos could scuttle prospective passage of the measure.

"The expansion is not for our benefit but for that of our children and our children's children," said Panama City taxi driver Mauricio Reyes, who said he expected business to improve with the expansion.

The quasi-independent Panama Canal Authority, which runs the waterway and would manage the expansion, said Thursday that the canal was on track to generate about $1.4 billion in revenue this year, 15% more than last year, a reflection of increasing global trade. One of the fastest-growing segments of this commerce is cargo going between Asia and the U.S. East Coast, some of which uses the Panama Canal.

The expansion would ostensibly slow the traffic growth at the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex. There, much Chinese and other Asian cargo headed for the U.S. East Coast is offloaded or transferred to other ships, because many of the Asian cargo boats cannot fit through the Panama Canal.

The Torrijos government has touted the supposed benefits in jobs and revenue for social projects from expanding the 51-mile canal, while warning of the risks of doing nothing.

Those risks include the possibility that Mexico or other Central American countries could build competing canals or port-highway complexes to move the accelerating flow of worldwide freight. Government officials in Chile and El Salvador have been quoted recently as saying a rejection of the canal expansion would lead to the development of alternative cargo routes.

Neira said three-quarters of Panama's population believes the government is corrupt, and a significant portion expects expansion costs to outstrip the projected amount, possibly piling up debt that would spoil the nation's healthy finances.

In response, the Torrijos government has promised transparency in the bidding process, with contracts of $10,000 or more subject to a public bid. As for cost overruns, officials say the $5.2-billion figure includes a possible $1-billion overrun plus 10% annual inflation. The administration is promising Panamanians they are not at risk, that canal customers would shoulder the expansion cost with their tolls.

The expansion as proposed would include a new locks to accommodate so-called post-Panamax container ships capable of carrying up to 8,000 metal freight containers, twice the canal's current per-ship capacity.

Ruben Carles, a former controller general and one of several onetime government officials who have expressed concerns over the transparency of the project's finances, said in a telephone interview Thursday that he was confident that the government would "render accounts" as the expansion proceeds and that he supported the expansion.

Former Vice President Ricardo Arias Calderon said in an interview, "It will be historical suicide to not widen the canal."

Even those still opposed concede that the yes votes are likely to win by a comfortable margin.

"Yes could win 2 to 1," said one attorney close to the opposition, who asked not to be named.

Confident of victory, the government is going ahead with plans for a $50-million network of 35 technical schools to train skilled workers needed for the expansion. Although the canal construction would employ no more than 7,000 workers, Torrijos is promising an enormous "multiplier effect" of indirect jobs from the project and expanded canal.

India's Looming Talent Shortage (LAT)

By Henry Chu, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2006

The country may be churning out engineers by the hundreds of thousands each year, but their qualifications are in question.

CHENNAI, India — From his perch atop one of India's most successful software companies, Lakshmi Narayanan sees a potential storm brewing.

His firm and others like it have had little trouble finding first-rate engineering graduates for entry-level jobs, capable young men and women lured by the glamour of cutting-edge work and generous salaries.

But a shortage of talent is looming that could put a dent in India's reputation as the world's information-technology outsourcing champion. Three or four years from now, Narayanan and others forecast, qualified engineers in India are going to be at a premium as companies like his vie for their services to sustain the industry's remarkable growth.

"Clearly there's going to be a challenge," said Narayanan, the president and chief executive of Cognizant Technology Solutions Corp., which produces business system software for such clients as Wells Fargo & Co., Aetna Inc. and ACNielsen.

The imminent dearth of talent may come as a surprise to observers in the West, where India is popularly perceived as an engineer factory, churning out every year hundreds of thousands of well-trained, highly motivated, low-cost professionals who are ready to join the country's growing army of technology workers.

To hear many American officials, academics and business leaders tell it, the huge number of engineers produced by Asia's developing giants, India and China, poses a major threat to American competitiveness at home and abroad.

But talk to executives here, as well as experts in the field, and a different story emerges. The problem, they say, is not quantity. It's quality.

At high-tech firms across India, hiring managers must comb through mounds of applications to find suitable candidates. A report by the McKinsey Global Institute last year estimated that only 25% of Indian engineering graduates were employable by multinational companies. Some executives here are even more critical, putting the figure at 10%.

DOJ_NMG_0068180

For China, only 1 out of 10 graduates had the skills necessary to join an international firm, the study said. "You need to be technically skilled. You need to speak good English. You need to understand cross-cultures. The expectations are growing," Narayanan said. "It's no longer good enough just to be a good engineer."

Established players like Cognizant enjoy some advantage in that they can pick the cream of the crop; jobs at the big firms are highly coveted.

But Cognizant and other industry leaders such as IBM Corp. have had to invest heavily in training in India, building entire campuses devoted to molding recruits and filling in the gaps in their education, particularly with regard to so-called soft skills and managerial know-how.

Infosys Technologies Ltd., for example, recently announced that it was investing $176 million in its Global Education Center at the company's complex in Mysore to triple the number of trainees the center could accommodate in a single sitting, to 13,500 from 4,500.

"These are very bright kids — the basic intelligence is available," Narayanan said in an interview in his office here in Chennai, the southern Indian city formerly known as Madras. "The only question is shaping them into what the industry requires."

The looming squeeze in the supply of qualified engineers in India is starkly at odds with widely quoted statistics in the U.S., which have assumed almost totemic status in the debate over the future of American dominance in the high-tech marketplace.

According to these figures, India graduates 350,000 engineers a year, China 600,000 and the U.S. a mere 70,000.

Officials such as U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, influential media outlets such as Fortune magazine and the National Academies' Committee on Science, Engineering and Public Policy have all cited those numbers to warn of a gathering threat to American scientific and technological preeminence.

But the origin of the statistics is murky. And recent research suggests that they are, in fact, wrong.

In December, Duke University researchers found that when comparing the number of students earning degrees from accredited four-year programs in engineering, computer science and information technology, the U.S. remained in a strong position, with about 137,000 in 2004. India had 112,000.

China graduated about 352,000, but that figure, based on less directly comparable data, could well include "the equivalent of motor mechanics and industrial technicians," the study said.

For India, the problem is twofold, experts say. Access to higher education has historically been restricted to a tiny fraction of the population. And while trying to widen that bottleneck, many of the start-up institutions offering engineering courses are of dubious quality.

"The country that's in the deepest trouble now as far as education goes is India. China has gotten its act together; the U.S. has already had its act together. It's India that's going to be facing severe challenges," said Vivek Wadhwa, a coauthor of the Duke study. "The number of graduates that they're churning out is not keeping up with economic growth. If the country wants to grow at 7% to 8%, they simply don't have the number of graduates to sustain that."

When spread over their respective populations, the pool of engineers stretches extremely thin in India and China, which together account for one-third of all humankind.

The scarcity of engineers holds ramifications not just for the vaunted high-tech sector but also for issues of basic development. In New Delhi, for instance, municipal officials have warned of a massive shortage of engineers to oversee public works in a country whose infrastructure is notoriously bad.

Though China and India are working hard to increase their share of top-notch engineers, that should not be the focus in the U.S., despite widespread hand-wringing by some officials and educators, Wadhwa said.

"Because India and China have greater numbers, we think we have to have greater numbers too. But we'll never match them in numbers. We can't compete on their turf, which is quantity," Wadhwa said. "We need to make them compete on our turf, which is quality. Yes, they have more numbers. Of course they do. Between them they have 2 1/2 billion people. Yes, they graduate more engineers. They graduate more dentists, and they have more shopkeepers too."

In some ways, India is a victim of its own success over the last decade in the IT world.

Stories of Indian entrepreneurs made good in Silicon Valley, of the meteoric rise of homegrown companies such as Wipro Ltd., have made engineering jobs more attractive than ever and encouraged more young people to pursue engineering degrees.

Graduates from the seven prestigious IITs, Indian Institutes of Technology, hold their own against those from Caltech or the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. But they represent only a small portion — about 3,000 graduates a year — of the talent pool. From there, the drop in quality is steep, experts say. Many of the private engineering colleges and other programs that have proliferated in recent years do not reach anywhere close to the standard of the IITs.

Prasad Krishna, head of quality assurance at the All India Council for Technical Education, which oversees engineering programs, said his staff had found it difficult to keep up with all the new schools. Currently, India boasts 1,475 approved engineering programs.

"There are many institutions running programs not approved by the council," Krishna said. "Some of these fly-by-night operators should be checked."

Industry insiders express grave concern about the quality of teaching in India's engineering schools. Many of India's best and brightest opt for the private sector, where they earn far larger salaries than they would as professors.

To ease those deficiencies, and to help guarantee their own survival in a competitive labor market, companies are increasingly joining up with colleges and universities to strengthen faculties and to sharpen students' communication and leadership skills. A number of "finishing schools" have also sprung up to equip graduates to enter the workforce.

"Today we have to not only [improve] quantity substantially; we also need to improve quality substantially. And there is a problem in doing both together," said Sam Pitroda, a member of India's Knowledge Commission, a body appointed by the prime minister.

Narayanan of Cognizant is hopeful that the impending shortage of qualified engineers will be temporary, lasting several years at the most, until some of the initiatives to increase supply start bearing fruit.

"People have recognized the problem early enough," he said, "and everyone is talking about it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Praises Afghan, Pakistani Allies (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

President Bush, playing middleman next week between sometimes-sparring neighbors Afghanistan and Pakistan, praised the U.S. allies Saturday for their work in defeating terrorism under difficult circumstances.

Bush met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the White House on Friday and has talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai scheduled for Tuesday. The next day, Bush hosts a meeting in the Oval Office with both presidents, followed by a working dinner.

The unusual set of meetings has two aims. One is placating the concerns of Pakistan, whose alliance with the U.S. in the war on terror causes domestic problems for Musharraf. The other is soothing the struggling democratic government in Afghanistan, which is suffering its heaviest insurgent threat since U.S.-led troops toppled the Taliban in late 2001.

"This will mark the second time in a few weeks that President Karzai and President Musharraf have also met together, and that's an important thing," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "So anything we can do to support them in their efforts to conduct as aggressively and effectively as possible the war on terror, we're going to do what we can to assist them."

In his weekly radio address, Bush complimented Musharraf for "siding with the forces of freedom and moderation and helping to defend the civilized world." As for Afghanistan, Bush said on the radio that Karzai is continuing "the work of building a safer and brighter future for his nation."

Musharraf and Karzai met in Kabul earlier this month and pledged to jointly fight militants.

With Pakistan, the United States has urged Musharraf to do more to stop militants from crossing from Pakistan's tribal regions into Afghanistan and fanning the violence by Taliban extremists. Afghan leaders say remnants of the Taliban have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border, while Pakistan rejects the charges.

Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border and signed a truce this month with tribal figures in an area where bin Laden is believed to be hiding. Musharraf said the truce calls for no al-Qaida or Taliban activity.

Some Afghan officials have labeled the truce as a deal with the Taliban. Musharraf strongly rejected that at Bush's side in the East Room after their meeting Friday. "This is against the Taliban, actually," Musharraf said.

Bush said he takes Musharraf at his word. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaida, I believe him," he said.

There was some dispute around the Bush-Musharraf meeting as to how Pakistan's decision to join the war on terror was made.

Musharraf told CBS' "60 Minutes" that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage told Pakistan's intelligence director right after the Sept. 11 attacks that the United States would bomb the country if it didn't become a partner in the war against terrorism. Bush said Friday he first learned of the purported conversation from news reports.

"I just don't know about it," he said. "I guess I was taken aback by the harshness of the words."

Musharraf declined to comment further, citing a book deal. Armitage said he never threatened a military strike but did tell Pakistan firmly that "you are either for us or against us."

Bush Lauds Cooperation Of Karzai, Musharraf In War On Terrorism (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, September 24, 2006

Sept. 23 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said talks next week with the ``courageous" leaders of Pakistan and Afghanistan will show support for two key allies in the effort to marginalize extremists and fight terrorism.

Bush, who met yesterday at the White House with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, is scheduled to meet with Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai Sept. 27 in Washington. Bush is seeking assurances that the two leaders won't let militant Islamic Taliban and al-Qaeda forces regroup or hide in the mountainous border region that divides the two countries.

``Under President Musharraf, Pakistan is siding with the forces of freedom and moderation and helping to defend the civilized world," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. ``It is in America's interest to help him succeed."

Working with Karzai, ``we will defeat the enemies of a free Afghanistan and help the Afghan people build a nation that will never again oppress them or be a safe haven for terrorists," Bush said.

It was the sixth week in the past seven that Bush has made the war on terrorism the subject of his radio address, which capped a week of meetings at the United Nations and with Musharraf in Washington. Yesterday, Musharraf appeared with Bush at the White House, seeking to reassure the U.S. he is doing everything possible to fight terrorism and saying a recent treaty with Pakistani tribal leaders will deny refuge to Taliban fighters.

Pakistani Border

Musharraf has deployed about 90,000 troops along Pakistan's mountainous 1,500-mile border. The U.S. has 21,000 troops in Afghanistan, most of them in bases along the border and operating separately from a North Atlantic Treaty Organization force of about 20,0000 that is seeking to restore order within the country.

Taliban fighters have increased attacks in Afghanistan after Afghan and international forces expanded operations to the south and east. UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said two days ago that the violence in recent months poses the gravest threat to achieving peace in Afghanistan since the Taliban regime was ousted by U.S.-led forces in 2001.

November Elections

Bush's focus in the past month on national security and terrorism threats, centered on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., gave him a measurable boost in public support a month and a half before the congressional elections. The president's job approval rating rose to 45 percent in a Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll, a jump of 5 percentage points since July, according to the survey of 1,517 adults Sept. 16-19.

Support for Bush's handling of the war in Iraq rose 2 percentage points, to 40 percent, from the last poll. Most Americans, 56 percent, said they don't believe Bush when he says the U.S. military is making a lot of progress in turning Iraq into a safe, democratic country.

Almost 6,600 Iraqi civilians died in sectarian violence and insurgent attacks in July and August, according to a UN report earlier this week that blamed Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government and U.S. training of Iraqi security forces.

In the radio speech, Bush said, ``America will not abandon the Iraqi people in their struggle to defeat the terrorists and build a free society in the heart of the Middle East."

He also repeated his support for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

``By supporting moderate leaders such as President Abbas, the United States can help Israelis and Palestinians build a more hopeful future and achieve the peace we all want in the Holy Land," Bush said. ``We can support the moderates and reformers working for change across the broader Middle East, or we can yield the future to the terrorists and extremists."

Musharraf Visits N. Texas (DMN)

By Paul Meyer And James Ragland, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 23, 2006

Drive to Highland Park follows medical check-up in Paris

After a volatile week of high-level meetings in New York and Washington, Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf said Saturday in Highland Park that his trip has helped "clear certain misperceptions" about Pakistan's role in the war on terror.

Speaking in an exclusive interview with The Dallas Morning News, Gen. Musharraf reiterated his commitment to hunt down Osama bin Laden, and said he could not confirm reports that the al-Qaeda leader died last month of typhoid in Pakistan.

The general said he was aware of a French intelligence report of Mr. bin Laden's death, but could not comment on its details.

Gen. Musharraf spoke by phone during an unannounced trip to Texas on Saturday to undergo routine medical tests and visit with a personal physician.

He arrived at Paris (Texas) Regional Medical Center in the late morning for a checkup with cardiologist Arjumand Hashmi. Hospital officials said Gen. Musharraf was "found to be in excellent health."

After the president had his checkup, he attended a lunch in Paris before departing for Dallas. Later, he visited the doctor's Highland Park home.

"This is a beautiful place you have here," he said of his first visit to Texas.

Dr. Hashmi said he was simply "meeting an old friend" when asked about the high-profile patient on Friday.

"It's a private visit," he said "There's nothing to it."

The trip came on the eve of the broadcast of a CBS 60 Minutes interview in which Gen. Musharraf contends that the U.S. threatened to bomb the country "back to the Stone Age" if it refused to cooperate in the war on terror after the 9/11 attacks.

The Pakistani leader said he planned to watch the interview tonight in New York.

"The perception of Pakistan is to the better," he said of his trip to America. "We explained our point of view effectively."

In both Paris and Highland Park, the cloak-and-dagger visit generated a buzz in two normally sedate small towns.

A motorcade of more than two dozen cars, including state trooper vehicles, Secret Service cars and a Paris hospital ambulance made the trip from Dallas to Paris mid-morning.

Phillip Hamilton, managing editor of The Paris News, said that about 20 people, including at least one other Paris physician, were at the house and dined with Gen. Musharraf.

He said the Pakistani president stood up to say goodbye shortly before 3 p.m..

"I asked him how his visit went yesterday [with President Bush], and he said it was extremely positive," Mr. Hamilton said. "And I asked him about the Stone Age comment, and he said he can't comment on that" because the general promised his book publishers not to do so before the release of his memoir on Monday.

Dr. Hashmi's family is leasing their Highland Park home from Dallas author Jane Wolfe, who recently relocated to France.

Reached at her home in Paris, France, Ms. Wolfe said, "I never envisioned the house being used for a state visit but I am certainly delighted. I got a frantic phone call on Friday that the water heater had broken. Dr. Hashmi was so nice, he said, 'I am having guests for the weekend, but we can get by without hot water.' "

The water heater was promptly repaired.

Ambassador To Simon & Schuster (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The Pakistani president's refusal to discuss an allegation in his upcoming autobiography spells trouble for diplomacy?

NEWS FLASH: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT Pervez Musharraf accuses a senior Bush administration official of threatening to bomb his country back to the Stone Age! We'll get on with this potentially serious diplomatic incident in a moment — but first, a word from our sponsor, Simon & Schuster.

That was the gist of an odd commercial break in Friday's news conference by Musharraf and President Bush. The somewhat embarrassing love fest between the two leaders was moving along smoothly when a reporter asked about the explosive allegation scheduled to be broadcast tonight on CBS' "60 Minutes": In the wake of 9/11, Musharraf claims, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage threatened that the U.S. would bomb Pakistan unless it cooperated in the war on terror.

"I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honor-bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book before that day," Musharraf replied.

"In other words, buy the book, is what he's saying," Bush helpfully translated.

International diplomacy has always been dependent on external factors, but it has seldom hinged on the terms of a book contract. At a time when the developing world is protesting what it sees as U.S. unilateralism and bullying — as evidenced by the stark anti-American speeches (and their friendly reception) at last week's annual United Nations General Assembly session — Musharraf's claim threw gasoline on the bonfire. Yet rather than discuss and help resolve the matter during his U.S. visit, Musharraf decided instead simply to plug his upcoming autobiography.

Of course, there might be more behind Musharraf's reticence than a shameless ploy to sell books. Pakistan's president is in a very difficult jam.

Bush, Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai are slated to dine together Wednesday, and security issues will doubtless dominate the agenda. The fighting in Afghanistan has grown more intense than any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001, largely because militants trained and armed in Pakistan are freely crossing the border. Rather than crack down, Musharraf in early September signed a truce that essentially guaranteed free rein for the extremists. Karzai is rightfully angry, and Bush has ample reason to side with him. Not only is the Afghan violence harming U.S. troops, but key Al Qaeda figures, including Osama bin Laden, are believed to be hiding out in Pakistan. Yet Musharraf's soon-to-be-released claims of a threatened bomb attack will make it politically difficult for Bush to exert any real pressure.

So maybe diplomacy and book publishing aren't that different after all. In both, timing is everything.

French Paper Cites Intelligence Document

PARIS, Sept. 23 -- French and U.S. officials discounted a report Saturday in a French newspaper indicating that Osama bin Laden had died of typhoid last month in a remote area of Pakistan.

The newspaper, L'Est Republicain, quoted a confidential document from the French secret service as saying that "according to a reliable source, Saudi security services are now convinced that Osama bin Laden is dead."

The newspaper reported that intelligence officials had given the document, dated Sept. 21, to President Jacques Chirac, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and the interior and defense ministers.

A senior French official acknowledged the existence of the document, but Chirac said at a news conference Saturday that there was no confirmation that the leader of the al-Qaeda terror network had died.

U.S. intelligence sources also cast serious doubt on the report, saying there was no information to support its claims.

Saudi Arabia's Interior Ministry offered no details. "I've heard the reports, but I have no information at all. I have no idea," a spokesman, Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki, told the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0068189

Senior government officials in Pakistan and U.S. diplomats there and in Afghanistan said they were not aware of any Saudi intelligence reports indicating that bin Laden may have died, news services reported.

The French defense minister, Michele Alliot-Marie, has ordered an investigation into the leak of the document.

"The report cited this morning by the newspaper L'Est Republicain related to the supposed death of Osama bin Laden cannot be confirmed," the Defense Ministry said in a statement. "The minister of defense has ordered an investigation to determine the origin of this leak, which is likely to constitute an offense subject to penal sanctions."

According to L'Est Republicain, the French intelligence report said: "Information gathered by the Saudis indicates that the head of al-Qaeda was a victim while he was in Pakistan on Aug. 23, 2006, of a very serious case of typhoid, which led to a partial paralysis of his internal organs."

Typhoid is a bacterial disease that can be spread in food or drink handled by a carrier or through contaminated sewage.

The newspaper said that, according to the document, the remoteness of the area where the alleged illness occurred would have made any medical treatment impossible. The report said Saudi officials were awaiting further confirmation, particularly the exact place of bin Laden's burial, before announcing his death.

Bin Laden, born in Saudi Arabia, is believed to be hiding in the remote areas along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, where he has used the rugged terrain and sympathetic locals to evade capture.

U.S. and Pakistani officials have said recently that they had not received a credible lead on his whereabouts in more than two years.

No Confirmation On An Article Announcing Bin Laden's Death (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 23 — French officials said Saturday that the government could not confirm intelligence information published in a French newspaper that the terrorist leader Osama bin Laden died in Pakistan last month.

On Saturday, the newspaper, L'Est Républicain, quoted an internal memorandum from France's foreign intelligence service, the D.G.S.E., as saying, "Saudi intelligence services seem to be sure that Osama bin Laden is dead. The elements gathered by the Saudis indicate that the head of Al Qaeda was the victim, while he was in Pakistan on Aug. 23, 2006, of a strong case of typhoid fever that led to a partial paralysis of his lower limbs."

A senior French intelligence official confirmed that the document was authentic but said the information was "absolutely, absolutely not verified." The official said the memorandum had been sent to the president, prime minister and some ministries as a regular report on terrorism-related intelligence traffic.

President Jacques Chirac responded to questions from reporters by saying, "This information is in no way confirmed, in no way whatsoever, and I have no comment to make about it." The defense ministry, which oversees the D.G.S.E., said it would investigate how the memorandum had been leaked.

In Washington, an American intelligence official expressed strong doubt about the report, which he noted was not the first rumor of Mr. bin Laden's death. "We can't confirm this," said the official, who discussed the matter only on condition of anonymity. "I think it ought to be treated with a great deal of skepticism."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said he could not confirm news reports of Mr. bin Laden's death.

According to the report, the French memorandum said the Saudis first heard Sept. 4 that Mr. bin Laden had died, but were awaiting further details, including the location of the body, to announce the news. The information was passed from Saudi Arabia by a non-Saudi who had proved reliable in the past, said the French intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Saudi Interior Ministry was not available for comment on Saturday, the first day of Ramadan.

Pierre Taribo, the editor in chief of L'Est Républicain, a regional daily, defended his newspaper's decision to publish the unconfirmed memorandum. "It's a note that exists, and from this point on we consider that we did our job, which is to inform," he said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0068190

Several reports of Mr. bin Laden's death have surfaced since he went into hiding in 2001. His last confirmed videotaped message was released in late 2004; several audio tapes attributed to him have been released this year.

Officials Skeptical About Report Bin Laden Is Dead (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS — A leaked French intelligence memo reporting that Osama bin Laden had died of illness last month caused a flurry of speculation Saturday, but skeptical French, U.S. and Arab officials said they had no information confirming the report.

French President Jacques Chirac told journalists the intelligence report had "by no means been confirmed, not whatsoever." And a French security official cautioned that the memo was based on uncorroborated intelligence from a single source.

"We are not confirming whatever has been said in this report because we consider it a source among other sources," said the French security official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Our services, like others around the world, don't use just one source for reaching such a conclusion, they need multiple sources. We don't think this is a reliable report at this stage."

The latest rumblings about the elusive Al Qaeda leader came from an unlikely source: a small regional newspaper. L'Est Republicain, based in the eastern city of Nancy, published an article Saturday along with a copy of a confidential Sept. 21 memo from France's foreign intelligence agency, which is overseen by the Defense Ministry and known by the initials DGSE.

The memo informed the president's office and the defense minister that Saudi intelligence had "become convinced" that Bin Laden was dead, according to the newspaper.

"The data gathered by the Saudis indicates that the chief of Al Qaeda would have been a victim, while in Pakistan on August 23, 2006, of a very strong attack of typhoid," the intelligence memo said, according to the paper. "His geographic isolation, caused by his permanent fugitive status, made any medical care impossible. On Sept. 4, the Saudi security services obtained the first intelligence about his death."

As in Paris, the response in Washington was skeptical and cautious. "We don't have any confirmation of that report," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

Two U.S. intelligence officials and a senior official of an Arab country also tracking Bin Laden said much the same thing.

The officials were slightly less skeptical about the possibility that Bin Laden was gravely ill. For years, Bin Laden has been rumored to be suffering from a debilitating kidney disease, perhaps requiring dialysis.

"We've been down this road many times before, and there is no reason to think that this one has any more credence than the others," the U.S. intelligence official said.

Bin Laden was last seen in a videotape released in 2004. His voice was last heard in an audiotape released June 29, in which he mourned the slaying by U.S. forces of Abu Musab Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's kingpin in Iraq.

Spy agencies have not detected any "chatter" among Al Qaeda operatives or other traditional indicators of a momentous event such as Bin Laden's death, officials said.

Despite the reservations about its contents, French officials did not question the authenticity of the memo. Chirac said he had ordered an internal investigation of the leak.

French officials said DGSE has good sources in the Arab world, and the Saudis know a lot about Bin Laden, a Saudi native.

But U.S. and Pakistani intelligence services probably would have better information because they are leading the hunt for Bin Laden, a top French anti-terrorism official said. He said he was not aware of any increased talk among international counter-terrorism officials.

"The Pakistanis and the Americans would be more likely to have confirmed it by now," the official said.

The Arab official was equally skeptical. "If he died a month ago you couldn't keep it a secret for two days," the official said. "You'd have to bury the body quickly, and there would be a buzz all over the place, on the Internet and everywhere else."

If the Saudi government had received hard information about Bin Laden's death or imminent death, it would have gone immediately to a U.S.-Saudi counter-terrorism center in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, officials said. From there, it would have been sent to Washington within hours, the officials said, adding that no such referrals have taken place.

Intelligence officials are trying to monitor Al Qaeda operatives in Pakistan and Afghanistan that compose the network's brain trust, as well as associates worldwide with whom they are most likely to communicate such news about Bin Laden.

"What effect would his death or impending death have on the movement? Will there be a race to see who picks up his mantle? Does [second-in-command] Ayman Zawahiri step into his shoes, or someone else? Would the organization be more fragmented, or less, as his senior associates consolidate? Will recruiting spike, or decline?" said a second U.S. intelligence official, an Al Qaeda expert.

Bin Laden's death by a serious illness such as typhoid probably would make him as much a martyr in the eyes of Al Qaeda members as being killed in battle, the second official said.

"They would say that Allah has brought this great leader to his reward," the official said. "That he died a natural death after escaping the biggest manhunt in the world, and without suffering the indignities of being killed or injured by the infidels."

Bin Laden Death Report Doubted (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS -- A leaked French intelligence document raises the possibility Osama bin Laden died of typhoid, but President Jacques Chirac said yesterday the report was "in no way whatsoever confirmed" and officials from Kabul to Washington expressed skepticism about its accuracy.

There have been numerous reports over the years that bin Laden had been killed or that he was dangerously ill, but the al Qaeda leader has periodically released audiotapes appealing to followers and commenting on current news events.

The regional French newspaper L'Est Republicain printed what it described as a copy of a confidential document from the DGSE intelligence service citing an uncorroborated report from a "usually reliable source" who said Saudi secret services were convinced that bin Laden had died.

The document, dated Thursday, was sent to Mr. Chirac and other top French officials, the newspaper said.

"This information is in no way whatsoever confirmed," Mr. Chirac said when asked about the document. "I have no comment."

Last night, the Saudi Embassy in Washington issued a statement saying, "The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has no evidence to support recent media reports that Osama bin Laden is dead," according to Agence France-Presse. "Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had "no comment and no knowledge" about the report, while presidential spokesman Blair Jones said the White House could not confirm the report's accuracy.

But two U.S. intelligence officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said U.S. agencies had no information to suggest bin Laden was dead or dying.

A senior official in Afghanistan's Foreign Ministry said he was very skeptical of the document, noting past false reports of the death of bin Laden. He declined to let his name be used because he was not authorized to discuss the issue publicly.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, called the information "speculative," saying her government had no information on bin Laden.

Many people suspect bin Laden and other al Qaeda leaders are hiding in the mountains in Pakistan along the border with Afghanistan.

Among previous reports, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said during the U.S.-led offensive that toppled Afghanistan's Taliban regime in late 2001 that he was "reasonably sure" bin Laden had been killed by U.S. bombing raids on the Tora Bora caves.

DOJ_NMG_0068192

The Washington-based IntelCenter, which monitors terrorism communications, said it was not aware of reports on the Internet speculating about bin Laden and a life-threatening illness.

"We've seen nothing from any al Qaeda messaging or other indicators that would point to the death of Osama bin Laden," IntelCenter director Ben N. Venzke told AP.

Officials Investigate Unconfirmed Report Of Bin Laden's Death (MCT)

By Hannah Allam, Jonathan Landay And Matt Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, September 24, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt - A French intelligence report that says Osama bin Laden may have died of typhoid in Pakistan last month is causing a stir among al-Qaida trackers who'd already raised concerns about why it's been two years since bin Laden has appeared in a video.

President Jacques Chirac confirmed the existence of the report but stressed that the information in it is "in no way whatsoever confirmed." The United States and several allied governments also cast doubt on the authenticity of the claims, which have been made before and proven erroneous.

News of the al-Qaida chief's possible death surfaced Saturday with a French newspaper's publication of a confidential document from the French foreign intelligence service DGSE that relayed the unconfirmed findings of Saudi agents. The report said Saudi security first received word Sept 4 of bin Laden's alleged death. It was said to have occurred on Aug. 23.

"According to a usually reliable source, Saudi security services are now convinced that Osama bin Laden is dead," said the report published Saturday in the regional newspaper l'Est Republicain.

An American intelligence official, who requested anonymity because the issue is highly classified, said U.S. intelligence analysts consider the report bogus. He said there's "no evidence to support or reason to believe" that bin Laden is dead. He added that U.S. officials were aware of the unconfirmed report before it was made public by the newspaper.

Vincent Cannistraro, a former chief of the CIA's Counter-Terrorism Center, said he was deeply skeptical of the French report.

"There's no confirmation of the report" from U.S. officials Cannistraro said, adding that the sourcing "appears to be very soft."

He said that if bin Laden had died, U.S. intelligence agencies would have picked up "indicators," such as condolence messages from grieving relatives.

"If someone had really died, there are public grievances by relatives and there is no such thing here," he said. "You can hide things among your followers, but not among your relatives."

Yet even before the French report emerged, speculation was mounting among al-Qaida analysts over why it's been two years since the terror chief has appeared in a video message.

While 2006 was a record year for al-Qaida communiques - with more than three times the number of videos from any previous year - none of the tapes showed bin Laden. Several audiotapes purportedly by bin Laden have aired, and the CIA has confirmed their authenticity, but some scholars who closely monitor bin Laden suspect they're old recordings spliced to sound as if they're related to current events.

"I'm not convinced any of the tapes we heard in 2006 are new," said Bruce Lawrence, a Duke University professor and author of the book, "Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden."

Lawrence, who's been described as one of the world's leading al-Qaida archivists, added that "there's something staged and strange" about the wording and style of some of the recently released tapes.

Bin Laden's last video appearance was in October 2004, when the al Jazeera satellite TV channel aired footage of him appealing directly to Americans just before the presidential election.

Lawrence said rumors abounded that bin Laden suffered from kidney trouble and other ailments, but noted that reliable information was scarce.

DOJ_NMG_0068193

"He's been living a very rugged life for 15 years, and it's probably taken a toll on him," Lawrence said. "(But) if you're an intelligence person and your target is al-Qaida and bin Laden is one of the most important people you track, the question now becomes: Why haven't we seen bin Laden in two years?"

Lawrence said it would be "disastrous" for the Bush administration to focus on bin Laden's absence, only to have the al-Qaida leader issue a new tape to prove he's alive and still eluding a massive manhunt.

"It doesn't serve the government to say bin Laden is dead unless someone can take credit for killing him," Lawrence said. "Suppose all this speculation is wrong and bin Laden is just on sabbatical?"

Even if the reports are true, U.S. and foreign analysts say, bin Laden's death is unlikely to dent the global jihadist movement he helped create. Through the years, al-Qaida has metastasized into a loose confederation of groups inspired - but not directed - by him and his second-in-command, the Egyptian-born Ayman al Zawahiri.

Al Zawahiri has emerged as the most visible al-Qaida leader in the past two years, but even he hasn't been directing attacks such as those in Bali, Madrid and London, according to two senior U.S. counterterrorism officials.

Two American officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the matter involves classified information, said bin Laden's death, if true, would do U.S. interests little good.

"The sorry truth is that if bin Laden is dead, he's now a very large martyr in what a lot of Muslims have come to believe is a war against Islam," one of the officials said.

Chirac announced a probe to find out how the document was leaked to l'Est Republicain, a regional newspaper known for its investigative reports on security matters.

The DGSE, or Direction Generale des Services Exterieurs, sent the document to Chirac and other top French intelligence officials, according to the published account. The claim of bin Laden's death came from a single source, the DSGE document indicated. It said that Saudi agents were pursuing more detailed information, including the location of bin Laden's alleged burial site,

"The chief of al-Qaida was a victim of a severe typhoid crisis while in Pakistan on August 23, 2006," the newspaper quoted the intelligence document as stating. His remote location made medical assistance impossible, the French report said, adding that his lower limbs were partially paralyzed.

A Combative Clinton Defends Record On Fighting Terrorism (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Former President Faults Neocons for Inaction on Bin Laden

Former president Bill Clinton angrily defended his administration's counterterrorism record during a Fox News interview to be aired today, while accusing "President Bush's neocons" and other Republicans of ignoring Osama bin Laden until the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Clinton had planned to discuss his climate change initiative during his appearance on "Fox News Sunday," but he turned combative after host Chris Wallace asked why he hadn't "put bin Laden and al-Qaeda out of business." Clinton shot back that "all the conservative Republicans" who now criticize him for inattention to bin Laden used to criticize him for over-attention to bin Laden.

Clinton said he authorized the CIA to kill bin Laden, and even "contracted with people to kill him." He also said he had a plan to attack Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban and hunt for bin Laden after the attack on the USS Cole, but the CIA and FBI refused to certify that bin Laden was responsible, and Uzbekistan refused to allow the United States to set up a base. By contrast, Clinton said the Bush administration's neoconservatives "had no meetings on bin Laden for nine months," believing he had been "too obsessed with bin Laden."

"At least I tried," Clinton said. "That's the difference [between] me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now. They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try. I tried. So I tried and failed. When I failed, I left a comprehensive anti-terror strategy and the best guy in the country, [Richard] Clarke, who got demoted."

Clinton seemed particularly irked by Wallace's reference to his decision in 1993 to pull troops out of Somalia, a move bin Laden later described as a sign of American weakness. Clinton argued that even though many Republicans demanded a withdrawal from Somalia the day after the downing of a Black Hawk helicopter, he kept a U.S. presence there for another six months to ensure an orderly transition to United Nations forces.

That's when the interview got testy, as a Fox transcript reflects:

Clinton : There is not a living soul in the world who thought Osama bin Laden had anything to do with Black Hawk down or was paying any attention to it, or even knew al-Qaeda was a going concern in October '93.

Wallace : I understand.

Clinton : No, no, wait. Don't tell me that -- you asked why didn't I do more to bin Laden, there was not a living soul, all the people who now criticize me wanted to leave the next day. You brought this up, so you get an answer. But you -- secondly,

Wallace : -- Bin Laden says, but it showed the weakness of the United States.

Clinton : Bin Laden may have said it -- but it would have shown the weakness if we left right away. But he wasn't involved in that, that's just a bunch of bull. That was about Mohamed Aideed, a Muslim warlord, murdering 22 Pakistani Muslim troops. We were all there on a humanitarian mission; we had no mission, none, to establish a certain kind of Somali government or keep anybody out. He was not a religious fanatic --

Wallace : Mr. President --

Clinton : -- there was no al-Qaeda --

Wallace : With respect, if I may, instead of going through '93 and --

Clinton : No, no -- you asked it. You brought it up.

Wallace, a 30-year broadcast veteran who worked at NBC and ABC before Fox, is not usually considered part of the network's conservative commentariat, but Clinton accused him of doing "Fox's bidding" by preparing a "conservative hit job."

He attacked Wallace for failing to ask Bush administration officials why Clarke was demoted from his counterterrorism job: "Tell the truth, Chris. Tell the truth, Chris. Did you ever ask that?" He also complained that Wallace had lured him to the interview "under false pretences," but when Wallace offered to discuss his climate change project, he replied: "No, I want to finish this now."

And so he did, attacking President Bush for focusing on Iraq instead of Afghanistan, urging Americans to read Clarke's book and accusing Republicans of "a serious disinformation campaign" to blame the Clinton administration for losing bin Laden.

"I got closer to killing him than anybody's gotten since," Clinton said. "And if I were still president, we'd have more than 20,000 troops there trying to kill him. . . . You got that little smirk on your face and you think you're so clever, but I had responsibility for trying to protect this country. I tried and I failed to get bin Laden. I regret it, but I did try and I did everything I thought I responsibly could."

U.S. Prosecution Of Padilla No Slam Dunk So Far (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, September 24, 2006

MIAMI -- The Bush administration's decision to drop the "enemy combatant" label from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and prosecute him on civilian terror charges has not gone smoothly, with even the judge in the case raising questions about sketchy evidence and a vague indictment.

Trial for Padilla - an American once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive bomb - and two co-defendants was initially scheduled for early September. But it's now off until January and may be delayed further into 2007 if prosecutors file their expected appeal of U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke's dismissal of a crucial charge.

Cooke has also pronounced the U.S. case "weak on facts" and agreed with defense lawyers that prosecutors must provide more details about what crimes the trio may have actually committed instead of relying on sweeping allegations that they were involved in a violent Islamic jihad over a decade on several continents.

In response to one question about identities of any alleged victims, prosecutors listed armed confrontations against the Russian military in Chechnya and Tajikistan, opposing Muslim factions in Afghanistan and Serbian and Croat forces in Bosnia. They also cited violent acts against more moderate Muslim governments around the world.

Many legal experts say that kind of broad evidence won't be good enough for a jury, which must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Padilla and the others committed crimes. And to prove that, prosecutors must have specific violent acts and specific victims, experts say.

"You've got to mount a sufficient body of evidence to support the charges, and that's what's lacking," said Scott Silliman, law professor and executive director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security at Duke University. "If he is acquitted, it will be in my judgment a severely embarrassing moment for the government."

The difficulty prosecutors have in defining exactly what Padilla and the others allegedly did is a recurrent issue in terrorism cases where charges are brought before a violent act takes place, said Jeffrey F. Addicott, director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University School of Law.

"Law enforcement often faces the problem of stopping the terrorist before they strike, which means the overt act never happens," Addicott said. "It makes prosecution more difficult, but not impossible."

U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment on the status of the case, but has in the past expressed confidence in the strength of the government's evidence.

Padilla, a 35-year-old former member of the Latin Disciples gang in Chicago, was arrested by the FBI in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport and designated a month later as an "enemy combatant" by President Bush.

He was held by the U.S. military and interrogated without charge or real access to a lawyer for 3 1/2 years, with former Attorney General John Ashcroft famously claiming on television that Padilla was arrested while on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city.

With Bush's authority to hold an American like Padilla indefinitely without charge under legal challenge before the U.S. Supreme Court, the administration sidestepped the question last November by dropping the "enemy combatant" label and adding him to an existing Miami case charging alleged members of a North American terrorism support cell. No "dirty bomb" is mentioned in that indictment.

"There is a bit of a pattern in these cases of the government overstating what it can actually prove," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor.

Padilla couldn't be transferred to the U.S. terrorist detention camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and possibly tried before a military commission there because he is a U.S. citizen. So even if Congress succeeds in rewriting the rules for those commissions, Padilla will get his day in federal court.

The indictment essentially contends that Padilla, who had relocated in the 1990s to South Florida and converted to Islam, was recruited to al-Qaida by Adham Amin Hassoun, a Sunrise computer programmer allegedly active in the jihadist worldwide network. A third defendant, Kifah Wael Jayyousi, is accused of funneling support to terror groups in part through his "Islam Report" newsletter.

In a setback for the government's case, Cooke ruled in August that count one of the indictment, alleging a conspiracy to "murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country," must be dismissed because it duplicates other charges. Prosecutors are likely to appeal that ruling, which tosses out the only charge carrying a possible life sentence.

Other potential weaknesses in the case against include:

-Padilla's voice is heard on only eight of some 50,000 FBI wiretap recordings and his name is mentioned on about 20 others. His lawyers say violence or jihad is not discussed on any of those recordings, and some of them are between Padilla's mother and Hassoun. Most involve subjects such as Padilla's whereabouts, his marriage and his children, his lawyers say.

-A key piece of physical evidence is a "mujahideen" application Padilla allegedly completed to attend an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. Prosecutors say his fingerprints are on it. They have refused to produce a list of anyone who may have been at the camp at the same time or whose forms were found along with that application. They intend to call as a witness Yahya Goba, a convicted 28-year-old member of the so-called "Lackawanna Six" terror cell in upstate New York, who will tell jurors he filled out a similar form but at a later date. Goba could get a reduced prison sentence in return for his cooperation.

-Over government objections, Cooke ordered the Bush administration to turn over medical records from Padilla's long stretch in military custody. Defense lawyers say they will look for instances of possible misconduct during interrogations or use of drugs that might have impaired Padilla in some way.

-A magistrate judge found that Jayyousi's publication of the "Islam Report" may be protected by the First Amendment because it "merely advocated terrorism in general, or jihad at some indefinite time" rather than providing specific instructions or signals for a crime to be committed. Jayyousi is the only defendant to win pretrial release on bail.

Some experts compared the Padilla case to that of former University of South Florida professor Sami al-Arian, who was cleared of terrorism charges after a five-month trial in 2005. That case also involved thousands of telephone and wiretap intercepts but little direct links between al-Arian and particular acts of Palestinian violence overseas.

"If it's not a problem as a matter of law that they are getting people on talk rather than action, it certainly is a problem with juries," said Michael Greenberger, law professor at the University of Maryland. "If all they produce is telephone conversations, they run the risk that they are not going to convince a jury to convict."

'Islamo-Fascism' Had Its Moment (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON

SHORTLY after terrorists attacked the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush's speechwriters began grappling with a linguistic puzzle: What to call the enemy? In the five years since, Mr. Bush has road-tested an array of terms: evildoers, jihadists, Islamic extremists, even "Al Qaeda suiciders."

But no phrase has crashed and burned as fast as the president's most recent entry into the foreign policy lexicon: Islamic fascists, or, Islamo-fascism.

This latest iteration, which has percolated in neoconservative circles for several years, turned up in one of the president's speeches last year, and resurfaced in August when British authorities foiled a plot to blow up airliners headed for the United States. It was, Mr. Bush said then, "a stark reminder that this nation is at war with Islamic fascists who will use any means to destroy those of us who love freedom."

By Labor Day, Islamic fascists and Islamo-fascism were the hot new conservative buzzwords.

And then, just as suddenly, they were gone — at least from the president's lips.

"The debate that we wanted to launch was about an ideological struggle against an enemy that has very specific plans, ambitions and aspirations, much like movements of the past, like fascism and Nazism," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president. Addressing the term Islamic fascists, Mr. Bartlett said, "I'm sure he'll use it again."

But it seems unlikely Mr. Bush will use it again, given the outcry it provoked.

Muslims, both here and in other countries, were deeply offended. Even Karen Hughes, the former counselor to Mr. Bush who now runs the public diplomacy arm of the State Department, pushed back, telling CNN's Wolf Blitzer that she typically does not "use religious terms" for fear they will be misinterpreted around the world.

"The problem with the phrase is that it confuses more than it clarifies," says David Gergen, a former speechwriter for Richard Nixon. "It's important to find a phrase that's meaningful in the Arabic world, and Islamic fascism has no meaning."

The precise etymology of "Islamo-fascism" is unclear. Some say that the writer Christopher Hitchens introduced it into post-9/11 discourse. But Stephen Schwartz, executive director of the Center for Islamic Pluralism, which promotes moderate Muslim views, also takes credit, describing the phrase in a recent article as one that "refers to the use of the faith of Islam as a cover for totalitarian ideology."

If "Islamic fascists" and "Islamo-fascism" have disappeared from Mr. Bush's oratory — they were nowhere to be found in his 9/11 anniversary speeches, for instance — questions about the phrases have not. The president was forced to grapple with such inquiries twice last week alone. On Friday, in response to a Pakistani journalist, Mr. Bush invoked a far more general term: "these extremists."

All of which leaves the central problem — what to call the enemy — unresolved.

"I'd prefer to call them Islamists," said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian and neoconservative thinker at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. Fascists, Mr. Kagan said, idealize a strong man, like Hitler or Mussolini. "Bin Laden's stated aim is for Allah to be venerated, so I think it's a very different thing."

David Frum, a former speechwriter for Mr. Bush, said the president turned to "evildoers" right after Sept. 11, 2001, in part because it translated well in Arabic and in part because it appeared in Psalm 27, which Mr. Frum says is one of the president's favorite psalms. ("When evildoers came upon me to devour my flesh.")

But evildoers has a kind of comic-book sound, and in any event, Mr. Frum says, it isn't specific enough. He suggests Mr. Bush find an Arabic phrase to popularize — so long as it does not involve the word jihad, a term with a negative connotation in the United States, but positive overtones in the Muslim world.

Peter Beinart, the editor at large of The New Republic, has his own solution: "jihadi salafi," which he loosely translates as "someone who would use violence, and ultimately state violence, to bring about a utopian vision of Islam." So what if no one knows what it means.

"If Bush had been using it all these years," Mr. Beinart said, "people would know it like the back of their hand."

Maybe he should have stuck with Al Qaeda suiciders.

The 'Prudence Party' Takes On An Insurgent (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

To President Bush's supporters, nothing is more exhilarating than his willingness, even eagerness, to challenge long-established assumptions and policies, especially in foreign policy. "As an insurgent, with few ties in Washington," conservative journalist Fred Barnes wrote admiringly in his recent book, "Rebel-in-Chief," "Bush has found it easy to overturn major policies with scarcely a second thought."

To Bush's critics, that's exactly the problem.

As his second term proceeds, he's facing increasing resistance from what might be called the "prudence party." The prudence party represents a particular corner of the U.S. establishment. Informal and amorphous, it is populated by top-level corporate and Wall Street executives, former diplomats, retired military officers and some veteran legislators on Capitol Hill.

As a group, the prudence party is more Republican than Democratic. In modern political terms, it is more centrist than conservative, though it is profoundly conservative in the word's traditional meaning: it looks skeptically at radical change, especially when it is implemented "with scarcely a second thought." The prudence party generally believes that assumptions and procedures that have lasted for decades are usually so entrenched for a good reason. It has a healthy respect for the law of unintended consequences.

During Bush's first term, the prudence party gnashed its teeth over his movement to downplay America's reliance on our traditional allies, a tendency that culminated in the decision to invade Iraq without explicit authorization from the United Nations. But mostly those in this group bit their tongues.

Signs of the unease emerged in the 2004 presidential campaign. One came when several retired generals prominently endorsed the Democratic candidate, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts. Another was a statement issued during the campaign from a separate group of retired diplomats and military officials criticizing Bush's foreign policy.

But both of those groups tilted toward names identified more with the Democratic side of the foreign policy establishment. In Bush's second term, a broader spectrum of voices from the prudence party have dissented. The demands from retired military officers for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld earlier this year offered one indication of the discontent in these circles.

Even more telling was the resistance Bush faced in his effort to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention toward detainees in the war on terrorism.

It wasn't particularly surprising to find Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina leading that opposition; both are iconoclasts who have opposed Bush on other national security choices.

But behind them stood Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the 79-year-old chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, former Secretary of the Navy and the virtual white-haired embodiment of the prudence party.

And behind Warner stood an even more imposing phalanx of gray eminences — retired Gen. John Vessey, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under President Reagan; George P. Shultz, Reagan's Secretary of State; and, above all, Colin L. Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs for George H.W. Bush and the first-term Secretary of State for George W. Bush. All three, as well as another group of more than two dozen former military and State Department officials, played a more visible role than any congressional Democrat in blocking Bush's proposal.

Powell's resistance attracted the most attention. But Vessey captured the thinking of the prudence party most eloquently in his letter opposing any reinterpretation of the Geneva Convention.

In essence, Vessey rejected the core Bush argument that Islamic terrorism has created a threat so transcendent as to demand the abandonment of America's traditional approaches to ensuring its security. "I continue to read and hear that we are facing a 'different enemy' in the war on terror; no matter how true that may be, inhumanity and cruelty are not new to warfare nor to enemies we have faced in the past," Vessey wrote. "Through those years, we held to our own values. We should continue to do so."

Debate will continue for weeks over whether Warner, Graham and McCain sufficiently upheld those values in the deal they struck with the administration on the treatment of detainees. What's clear is that the dispute represented a kind of tipping point for many of the establishment figures who supported those senators — a moment when Bush's inclination to jettison established approaches collided too directly with their respect for the ways America has conducted itself since World War II.

Retired Col. Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Powell's chief of staff at the State Department, believes the disagreement became a flashpoint for growing concern that the administration, in its responses to the terrorism threat, "has made a radical departure from traditional political and cultural values as well as what heretofore was a rather consistent strain in foreign policy."

Others might not criticize the administration so pointedly. But it doesn't take much reading between the lines to see in the statements from Powell and others the fear that Bush has too casually alienated world opinion in his pursuit of greater security for America.

The pillars of the prudence party don't like to publicly air their disagreements. The fact that so many did so in this dispute is probably a warning sign to the White House that it could face more resistance from some of the same voices if it pursues other avenues seen as flouting international norms or global opinion, such as unilateral military action against Iran. Through 2008, Bush's disputes with these voices of restraint may shape America's national security decisions more than his arguments with the Democrats.

CIA Values Show In Stand On Detainees (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — For an agency that ordinarily steers clear of major policy debates, the CIA played an unusually prominent role in the showdown between the White House and dissident Republicans over the treatment of detainees.

To many outsiders, the CIA's position was puzzling.

Why would an agency whose own overseas officers are vulnerable to capture — and torture — defend harsh interrogation methods? And how did an organization often criticized for its caution end up pushing the legal envelope, even while the Pentagon was advocating tight new restrictions?

The answers, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials, reflect a cultural and operational fault line that separates the CIA from the other arms of the U.S. government that operate overseas — mainly the military and the State Department.

The detainee issue has tapped into "a cultural difference," said Mark Lowenthal, former assistant director of the CIA.

"This whole debate has no meaning for a CIA officer as he understands the world and the nature of the deal he made with the government and the nature of the risks he is willing to accept," Lowenthal said.

CIA leaders are typically closely aligned with State Department and Pentagon counterparts in their view of the world and their concern for overseas opinion of the United States. But on the detainee issue, the CIA is less swayed by concerns that other nations might retaliate against U.S. prisoners, and more inclined to consider any cost worth paying for the intelligence it generates.

President Bush wanted to reestablish a secret CIA detention and interrogation program and insulate CIA officers from legal peril in pushing this month for new security legislation. Bush's proposal was opposed by Republican senators, retired military commanders and onetime administration officials such as former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who warned the harsh approaches favored by Bush would further soil the U.S. image.

Leading up to a key compromise on Thursday, CIA officials, including the agency director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, publicly took Bush's side in the fight, voicing concerns evidently felt by many CIA officers worldwide.

"There are smart, sensitive people who work in that agency who are bothered by the same sorts of issues as private citizens are," said Paul Pillar, former deputy director of the CIA counterterrorism center.

But Pillar and others noted that spies, unlike soldiers, are not afforded the protections of the Geneva Convention. Therefore, agency officials are less preoccupied with the concern over reciprocity articulated by Powell and others.

The convention spells out elaborate protections for captured soldiers, and sets minimum standards for others who are captured who are not in uniform.

But spies fall into a separate category. Those engaged in espionage "shall not have the right to the status of prisoner of war," according to the convention, which also says that an occupying government "may impose the death penalty" in cases when a prisoner is guilty of espionage.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the Geneva Convention applies even to terrorism suspects under U.S. law. But "if a CIA operative is picked up by terrorists, he is unlikely to benefit under any circumstances from Geneva protections," said Robert Grenier, who retired earlier this year as head of the CIA's counterterrorism center.

Indeed, the history of the agency includes gruesome examples. In 1984, William Buckley, the CIA station chief in Beirut, was captured, tortured, and ultimately killed by operatives from the Hezbollah terrorist organization.

Some veterans said the agency's experience fighting terrorists, and the stakes of the interrogations they conduct when suspects are captured, also help explain its more aggressive mindset. While the military has held hundreds of relatively low-level prisoners at Guantanamo Bay and other facilities, the CIA has been responsible for detaining a relative handful of high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives.

"The agency is not recommending that these techniques be applied to everybody," said a former senior CIA official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We're talking about those very rare cases when you've got somebody who you know was the mastermind behind Sept. 11, who gleefully slit the throat of Danny Pearl."

The former official was referring to Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks who is also believed to have executed Wall Street Journal reporter Pearl after he was kidnapped in Pakistan in 2002.

The CIA is said to have used an array of harsh techniques against Mohammed, including "water boarding," in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and made to believe he is going to drown. Water boarding presumably no longer would be allowed under the new rules under consideration in the Senate. But CIA officials said they believe they will still have access to other methods that have proven effective.

"Overall, you have to characterize them as tough and aggressive," said a former senior CIA official involved in the program. "Certainly beyond what one would legitimately expect to encounter in a police precinct."

The CIA view of interrogation policy may also be colored by the fact that it is a principal user of the intelligence it gets from Al Qaeda prisoners — in contrast to other areas of intelligence where the CIA is a more passive conduit of information to policymakers and the Pentagon.

"If they get information on what the Chinese military is doing, that goes to the Pentagon," said another former CIA official. "If they get information on China's likely stance at the United Nations, that goes to the State Department."

But information from interrogations of high-value detainees has fueled dozens of counterterrorism operations mounted by the CIA, netting what officials have described as important captures.

Ex-POWs Defend Tough Interrogation Of Terrorism Suspects (MJS)

By Meg Jones

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 23, 2006

Survivors of torture offer views of Geneva Convention

The Geneva Convention meant nothing to Don Heiliger's captors.

To the men who used ropes and handcuffs to twist Heiliger's arms behind him until his shoulder blades touched and his arms went numb, the rules regarding humane treatment of prisoners of war were a joke.

Shot down over Vietnam on May 15, 1967, the Navy pilot who later became a Dane County supervisor was tortured and told he was a criminal who had no protection under the Geneva Convention.

The debate over the rules for the interrogation and trial of terrorist suspects is more than political rhetoric for Heiliger and other Wisconsin ex-prisoners of war, who spent days and weeks and years in captivity never knowing if they would survive their ordeal. Even as President Bush and key Republican senators such as John McCain reached an agreement last week over the issue, Heiliger's opinion was emphatic: The Geneva Conventions don't apply to terror suspects.

"To try terrorists doesn't bother me at all, because I don't think they're soldiers," said Heiliger, 69, of Stoughton.

Dan Doughty agrees. He, too, was shot down in Vietnam and spent almost seven years as a prisoner of war. He, too, was tortured and forced to write letters saying he was treated well.

In the war on terror, "there are no uniformed soldiers. They're not fighting for a country. They don't have a nation behind them," said Doughty, 73, who grew up in Ladysmith and now lives in Eau Claire. "I'd sure hate to see several thousand people die (in a terror attack) because we couldn't ask a question for fear we were mistreating" terror suspects.

When he was first captured, he told his captors his name, rank, serial number and date of birth - the only information military members are obligated to provide under the Geneva Conventions.

It didn't do any good and only infuriated Doughty's captors. It took two decades for the numbness in Doughty's hands and arms to go away.

Doughty saw the Abu Ghraib prison scandal photos and read about the convictions of American soldiers working as guards at the Baghdad prison. In Doughty's opinion, the Abu Ghraib prisoners were mistreated, not tortured. And the Bush administration's attempt to clarify some of the language in the Geneva Conventions probably won't matter in future wars, he said.

"I don't think anybody we'd have a future war with is going to be different than Vietnam," Doughty said. "Look at what happened to our soldiers that have been captured (in Iraq this year). They've been tortured and cut up and put in the street. That's what we're dealing with."

The Geneva Conventions are a series of international agreements signed in the Swiss capital in the 1800s and 1900s. The rules regarding the humane treatment of prisoners of war came out of the third Geneva Convention, held in 1929.

Mark Pink was a prisoner of war in a country that observed those rules. After the 85-year-old Union Grove man had the misfortune of getting shot down in his B-26 Marauder over France on April 24, 1944, he had the good fortune of ending up being treated humanely in prison camps operated by the German Air Force. Later, he found out Americans captured by the Japanese spent World War II in far different conditions.

"I thank my lucky stars that I ended up" in Germany, Pink said.

When Joseph Small III's OV-10 Bronco reconnaissance plane was shot down by the Iraqis over Kuwait during the first Gulf War, the Geneva Conventions had no meaning for his captors. Held for nine days, Small was beaten and whipped. When he regained consciousness from the beatings, he was whipped again. His rotator cuff was torn when his captors wrenched his shoulder.

Small said his treatment was different from that of terror suspects by the U.S.

"They're being treated roughly, but they're not undergoing torture that me or John McCain or any other Americans went through," said Small, 55, adding that he's not comparing his experience to that of McCain or other Vietnam ex-POWs.

Small isn't advocating torture of terror suspects. But he said interrogators should be allowed to reach suspects at a level that's not clearly defined in the Geneva Conventions.

"This is a different situation we've never had before, one that has degenerated into a political discussion. We're not fighting a country, we're fighting an ideology and an enemy that's dedicated to our destruction," said Small, a Midwest Airlines pilot who lives in Racine. "It takes new thinking and new definitions of what we need to do to stop attacks on innocent civilians."

According to Heiliger, Small is the only Gulf War ex-POW living in Wisconsin, and only three ex-POWs from Vietnam live full time in the state.

Like Heiliger and Doughty, Gerald Gerndt spent years in the so-called "Hanoi Hilton" and other camps where he was tortured. After an escape attempt by other prisoners in 1968, Gerndt remembers he and his cellmates were punished by being put in leg irons and kept in a stifling room without open windows throughout the hot, muggy summer.

Gerndt, whose F-4C fighter jet was shot down on Aug. 23, 1967, has conflicted feelings about the debate over handling terror detainees.

"If you're going to murder innocent civilians for the sake of shock value, I'm not so certain the Geneva Convention should apply to those people," said Gerndt, 64, a financial adviser who lives in Genesee.

However, Gerndt added that while he despises terrorists, "we're a country of laws, and everyone has a certain right to those laws in this country."

Why Retired Military Brass Don't Want Torture (LAT)

By Charles Kaiser, Charles Kaiser, Author Of "1968 In America" And "The Gay Metropolis," Is Completing "The Cost Of Cou

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

FOR ONE 83-year-old veteran of World War II, it was the searing memory of a Japanese prisoner who helped turn the tide on Iwo Jima. For a 40-year veteran of Army intelligence, it was a trip to the battlefield at Gettysburg. For all 43 retired generals and admirals, it was a combination of moral outrage and deep disgust over President Bush's proposed legislation on interrogating terrorist suspects that propelled them into unfamiliar territory.

"None of us feels comfortable speaking out publicly," said retired Rear Adm. John D. Hutson, who served as the Navy's judge advocate general from 1997 to 2000 and presided over the JAG corps' 1,600 members. "That's not the nature of what military officers do…. [But we] care very, very much about the country and the military — and that's why [we] are speaking out."

The group of retired flag officers first came together in 2005, when a dozen of them signed a letter opposing the nomination of Alberto Gonzales as attorney general for his role in developing Bush's policies on torture in the war on terror. Late last year, they supported Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) ban on cruel and inhumane treatment of detainees in U.S. custody anywhere in the world.

And last week, the Republican senators with whom the retired officers are allied in a fight against Bush's proposed legislation to weaken the spirit and the letter of the Geneva Convention won a compromise with the administration. According to the agreement, all forms of torture would be banned, including waterboarding, which White House officials had insisted wasn't real torture, although it was one of the Gestapo's favorite techniques.

The retired officers believe that the negative consequences of the president's anti-terror policies could have been avoided if the administration had followed traditional military practices. Retired Marine Maj. Gen. Fred E. Haynes, 83, is a veteran of World War II and the Korean and Vietnam wars. In 1945, he was a captain in the regiment that seized Mt. Suribachi on Iwo Jima and raised the U.S. flag there. In March of that year, his unit found two U.S. soldiers dead, apparently victims of torture. On March 17, about 10 days before the battle ended, a Japanese soldier, wearing nothing but his boots and a cotton jock strap, stepped out of a cave with his hands up. He had read one of the leaflets Americans were distributing in artillery shells that promised that anyone who gave up would get his wounds treated and his stomach filled.

The soldier surrendered to a lieutenant who spoke no Japanese. The lieutenant called his company commander to ask what to do with the prisoner.

"As he was talking," Haynes recalled hearing from soldiers in his unit, "a Japanese sniper apparently got a good aim on him and the bullet penetrated his helmet at an angle, scooted around inside the helmet and dropped out the back." Miraculously, the lieutenant was uninjured.

"In good conscience, he could have shot the Japanese [prisoner] dead," said the general, because the soldier could reasonably have concluded that he had been set up. "But he didn't."

Instead, the lieutenant waited for the company commander to join them. He subsequently discovered that French was a language he shared with the prisoner. Speaking French, the Japanese man offered to help clear out caves nearby.

When the prisoner was interrogated by two Marine interpreters fluent in Japanese, they quickly determined that he was the chief code clerk for the Japanese commander on Iwo Jima, an extraordinarily valuable catch.

"He not only knew the situation on Iwo, but he had good insight into the situation on Okinawa, which we were to invade on April 1 and did. He even knew a fair amount about the [Japanese army's] situation with respect to China," Haynes recalled.

The prisoner was immediately sent to the headquarters of Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, and from there to Washington.

"The moral of the story," said the general, "is we Americans have been so thoroughly imbued with the idea that you have to treat prisoners humanely — and this [story] is an example of why. It is an illustration of how by treating an individual decently you are much more likely to get any information you might want — and it's more likely to be correct."

Retired Army Brig. Gen. David R. Irvine spent 40 years in the Reserve as an intelligence officer, spending much of that time teaching the rules of interrogation to soldiers, Marines and airmen. He remembers a visit to Gettysburg, where he lined up with 125 other officers in front of a statue of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee, from which they retraced Pickett's Charge.

"Everything there is completely flat," Irvine said. "By the time you get 50 yards out … [you're] right in artillery range of the Union line. And you've got a mile and half to go on foot [to reach the Union soldiers]. As stragglers who survived found their way back to Seminary Ridge, Lee was riding his horse on that line and apologizing: 'It's all my fault.' He sent a letter of resignation to [Confederate President] Jefferson Davis, who refused to accept it. And the point of that whole exercise was command responsibility. That's a powerful lesson."

It's a lesson these retired officers think the administration doesn't get because no higher-ups were prosecuted for the abuses uncovered at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere. "Tailhook was a very painful time for the Navy," Hutson said, referring to the 1991 sexual misconduct scandal. "The Navy was not treating women with the respect and dignity that they deserved and had earned. But speaking of accountability, we had a chief of naval operations who resigned; we had a secretary of the Navy who resigned."

Retired Brig. Gen. James P. Cullen was chief judge of the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals. "I grew up in an Army where the rules were very clear and where serviceman and women had no question about what their obligations and responsibilities were under both the Geneva Convention and our domestic law," he said. "When you have a winking-and-nodding policy [as was the case at Abu Ghraib], that just brings about the consequences that we came to view at [the prison]."

What further fuels the officers' outrage is that the policies they believe have undermined the military were mostly formulated by men, like Bush, who have not seen combat.

"[Vice President Dick] Cheney made mention in the days after 9/11 that he wanted to operate sort of on the dark side," Cullen said. "Here was a guy who never served, and now something terrible had happened, and he wanted to show that he was a tough guy…. So he's going to operate outside the rules of law. Bad message."

the Torture Debate (WP)

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

President Bush's advocacy of "alternative interrogation practices" in the fight against terrorism has moved beyond legality and morality -- to focus on practicality. "The information that the Central Intelligence Agency has obtained by questioning men like Khalid Sheik Mohammed has provided valuable information and has helped disrupt terrorist plots, including strikes within the United States," Bush said in a Sept. 15 news conference. "By giving us information about terrorist plans we couldn't get anywhere else, this program has saved innocent lives. In other words, it is vital."

DOJ_NMG_0068203

In a recent statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee, a group of former Army interrogators disagreed. "Prisoner/detainee abuse and torture are to be avoided at all costs, in part because they can degrade the intelligence collection effort by interfering with a skilled interrogator's efforts to establish rapport with the subject," they wrote.

We spoke with three of the signers about their experience as interrogators and why they signed.

-- Rachel Dry

Peter Bauer, Army interrogator, 1986-1997

I conducted interrogation operations and training, and served as an interrogator near the front lines during Operation Desert Storm. When prisoners of high intelligence value were captured, they were brought to me immediately. I often just glared at them and in a stern voice asked their name, their rank, their unit affiliation, and then questions related to the intelligence collection mission. Direct questioning is usually effective.

With the [Iraqi] Republican Guard officers, I had to use some of the approaches from the field manual. I used "love of comrades" a couple of times: I would tell somebody, "You know that if you can help us end this war sooner, fewer of your own people will die." When I saw them, they were still reeling from the shock of battle and capture. You should never underestimate the power of one's own imagination to create danger. If you ask, "Do you know what can happen to you under the Geneva Conventions if you don't tell me your name?" the answer is "nothing." But that question put to somebody who's not familiar with the Conventions just opens up doors in their mind. Most terrorists should be no more difficult to interrogate than other fanatics we've dealt with -- including Viet Cong, Soviet spies and Iraqi Republican Guard officers.

I know the techniques in the field manual work, and I know torture isn't as effective. I was stationed in Europe almost all of my career and I did resistance-to-interrogation training for NATO forces. We simulated the sort of abuse they could expect should they fall into the hands of the Warsaw Pact. This treatment is quite similar to the sort of techniques described as the CIA's "alternative interrogation procedures." We invariably obtained more reliable information using our own techniques than we did using the abusive procedures. I cannot name one instance in which abuse was successful after standard interrogation techniques failed. When you abuse or degrade somebody, the reaction of the source is: "You're putting ladies' underwear on my head. [Expletive] you." In the hands of a skilled and trained interrogator, you wouldn't have to torture. Not a single military interrogator with whom I have communicated expressed anything but contempt for the idea that torture could be more effective than standard interrogation techniques.

Chief Warrant Officer Marney Mason (retired)

I've been doing the interrogation thing since the early 1970s. I was a Cold War interrogator in Europe in the 1970s and '80s, and I've trained interrogators at Fort Hood, Tex., and Fort Bragg, N.C. -- teaching them how to conduct interrogations and how to resist them. In some training sessions, I've even administered mild forms of torture. And I think anyone who believes torture is a useful means of extracting information has been watching too many Sly Stallone movies.

A good interrogation is like a seduction. You sit down. You ask the person questions. You try to develop a very intense personal relationship with another human being so they'll part with information they'd rather not part with. You wheedle, cajole, trick, lie. The point is to collect usable, actionable information. Sure, if you start pulling a guy's fingernails out, he'll start talking -- it may not be the truth, but he's going to tell you exactly what you want to hear.

In a training environment (a mock prisoner-of-war camp), my students would be subjected to hostile forms of interrogations: loud noises, fake burials, 15- to 20-volt electric shocks. And I got people to confess to things that they absolutely did not do. The information you receive is worthless.

Travis W. Hall, former Army interrogator and captain in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps

Over my 14 years of military experience, both as an interrogator and as a JAG, I observed a degradation in the respect of service members for the laws of war since 9/11. When I attended interrogation school in 1992, all the attendees had 40 hours of classroom time on the Geneva Conventions followed by a written exam on all the rights and obligations of the military personnel under the Conventions.

What I saw firsthand as an interrogator and, later, as a JAG in Iraq in 2003 working on detainee issues, has left me with a strong belief that torture is counterproductive. What has proven effective in interrogation, time and again, regardless of what culture the detainee is from, is building a positive relationship with an individual. Americans really want their soldiers to not only come home, but come home with honor. I would challenge the current administration to come up with one example where torture in interrogation has produced actionable intelligence that saved American lives in the United States.

Does It Work? (WP)

By Edwidge Danticat

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

President Bush says harsh interrogation tactics are a key tool in the War on Terror. Two authors consider the painful dilemma posed by his claim:

MIAMI Afew years ago, as I worked on a documentary film about torture survivors in exile from my native Haiti, I met a young woman who under questioning by a military officer was slapped until she became deaf in one ear, was forced to chew and swallow a campaign poster, and was kicked so hard in the stomach by booted feet that she kept slipping in and out of consciousness in a pool of her own urine and blood. Another woman had an arm chopped off and her tongue sliced in two before she was dumped in a mass grave, miles from her home.

When I met these women, some time had passed since their ordeals. But they could still feel the hammering of the blows and hear the menacing voices, threatening to drown them, dismember them and set them on fire. The younger woman, Marie Carmel, remembers thinking about her mother. Manman will surely die if I'm killed, she thought. I have to stay alive for her. Alerte, whose arm and tongue were severed, kept thinking about her children as she climbed out of the corpse-filled pit and crawled to the side of the road where she found help. Both had no idea how much pain they could endure until then. They wanted to live, they remembered, to defy their torturers, to tell their stories.

"There is no need for torture," wrote Jean-Paul Sartre. "Hell is the other." Those women saw hell and came back. However, neither one told their torturers what they wanted to know. Marie Carmel did not reveal the names of her fellow pro-democracy activists. Alerte did not divulge the whereabouts of her husband, who was the real object of her captors' search.

For many who remember -- just as these women do, and my own parents do -- what it means to live under a dictatorial regime, a regime in which citizens must leave work or school to witness public executions, torture is not just an individual affliction but a communal one. And now, when political leaders in the United States are asking us as a society to consider not only the legal and moral ramifications of torture but its effectiveness, we are brought closer to these regimes than we may think. If we are part of all that has touched us, as Alfred Tennyson wrote, then we are all endorsers of torture when it is done in our name.

Torture aims for a single goal -- obtaining information -- but it achieves a slew of others. For one thing, it martyrizes the tortured. Think of the old Christlike images of Che Guevara's corpse in Bolivia -- or even of Christ himself.

While working on the documentary and researching the novel it eventually inspired, I interviewed torturers as well as their victims. I realized that torture diminishes us all by numbing us to human distress; the level of callousness in the society rises, with once unimaginable acts suddenly charted and rationalized.

"This is why we have this proverb," one repentant torturer told me, " bay kou bliye pote mak sonje ." The one who strikes the blow might easily forget, but the one who wears the scars must remember.

When seemingly noble ideals -- after all, what can be nobler than wanting to save lives? -- lead us to torture, the path to the torture chamber can find its way to our front door, just as it did for Marie Carmel, Alerte and countless others before them.

"The people who kill and torture and tell lies in the name of their sacred causes . . . " wrote Aldous Huxley, "these are never the publicans and the sinners. No, they're the virtuous, respectable men, who have the finest feelings, the best brains, the noblest ideals."

As a child growing up in a dictatorial state, I always dreaded the pounding I heard at some of my neighbors' doors at night, when many were yanked from their beds never to be seen again. The lucky ones returned from a pit that was as much a physical place as a darkness that would always surround them. They were missing an eye or some teeth; they showed swelling that would take weeks to go down or shaking that worsened over time. These markers of torment first drew me to people such as Marie Carmel and Alerte, women who could have been my mother or myself.

When I first encounter men and women who've been tortured, I notice their dramatic and disfiguring scars. But eventually I recognize their hardened core and, more often than not, their reinforced defiance and renewed commitment to that for which they were abused.

When I meet former torturers, they don't proudly stand up and say, "Here I am, a torturer." Unless they're infamous, they have sought to compartmentalize their lives. At a lively game of dominoes or across a family dinner table, they can distance themselves from their past in a way that their victims can never even attempt. Occasionally, though, they are unwittingly exposed by a child who might say, "Papa was in the military and worked in such-and-such prison at such-and-such time." The torturers squirm and change the subject, knowing they've been unmasked.

Rare is the opportunity, as we seem to have now, for the torturer to plot out methods in advance and in public. Should a person be strapped to a board and have water poured down his nose? Should she be forced to stand for long periods of time in the cold without being allowed to sleep? Should he be slapped in the chest, face or belly? These are almost novelistic questions with no more rational answers than some haywire plot or dark verse.

After first reading it as a young girl newly escaped from Jean-Claude Duvalier's dictatorship in Haiti, I recently rediscovered a poem called "The Colonel" by Carolyn ForchÃ©. The narrator describes dining with a dictator who, after the luxurious meal, empties a bag full of human ears on the table.

"I am tired of fooling around," he tells his visitor. "As for the rights of anyone, tell your people they can go [expletive] themselves."

He lifts his glass of wine, and with one sweep of his arm, brushes the ears to the floor.

When the ears hit the ground -- like those of all my disappeared neighbors, I imagine -- the narrator notices that some of them are pressed to the floor while others are catching "this scrap of his voice." My fear is that when it is most needed, none of our ears will bother to catch any voices at all. Then will the tortured see any reason to live on? And if they live, whom will they tell?

Are We Really So Fearful? (WP)

By Ariel Dorfman

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

DURHAM, N.C.

It still haunts me, the first time -- it was in Chile, in October of 1973 -- that I met someone who had been tortured. To save my life, I had sought refuge in the Argentine Embassy some weeks after the coup that had toppled the democratically elected government of Salvador Allende, a government for which I had worked. And then, suddenly, one afternoon, there he was. A large-boned man, gaunt and yet strangely flabby, with eyes like a child, eyes that could not stop blinking and a body that could not stop shivering.

That is what stays with me -- that he was cold under the balmy afternoon sun of Santiago de Chile, trembling as though he would never be warm again, as though the electric current was still coursing through him. Still possessed, somehow still inhabited by his captors, still imprisoned in that cell in the National Stadium, his hands disobeying the orders from his brain to quell the shuddering, his body unable to forget what had been done to it just as, nearly 33 years later, I, too, cannot banish that devastated life from my memory.

It was his image, in fact, that swirled up from the past as I pondered the current political debate in the United States about the practicality of torture. Something in me must have needed to resurrect that victim, force my fellow citizens here to spend a few minutes with the eternal iciness that had settled into that man's heart and flesh, and demand that they take a good hard look at him before anyone dare maintain that, to save lives, it might be necessary to inflict unbearable pain on a fellow human being. Perhaps the optimist in me hoped that this damaged Argentine man could, all these decades later, help shatter the perverse innocence of contemporary Americans, just as he had burst the bubble of ignorance protecting the young Chilean I used to be, someone who back then had encountered torture mainly through books and movies and newspaper reports.

That is not, however, the only lesson that today's ruthless world can learn from that distant man condemned to shiver forever.

All those years ago, that torture victim kept moving his lips, trying to articulate an explanation, muttering the same words over and over. "It was a mistake," he repeated, and in the next few days I pieced together his sad and foolish tale. He was an Argentine revolutionary who had fled his homeland and, as soon as he had crossed the mountains into Chile, had begun to boast about what he would do to the military there if it staged a coup, about his expertise with arms of every sort, about his colossal stash of weapons. Bluster and braggadocio -- and every word of it false.

But how could he convince those men who were beating him, hooking his penis to electric wires and waterboarding him? How could he prove to them that he had been lying, prancing in front of his Chilean comrades, just trying to impress the ladies with his fraudulent insurgent persona?

Of course, he couldn't. He confessed to anything and everything they wanted to drag from his hoarse, howling throat; he invented accomplices and addresses and culprits; and then, when it became apparent that all this was imaginary, he was subjected to further ordeals.

There was no escape.

That is the hideous predicament of the torture victim. It was always the same story, what I discovered in the ensuing years, as I became an unwilling expert on all manner of torments and degradations, my life and my writing overflowing with grief from every continent. Each of those mutilated spines and fractured lives -- Chinese, Guatemalan, Egyptian, Indonesian, Iranian, Uzbek, need I go on? -- all of them, men and women alike, surrendered the same story of essential asymmetry, where one man has all the power in the world and the other has nothing but pain, where one man can decree death at the flick of a wrist and the other can only pray that the wrist will be flicked soon.

It is a story that our species has listened to with mounting revulsion, a horror that has led almost every nation to sign treaties over the past decades declaring these abominations as crimes against humanity, transgressions interdicted all across the earth. That is the wisdom, national and international, that has taken us thousands of years of tribulation and shame to achieve. That is the wisdom we are being asked to throw away when we formulate the question -- Does torture work? -- when we allow ourselves to ask whether we can afford to outlaw torture if we want to defeat terrorism.

I will leave others to claim that torture, in fact, does not work, that confessions obtained under duress -- such as that extracted from the heaving body of that poor Argentine braggart in some Santiago cesspool in 1973 -- are useless. Or to contend that the United States had better not do that to anyone in our custody lest someday another nation or entity or group decides to treat our prisoners the same way.

I find these arguments -- and there are many more -- to be irrefutable. But I cannot bring myself to use them, for fear of honoring the debate by participating in it.

Can't the United States see that when we allow someone to be tortured by our agents, it is not only the victim and the perpetrator who are corrupted, not only the "intelligence" that is contaminated, but also everyone who looked away and said they did not know, everyone who consented tacitly to that outrage so they could sleep a little safer at night, all the citizens who did not march in the streets by the millions to demand the resignation of whoever suggested, even whispered, that torture is inevitable in our day and age, that we must embrace its darkness?

Are we so morally sick, so deaf and dumb and blind, that we do not understand this? Are we so fearful, so in love with our own security and steeped in our own pain, that we are really willing to let people be tortured in the name of America? Have we so lost our bearings that we do not realize that each of us could be that hapless Argentine who sat under the Santiago sun, so possessed by the evil done to him that he could not stop shivering?

CIA Deal Reveals Shirker And Cipher (NSDY)

By Les Payne

Long Island Newsday, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068207

The White House compromise over legislation for the treatment of terror suspects was hardly worth the ink that scribbled the deal on Thursday. More ironic still was the venue for this military pact: the vice president's office in the Senate Office Building.

Dick Cheney has certified every jot and tittle of the U.S. invasion of Iraq - and been proved tragically wrong to the tune of $1 trillion and more than 2,600 American lives. The war policies of this most powerful of all vice presidents have been as inaccurate as his shotgun aim. Cheney said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. Wrong. The United States would cakewalk over Baghdad. Wrong. The Iranians would greet GIs as liberators. Ditto. The war is winding down. Ditto, double damned.

Undiplomatic as Hugo Chávez's UN attack on a sitting U.S. president might have been, it is unfortunate that the Venezuelan leader did not include Cheney in his remarks. Not even Rep. Charles Rangel, who rushed to defend his president against Chávez, could have denied the sulfuric fumes to be whiffed in the wake of the former Halliburton chairman.

While viewing President George W. Bush as an amiable cipher, Rangel has publicly denounced Cheney as a troubled force. In an interview with NY 1 last year, the Harlem Democrat said, "Sometimes I don't think Cheney is awake enough to know what's going on. He's a sick man. He's got heart disease, but the disease is not restricted to that part of his body. He grunts a lot, so you never know what he's thinking." In a follow-up interview, he said: "I would like to believe he's sick rather than just mean and evil."

Former military men such as Rangel, or Sen. John McCain for that matter, seem to be roiled by the notion that Cheney is the helmsman of U.S. military policy. When able-bodied men were subject to the military draft, Dick Cheney maneuvered himself five deferments to avoid meeting this obligation. If not a flat-out coward, he possibly is a mere shirker and, at 64, a chicken hawk void of military sense or caution.

The vice president's office was the site of the high-powered, super-intense confrontation to decide how the Bush administration will proceed with the trial of the 14 suspected terrorists being held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

The compromise was necessitated by the U.S. government's push to avoid further scandal on the eve of the trial. Military and intelligence interrogators petitioned the White House and Congress for clear instructions to protect against charges of unauthorized torture and possible war crimes. Already, the Supreme Court had ruled that methods in play violated existing laws.

No stranger to tough talk, the Bush White House planned to try the suspects without allowing them to hear secret evidence allegedly gathered against them. Some might even have been executed without ever knowing the full extent of what brought them to the gallows. Additionally, Bush took the CIA's bait for clear interrogation directives and pressed for rewriting Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which deals with humane treatment of prisoners of war.

So reckless was the president's move to redraft the Geneva accords that even former Secretary of State Colin Powell rose in opposition. He was joined by McCain, who persuaded two other GOP senators to sustain Article 3 as protection, as well as reassurance, for U.S. soldiers who may be captured and held as prisoners of war. Having been held by the North Vietnamese as a POW for about five years, McCain knows about torture.

As a casual-duty goldbrick in the Texas Air National Guard, Bush knows nothing of war, honor or duty. Like so much of his balderdash and war swagger, Bush's toughness on torture seems more a son's determined attempt to escape the shadow of his father's executive reputation as a "wimp." It is most unfortunate that America's honor and resources are being drained away at the expense of this sick play staged by a member of one of the elite ruling-class families on his last legs.

Two-Tiered Torture Standards (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

By allowing the CIA leeway in interrogations, the Senate gave up too much in its compromise with Bush.

IF IT'S GOOD ENOUGH FOR John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner, then it's good enough for everyone else. That, essentially, has been the argument for the compromise reached last week between the White House and the Senate concerning the Bush administration's treatment of suspected terrorists.

But it's not good enough — neither the compromise nor the argument. The three Republican senators admirably opposed the administration's attempt to undermine international law on the treatment of prisoners captured in the war against terrorists. Yet Congress should not accept their assurances without the sort of sustained scrutiny that will be impossible if there is a rush to enact the compromise into law before the midterm elections. Democrats, who until now have allowed McCain and Co. to serve as their stand-ins, especially should resist a stampede.

To their credit, McCain of Arizona, Graham of South Carolina and Warner of Virginia (with an assist from former Army general and Secretary of State Colin L. Powell), forced the administration to back down from its proposal to redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which prohibits "cruel" and "degrading" treatment. That is good news for U.S. service members who might need to avail themselves of the protections of the convention in the future.

But the compromise has a major flaw. It perpetuates a two-tier system in which the U.S. military is bound by a strict reading of Common Article 3 while the CIA is apparently free to use what President Bush described as "alternative" interrogation methods.

And what exactly are those methods? Earlier this month, in describing how CIA questioning had loosened the tongues of 14 high-profile suspects captured after 9/11 and imprisoned abroad, Bush insisted that they weren't tortured. Yet in the same speech, he worried that U.S. interrogators "could now be at risk of prosecution under the War Crimes Act — simply for doing their jobs in a thorough and professional way."

The implication was that the CIA might have engaged in activities that violate provisions of Article 3. The devil will be in the details — which will be spelled out in an executive order that will define rules for interrogation. Before writing Bush a blank check, Congress should insist on a convincing explanation of what the CIA would be allowed to do that would be forbidden for interrogators in the military — and why.

Thursday's compromise addressed another point of contention between the White House and the McCain group: whether military commissions the president has asked Congress to create could convict suspected terrorists on the basis of evidence not shared with the defendant. The administration and the senators agreed that defendants would have access to evidence made available to a jury, though some sensitive sources would be removed.

McCain and the White House didn't need to mend their differences on another issue — whether suspected terrorists can use the ancient writ of habeas corpus to challenge their confinement — because that avenue of appeal is choked off in both the Bush and Senate proposals. It should not be, and the Senate Judiciary Committee should make that clear when it considers that question Monday.

With habeas corpus, as with interrogation techniques and the conduct of military commissions, Congress needs to keep in mind not only American traditions of justice but the fact, noted by Powell in opposing a redefinition of the Geneva Convention, that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." Assuaging such doubts is also a matter of national security.

The President And The Law (1 Letter) (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

To the Editor:

John Yoo, a former deputy assistant attorney general in the Bush administration, acknowledges that President Bush's unique approach to the law, which the president has insisted is necessary to fight terrorism, is motivated by the "broader'' goal of strengthening executive power (Op-Ed, Sept. 17).

Mr. Yoo cites this goal as a reason the administration has fought a "pre-emptive'' war, "data-mined communications in the United States to root out terrorism,'' detained terrorists without "formal'' charges and conducted "harsh'' interrogations.

The agenda includes the reclassification of government information and the withholding of information from Congress and the courts, and has been buttressed by the president's "signing statements,'' which Mr. Yoo asserts claim the president's right not to enforce "unconstitutional'' laws.

In our system of government, it is the courts that determine the constitutionality of laws, not the president.

But Mr. Yoo takes his argument further, asserting that the president can ignore laws like the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act because they have produced "dysfunction.'' Indeed, according to Mr. Yoo, the president can ignore both laws and judicial decisions that he deems "wrongheaded'' or "obsolete.''

DOJ_NMG_0068209

These views are clearly offensive to our constitutional system. It is long past time for Congress to reassert its proper role in checking an executive branch that has so little respect for the principles that have sustained our democracy for more than 200 years.

Attacks Spark Tougher Guantanamo Jail (AP)

By Andrew Selsky
AP, September 24, 2006

The military is toughening a new jailhouse for suspected al-Qaida and Taliban militants to protect guards after a spate of attacks and evidence that detainees have organized themselves into groups to mount uprisings, officials said.

The hardening comes as U.N. human rights investigators are calling for closing the entire detention center on this remote U.S. base. But with the war against terror groups dragging on, commanders say they have no choice in dealing with men deemed enemy combatants.

Events in recent months have made Guantanamo officials extremely wary:

• Detainees lured guards into a cell in the prison's Camp 4 by staging a suicide attempt in May, then attacked with fan blades and broken pieces of fluorescent light fixtures, the military says. Defense attorneys say the clash was sparked when guards tried to search prisoners' Qurans.

• On June 10, three detainees in Camp 1 committed suicide. Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, commander of the jail, described it as a coordinated protest action — "not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetric warfare against us."

• Guards recently discovered detainees in Camp 1 were dismantling faucets on sinks, removing long, sharp springs and reinforcing them into stabbing weapons, Army Lt. Col. Mike Nicolucci said. Camp 1 has been emptied of detainees while new faucets are installed, with inaccessible springs.

From July 2005 through August, the military recorded 432 assaults by detainees using "cocktails" of bodily excretions thrown at guards, 227 physical assaults and 99 instances of inciting or participating in disturbances or riots.

"What we have come to assess is these detainees — these terrorists — are still fighting a battle," said Army Brig. Gen. Edward A. Leacock, deputy commander of the detention operation. "They're not on the battlefield but ... they're still continuing to fight to this day."

Leacock said hard-core al-Qaida and Taliban detainees have established a hierarchy of "military guys, religious guys ... the muscle guys, and they all have a role inside the camps."

The goal is to coordinate attacks on guards or organize disturbances, Leacock said in an interview with journalists from The Associated Press and three foreign news organizations Wednesday.

"There are people in the camps — we have identified them — that continue to try to foment problems within the camp," Leacock said. "Our effort is trying to preclude them from developing the plans that will cause ... any kind of uprising."

Leacock did not identify the leaders but insisted extra security measures were called for, even before 14 top detainees, including alleged Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, were recently transferred to Guantanamo.

Human rights attorneys contend detainees are treated harshly, including enduring solitary confinement for months. The lawyers also say that among the roughly 460 Guantanamo detainees are men who were swept up by U.S. forces in Afghanistan and elsewhere who never intended to do the United States harm.

Underscoring the military's toughening stance, a jailhouse in the final stages of construction on a cactus-studded plateau overlooking the Caribbean is being "hardened" into a maximum-security facility. Camp 6 was to have opened in August as a medium-security lockup.

The modifications have pushed back the completion date of the $37.8 million jailhouse, which has a capacity for 220 inmates, to Sept. 30. It will take its first detainees in mid-October, Army Capt. Dan Byer said.

As a medium-security jail, inmates would have had common areas where they could talk and share meals. The eight common areas, with gleaming metal tables and stools, still exist, but will be off limits to detainees under maximum security.

"Anti-jump fencing" is being added to second floor tiers, and a high-tech control room will allow guards to monitor the facility while sitting at computers.

Shower doors have been specially made for the modification. Inmates will be escorted to showers, shut in and escorted back to their cells when they are finished washing. As a medium-security jail, inmates would have been able to walk unescorted across the common area to the showers.

Camp 6 underscores the prison's increasing permanence, standing in stark contrast to the cages that housed detainees when they began arriving in January 2002. Vines now entwine the cages at the abandoned Camp X-ray, standing in knee-deep weeds and grass.

The United States has determined that about 130 of the current detainees are eligible for release or transfer, but the timing will depend on negotiations with their home countries.

"I think what we have here is an orange. What we're doing is squeezing out the juice and what we're left with at the end of the day is pulp that will just stay here," said Navy Capt. Phil Waddingham, lead officer here for the Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants.

"We have dangerous men here who should not be allowed back to the battlefield," he said.

Last year, Guantanamo's former warden held talks with "the council," an ad hoc group composed of six detainees aimed at easing prison conditions and conflicts. One of the things they agreed on was having traffic cones placed in hallways during Muslim prayer time, so guards would know not to interrupt praying detainees.

The council has been disbanded amid suspicions it was coordinating resistance efforts. Defense attorneys say some council members have been in solitary confinement for months. Guantanamo officials refuse to discuss individual detainees, but say no one is denied all human contact.

Leacock said that while the prayer cones are still used, the experiment of allowing a detainee negotiating group is definitely over.

"The council of six is no longer in session," he said.

AP, September 24, 2006

A mosque was hit by gunfire as members inside celebrated the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, authorities said Saturday.

No injuries were reported and there were no arrests.

A member of the Islamic Society of Brevard County stepped outside the mosque Friday night to use his cell phone when he heard several gun shots, police said.

The man, who was not immediately identified, took cover behind a wall as several rounds struck the building, police said. He then ran inside and told mosque members, who called police.

Authorities searched the surrounding area for suspects but found none. Police were not releasing many details of the shooting because the investigation was ongoing, spokeswoman Jill Frederiksen said Saturday. Detectives were working to determine a reason for the shooting.

Police will begin extra patrols around the mosque in Melbourne, about 50 miles east-southeast of Orlando.

Ibrahim Hooper, national spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said that while no motive had been determined by police, the shooting fit a pattern of incidents at mosques this year.

A bullet-riddled Quran was left outside a mosque in Chattanooga, Tenn., and an Indiana mosque was vandalized. There were other incidents at mosques in Maine, Arizona and Maryland.

"Worshippers of the mosque would obviously be disturbed if (religion) was the motive for the attack," Hooper said Saturday.

To Honor A Son Lost On 9/11, Parents Help Others Torn By Violence (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Bedford, N.Y.

When he was a child, there was something about the 10-day period starting with Rosh Hashana and ending with Yom Kippur that filled Stephen Alderman with a sense of wonder and of dread.

The holidays are called the Days of Awe. During that period, Jews are required to take stock of their life, to account for what they have done to merit inclusion in the Book of Life — their worthiness to live through another year. That seemed a thing of awful majesty and scary weight. It filled him with awe.

Dr. Alderman, a retired radiology oncologist, and his wife, Elizabeth, both 65, did not attend services this Rosh Hashana or observe the holiday in any way. They weren't very observant before Sept. 11, 2001, when their youngest son, Peter, attended a morning conference on the 106th floor of the north tower of the World Trade Center. They are no more so now.

Still, there can't be too many lives more in keeping with that sense of awe at life's responsibilities than theirs have been since their son, who was 25, died that terrible day. So, if they bear witness at the foundation they have established in their son's memory rather than in a synagogue, it's hard to argue with them. Because of all the redemptive tales that have followed 9/11, not many can surpass what the Aldermans have brought to life as a result of their son's death.

Victims of a trauma almost too much to bear, the Aldermans a year after 9/11 established a foundation dedicated to healing those even more traumatized than they were — victims of terrorism and mass violence in countries around the world — in Iraq and Uganda, Bosnia and Cambodia, Rwanda and Afghanistan, about 50 in all.

So they will spend their Days of Awe this year at a conference center in Italy, where their foundation (www.petercaldermanfoundation.org) will hold a training session for 35 professors and health professionals from around the world. Those in attendance, as part of a three-year program, will then go out and treat the torn psyches of people at refugee camps and in mud huts and teach others to do the same thing.

By the end of the year they will have trained more than 600 health professionals around the world, who will have treated more than 50,000 people.

"This is not about keeping Pete's memory alive," Mrs. Alderman said. "Only people who knew Pete, who knew his smile, will have any memory of him. You can't keep a memory alive, but you can do work he would have been proud of, work that really matters."

Battered and numb after 9/11, they soon began to look for ways to honor Peter's life. They had vague thoughts: a vest-pocket park, an endowed chair. And then the next June on "Nightline," Mrs. Alderman saw a show on the walking wounded of mass violence around the world, people with invisible wounds like theirs, only worse. These were the victims of war and ethnic cleansing and terrorism who didn't have a big house in Bedford, enough money to get counseling, any way to rejoin the living, to get out of their bleak shell of shock and pain.

And then it seemed so obvious. They couldn't do anything for Peter. But they could so something for tens of thousands of people — maybe more — around the world. It could help save people with scars like theirs. It could help save them as well.

So they contacted Dr. Richard Mollica, of the Harvard Program in Refugee Trauma, a leading expert in the field, and told him what they wanted to do. His ideas helped them create their foundation. It teaches local caregivers how to treat the depression and pain of people with wounds like theirs, using Western medical therapies combined with local healing traditions. They took the $1.4 million they had received as part of the 9/11 settlement, plowed the money into the foundation and set about raising more.

Now, there's a master class series, like the one going on now, dedicated to training caregivers who can both treat people and teach others how to do it. There are clinics operating in Cambodia and Uganda, with plans for more. There is the Peter C. Alderman International Society, one of the foundation's programs, to share research. There will be more.

As for them, the work has given them two things. The first is a link to something spiritual beyond their own lives, meaningful work, a sense of altruism. The second is a way for their son to live on, to be inscribed, if not in the Book of Life, at least in any accounting of those whose lives, however short, made a difference. “Peter died too soon to make his mark on this earth,” his mother said. “What we’re doing will leave a profound and indelible mark that Peter existed.”

Some Texans Still Cleaning Up After Rita (AP-Y)

By Paul J. Weber, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Sam Henry swept dead pigs off Highway 87 two days after Hurricane Rita tossed them there. Then his job turned really unpleasant.

He pulled double shifts for the Texas Department of Transportation, hauling trash and patching roads cleaved by uprooted trees. The long days worsened Henry's ailing knees but hastened the repair of vital infrastructure.

In some parts along the Texas-Louisiana border, it seems as if there never was a Category 3 hurricane that pummeled the region one year ago Sunday.

The story on Henry's street is different.

In his neighborhood, a cluster of families working jobs like construction and maintenance, rebuilding the rural swath of southeast Texas has come at the expense of their own homes. Many are among the few still living in FEMA trailers that flank their tarp-covered houses, which remain neglected following long workdays.

"You can't work seven days a week forever," said home renovator Sheila LeLeaux, who lives near Henry and has a monthlong backlog of clients waiting for her to gut their houses. "Some days I want to come home and kick a dog."

Rita landed in Sabine Pass on Sept. 24, 2005, packing 120 mph winds that flattened the coastal hamlet before splaying into East Texas and lashing western parts of Louisiana. At least nine were killed after the storm roared ashore, and thousands of homes in the mostly poor and densely wooded path of the storm were destroyed.

But the destruction was a mere speck compared to that wrought a month earlier by Hurricane Katrina. Even one year later, Rita is best remembered for the chaotic evacuation of Houston, which was far more deadly, killing more than 100 people in accidents and exposure deaths.

The Southeast Texas Regional Planning Commission estimates Rita residental damages at $2 billion — far less than the tens of billions in damages borne by Katrina, but still a hefty price tag to area officials.

Already this year, LeLeaux and her husband have six times the number of home renovation jobs the couple contracts in a normal year.

"And it's only September," she said.

LeLeaux, 41, hangs drywall and rips out floors for about 10 hours, seven days a week. Her toenails are freshly painted bright pink but she's embarrassed that she has no time to touch up the gray roots in her hair. Nor does she have a spare hour to clean her house or wash the pile of laundry on her kitchen floor — she now pays her mother $50 to do that.

The placard pressed into her front yard plugs "LeLeaux's Drywall and Painting," but her house serves as no advertisement. Half the roof on her garage is peeled off, and the other half is held up by slats precariously wedged between the floor and the remaining beams. The neighboring lot, which she also owns, holds a concrete slab with two standing walls and a pile of rubble where the living room would have been.

Neighbor Lonnie Prejean, 49, still hasn't touched his flattened garage that buried a truck and a boat.

"You try cutting trees all day and then come home to work on that," said Prejean, who spends 12 hours a day clearing acres of hurricane-toppled trees for Rogers Lumber Co.

Nearby, Henry's FEMA trailer is parked next to a simple square house rendered uninhabitable since Rita buckled the walls and pushed the frame from the slab.

"Everyone around here is at each other's throats a little more," said Nichol Bishop, Henry's girlfriend. "People are more stressed. Look around. The only people whose homes are fixed are retired. No one else has the time or energy at the end of the day."

DOJ_NMG_0068213

Orange County Judge Carl Thibodeaux, who's still waiting for his county's slice of the $74.5 million in federal aid awarded to the state in December, paints a brighter picture. To be sure, the county has come a long way since spending the first month without power and policing gas station lines that formed three hours before pumps were turned on.

The county still sorely lacks hourly wage workers because most low-rent apartment complexes remain uninhabitable. But repaired homes in West Orange outnumber the damaged ones, and Thibodeaux believes the county needs only about another year before the last blue tarp is peeled from a roof.

Thibodeaux, a former West Orange mayor, believes that some whose homes still require dramatic overhauls are the same residents who failed to keep up their properties before Rita.

"The storm has just magnified this," he said.

LeLeaux pays no attention. She said she'll eventually clear the wind-shorn trees and crumbled brick still piled high on her lot. She said she'll cook a meal again for her family, quit drinking the beer she sometimes opens before bed and cut back to just one pack of Marlboro Reds a day.

She just doesn't know when.

"Know how I relax? Relieve stress? I get a paint roller and paint a few rooms," LeLeaux said. "That's the easiest thing I've got going."

La. Cattlemen Struggle 1 Year After Rita (AP-Y)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Summer rains have brought back the coast's usual lush green grazing land. Life for Louisiana's cattlemen, however, is far from normal.

A year after Hurricane Rita, the cattlemen say they're still struggling, hampered because the storm tore down hundreds of miles of fences essential to contain their cows, bulls and calves. Even if the fences and the farm structures Rita also destroyed get rebuilt, the storm has forever changed a sliver of southwest Louisiana culture.

"It's not going to be like it was, ever again," said Mike Montie, 41, a second-generation cattleman who evacuated his family's cattle north before the storm.

Category 3 Rita struck here last Sept. 24, flattening Cameron and other towns, its salt water turning the lush grass to brown and killing roughly 30,000 cattle, according to the state agriculture department. The region's cattle farmers produce a tiny fraction of the national industry; the animals killed in Rita had little effect on beef prices.

But along with catching shrimp and drilling for oil, the cowboy life is a generations-old facet of southwest Louisiana's mishmash culture. Cowboys who live in and around Cameron used to run into each other at the feed store, tip their cowboy hats back, kick the dirt with their boots, and swap tips and tales about their cows.

With few of their houses still standing, the cattlemen have moved themselves and their remaining animals north.

"Everybody's so scattered out now. That's the thing you miss: seeing people, the gossip at the post office," said Bobby Montie, 67, Mike Montie's father and a lifelong cattleman from the tiny town of Creole.

Some have begun receiving checks from a federal agricultural program that reimburses them for 75 percent of the value of each animal, up to a total of $80,000. Many cattlemen lost far more; the relief money is not nearly enough to restore their herd. The National Cattleman's Beef Association and other groups have also been donating hay, feed and farm supplies.

But until they can restore their barbed-wire fences, the Monties will keep their cattle on leased land, about 25 miles north, they said.

On Saturday, Gov. Kathleen Blanco, the state's two U.S. senators and other officials gathered in coastal Cameron for a concert, party and a staged cattle drive to commemorate Rita's one-year-anniversary and to honor the cattlemen's recovery effort.

DOJ_NMG_0068214

The cowboys mostly ignored the politicians' speeches, munching on hamburgers and focusing instead on reconnecting with the friends they don't see much anymore. Several said they expected to continue putting up new fences, but won't move their animals back to the coast anytime soon.

Donnie Rogers, who lost about 100 cattle in Johnson Bayou in the storm, said: "Nobody's really got big plans to start up again until next year."

WAR NEWS:

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Fuels Terror (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The conflict spreads extremism and serves as a laboratory for deadly tactics, says a bleak analysis by 16 U.S. intelligence units.

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq has made global terrorism worse by fanning Islamic radicalism and providing a training ground for lethal methods that are increasingly being exported to other countries, according to a sweeping assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies.

The classified document, which represents a consensus view of all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, paints a considerably bleaker picture of the impact of the Iraq war than Bush administration or U.S. intelligence officials have acknowledged publicly, according to officials familiar with the assessment.

"They conclude that the Iraq war has made it worse," said a government official familiar with the document who spoke on condition of anonymity because of its classified nature.

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney repeatedly have described the war in Iraq as the central front in the war on terrorism and argue that Americans are safer as a result of the administration's policies.

The report, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," was completed and described to U.S. government officials in April but not made public. The document is what is known as a National Intelligence Estimate, or NIE, which is designed to represent the U.S. intelligence community's most comprehensive treatment of a subject.

The 30-page report documents an array of disturbing trends in the war on terrorism and focuses on forces that are contributing to the evolution of Islamic terrorist networks from centralized structures to an increasingly fragmented ideological movement.

"It paints a fairly stark picture of what we all know, and that this is a movement that is spreading and gaining momentum around the world," said the official familiar with the document. "Things like the Iraq war have given the terrorists recruiting tools and places to ply their trade and a training ground."

The official said the estimate touches on a number of factors fueling the jihadist movement, but that "the reference to Iraq was the main one."

A U.S. intelligence official who has seen the document said that many of the report's findings were outlined in a speech in San Antonio in April by Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the former principal deputy director of national intelligence. Hayden has since become director of the CIA.

Hayden did not single out the Iraq war in the speech as a particularly powerful force shaping terrorist networks. But he did acknowledge "the centrality of Iraq" and said the conflict there and how it is portrayed in Islamic media continue to cultivate support for the global jihadist movement.

In that speech, Hayden said that the global jihadist movement "is spreading and adjusting to our counterterrorism efforts, and it is also exploiting the communications revolution, the Internet."

While describing the Al Qaeda terrorist network as still the most dangerous threat to the United States, Hayden said that Islamic activists were increasingly identifying themselves as jihadists, and that they were "increasing in both their number and in their geographic dispersion."

DOJ_NMG_0068215

Hayden went on to say how factors fueling the spread of the movement, including "entrenched grievances — corruption, historic injustice, even fear of Western domination — leave many in parts of the Islamic world with feelings of anger and a sense of powerlessness."

The Bush administration has made the case that a democratic government in the Middle East would serve as a beacon to other nations, providing new hope to populations of disaffected Muslims.

"The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power," Bush said in his speech to the nation on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." He also said that Americans were "safer, but we are not yet safe" from terrorism.

Bush and Cheney frequently have dismissed suggestions that the U.S. presence in Iraq has inflamed anger toward the United States, arguing that U.S. forces were not in Baghdad on Sept. 11, 2001.

In the run-up to November midterm elections, Republicans in Congress have sought to emphasize their credentials on national security and fighting terrorism, uncoupling those issues from the war in Iraq, which is unpopular with voters.

In public testimony and unclassified documents, U.S. intelligence officials have for several years been pointing to the more troubling consequences of the drawn-out conflict in Iraq. In particular, officials have highlighted the anger that Muslim extremists feel about the U.S. presence in the region — which has also been one of Osama bin Laden's rallying cries.

Intelligence officials have also pointed to the flow of Muslims from other countries, including Europe, to Iraq to join the insurgency. Those who survive the fighting often leave and return to their home countries with dangerous new experience in urban fighting, bomb-making and — perhaps most important — credibility with other potential Muslim recruits.

Last week, the House Intelligence Committee warned in a report that the danger from terrorists faced by the U.S. was "more alarming than the threat that existed" before Sept. 11. The document also warned that Iraq had become a breeding ground for terrorists who might target other countries.

The April intelligence estimate was produced under the direction of David B. Low, the national intelligence officer for transnational threats. Its conclusions were first reported by the New York Times on its website on Saturday.

National Intelligence Estimates are produced by the National Intelligence Council, a group of high-level analysts from government and academic institutions. The council was previously based at the CIA. But following intelligence overhauls passed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, the council was restructured to report to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Hurting U.S. Terror Fight (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

The war in Iraq has become a primary recruitment vehicle for violent Islamic extremists, motivating a new generation of potential terrorists around the world whose numbers may be increasing faster than the United States and its allies can reduce the threat, U.S. intelligence analysts have concluded.

A 30-page National Intelligence Estimate completed in April cites the "centrality" of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and the insurgency that has followed, as the leading inspiration for new Islamic extremist networks and cells that are united by little more than an anti-Western agenda. Rather than contributing to eventual victory in the global counterterrorism struggle, it concludes that the situation in Iraq has worsened the U.S. position, according to officials familiar with the classified document.

"It's a very candid assessment," one intelligence official said yesterday of the estimate, the first formal examination of global terrorist trends written by the National Intelligence Council since the March 2003 invasion. "It's stating the obvious."

The NIE, whose contents were first reported by the New York Times, coincides with public statements by senior intelligence officials describing a different kind of conflict than the one outlined by President Bush in a series of recent speeches marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Together with our coalition partners," Bush said in an address earlier this month to the Military Officers Association of America, "we've removed terrorist sanctuaries, disrupted their finances, killed and captured key operatives, broken up terrorist cells in America and other nations, and stopped new attacks before they're carried out. We're on the offense against the terrorists on every battlefront, and we'll accept nothing less than complete victory."

But the battlefronts intelligence analysts depict are far more impenetrable and difficult, if not impossible, to combat with the standard tools of warfare.

Although intelligence officials agree that the United States has seriously damaged the leadership of al-Qaeda and disrupted its ability to plan and direct major operations, radical Islamic networks have spread and decentralized.

Many of the new cells, the NIE concludes, have no connection to any central structure and arose independently. The members of the cells communicate only among themselves and derive their inspiration, ideology and tactics from the more than 5,000 radical Islamic Web sites. They spread the message that the Iraq war is a Western attempt to conquer Islam by first occupying Iraq and establishing a permanent presence in the Middle East.

The April NIE, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," does not offer policy prescriptions.

"What these guys at NIC are supposed to do is to lay it out in very clear, understandable terms," said the intelligence official. "It's not the role of the NIC to offer recommendations." Rather, it "basically states the conditions" as the intelligence community sees them, he said.

This official and others would only discuss intelligence analyses on the condition of anonymity.

The National Intelligence Council is tasked with providing long-term assessments of strategic issues for the president and senior policymakers in the form of National Intelligence Estimates. Composed of current and former senior intelligence and national security officials, it is currently chaired by Thomas Fingar, the former head of the State Department's intelligence bureau and now deputy for analysis to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

An NIE drawn up in the fall of 2002 concluded that Iraq had "continued its weapons of mass destruction [WMD] programs," possessed stockpiles of biological and chemical weapons and "probably will have a nuclear weapon during this decade." All of those judgments, which provided the political and national security underpinnings for the Iraq invasion, turned out to be false.

As part of the intelligence reforms enacted in 2004, control of the NIC was transferred from the CIA director to Negroponte's newly created office, with a mandate to cast a wider net for information throughout the 16-agency intelligence community and among nongovernmental experts.

Negroponte announced last month that the council would begin drafting a new NIE on Iraq in response to a request from the Senate intelligence committee. That estimate is still in the early planning stages, intelligence officials said yesterday. But though the April NIE does not deal specifically with conditions in Iraq, many of its judgments emphasize the influence of the Iraq war on the spread of global terrorism.

According to officials familiar with the document, it describes the situation in Iraq as promoting the spread of radical Islam by providing a focal point, with constant reinforcement of an anti-American message for disaffected Muslims. The Web sites provide a narrative of a war with frequent victories for the insurgents, and describe an occupation that they say regularly targets Islam and its adherents. They also distribute increasingly frequent and sophisticated messages from al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, urging Muslims wherever they are to take up arms against the "Crusaders" on behalf of Iraq.

Both Bush and bin Laden now regularly describe the Iraq war as the "central front" of the global war, and both are depending on victory there to set the direction of future struggles far afield. Although intelligence officials believe bin Laden's ability to direct major terrorist operations has been greatly diminished, his status as the ideological leader of a global movement that appeals to disaffected Muslims has vastly increased.

The conclusions and tone of the NIE have been reflected in a number of public statements by senior intelligence officials this year. In a February speech at Georgetown University, Negroponte said: "My colleagues and I still view the global jihadist terrorist movement, which emerged from the Afghan-Soviet conflict in the 1980s but is today inspired and led by al Qaeda, as the preeminent threat to our citizens, homeland interests and friends."

In a sober and comprehensive address to an armed forces group in Texas in April, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then-deputy to Negroponte and now CIA director, drew heavily from the NIE judgments. If current trends continued, Hayden said, "threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide."

Before delivering the speech, an intelligence official said, Hayden spoke directly to the NIE authors, saying, "I want to make these points" to a public audience.

A series of intelligence assessments on Iraq since the faulty 2002 estimate have portrayed increasingly bleak prospects for democracy-building and stability there.

Even before the invasion, the NIC warned in January 2003 that the aftermath of regime change could include long-term internal conflict. A July 2004 NIE outlined a range of possible outcomes to the increasingly difficult security situation there, with the best prospect a government with only tenuous control and the worst a civil war.

National Intelligence Estimates have often sparked controversy, both for what they have said and what they have omitted. A 1997 estimate, the last on global terrorism before the 2001 al-Qaeda attacks, mentioned bin Laden in only three sentences, describing him only as a "terrorist financier" and making no reference at all to al-Qaeda.

The latest terrorism assessment paints a portrait of a global war in which Iraq is less the central front of actual combat than a unifying battle cry for disparate extremist groups and even individuals. "It is just those kinetic actions that lead to the radicalization of others," a senior counterterrorism official said earlier this summer. "Surgical strikes? Nothing is surgical about military operations. They tend to have impacts, affects."

That description contrasts with Bush's emphasis this month on offensive military action military battles in Iraq and elsewhere as the United States' principal road to victory in the global war.

"Many Americans . . . ask the same question five years after 9/11," he said in an speech in Atlanta earlier this month. "The answer is yes. America is safer. We are safer because we have taken action to protect the homeland. We are safer because we are on the offensive against our enemies overseas. We're safer because of the skill and sacrifice of the brave Americans who defend our people."

But "a really big hole" in the U.S. strategy, a second counterterrorism official said, "is that we focus on the terrorists and very little on how they are created. If you looked at all the resources of the U.S. government, we spent 85, 90 percent on current terrorists, not on how people are radicalized."

Staff writers Dafna Linzer and Thomas E. Ricks and staff researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terror Threat (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A stark assessment of terrorism trends by American intelligence agencies has found that the American invasion and occupation of Iraq has helped spawn a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the Sept. 11 attacks.

The classified National Intelligence Estimate attributes a more direct role to the Iraq war in fueling radicalism than that presented either in recent White House documents or in a report released Wednesday by the House Intelligence Committee, according to several officials in Washington involved in preparing the assessment or who have read the final document.

The intelligence estimate, completed in April, is the first formal appraisal of global terrorism by United States intelligence agencies since the Iraq war began, and represents a consensus view of the 16 disparate spy services inside government. Titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States,'' it asserts that Islamic radicalism, rather than being in retreat, has metastasized and spread across the globe.

An opening section of the report, "Indicators of the Spread of the Global Jihadist Movement," cites the Iraq war as a reason for the diffusion of jihad ideology.

The report "says that the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," said one American intelligence official.

More than a dozen United States government officials and outside experts were interviewed for this article, and all spoke only on condition of anonymity because they were discussing a classified intelligence document. The officials included employees of several government agencies, and both supporters and critics of the Bush administration. All of those interviewed had either seen the final version of the document or participated in the creation of earlier drafts. These officials discussed some of the document's general conclusions but not details, which remain highly classified.

Officials with knowledge of the intelligence estimate said it avoided specific judgments about the likelihood that terrorists would once again strike on United States soil. The relationship between the Iraq war and terrorism, and the question of whether the United States is safer, have been subjects of persistent debate since the war began in 2003.

National Intelligence Estimates are the most authoritative documents that the intelligence community produces on a specific national security issue, and are approved by John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence. Their conclusions are based on analysis of raw intelligence collected by all of the spy agencies.

Analysts began working on the estimate in 2004, but it was not finalized until this year. Part of the reason was that some government officials were unhappy with the structure and focus of earlier versions of the document, according to officials involved in the discussion.

Previous drafts described actions by the United States government that were determined to have stoked the jihad movement, like the indefinite detention of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal, and some policy makers argued that the intelligence estimate should be more focused on specific steps to mitigate the terror threat. It is unclear whether the final draft of the intelligence estimate criticizes individual policies of the United States, but intelligence officials involved in preparing the document said its conclusions were not softened or massaged for political purposes.

Frederick Jones, a White House spokesman, said the White House "played no role in drafting or reviewing the judgments expressed in the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism." The estimate's judgments confirm some predictions of a National Intelligence Council report completed in January 2003, two months before the Iraq invasion. That report stated that the approaching war had the potential to increase support for political Islam worldwide and could increase support for some terrorist objectives.

Documents released by the White House timed to coincide with the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks emphasized the successes that the United States had made in dismantling the top tier of Al Qaeda.

"Since the Sept. 11 attacks, America and its allies are safer, but we are not yet safe," concludes one, a report titled "9/11 Five Years Later: Success and Challenges." "We have done much to degrade Al Qaeda and its affiliates and to undercut the perceived legitimacy of terrorism."

That document makes only passing mention of the impact the Iraq war has had on the global jihad movement. "The ongoing fight for freedom in Iraq has been twisted by terrorist propaganda as a rallying cry," it states.

The report mentions the possibility that Islamic militants who fought in Iraq could return to their home countries, "exacerbating domestic conflicts or fomenting radical ideologies."

On Wednesday, the Republican-controlled House Intelligence Committee released a more ominous report about the terrorist threat. That assessment, based entirely on unclassified documents, details a growing jihad movement and says, "Al Qaeda leaders wait patiently for the right opportunity to attack."

The new National Intelligence Estimate was overseen by David B. Low, the national intelligence officer for transnational threats, who commissioned it in 2004 after he took up his post at the National Intelligence Council. Mr. Low declined to be interviewed for this article.

The estimate concludes that the radical Islamic movement has expanded from a core of Qaeda operatives and affiliated groups to include a new class of "self-generating" cells inspired by Al Qaeda's leadership but without any direct connection to Osama bin Laden or his top lieutenants.

It also examines how the Internet has helped spread jihadist ideology, and how cyberspace has become a haven for terrorist operatives who no longer have geographical refuges in countries like Afghanistan.

In early 2005, the National Intelligence Council released a study concluding that Iraq had become the primary training ground for the next generation of terrorists, and that veterans of the Iraq war might ultimately overtake Al Qaeda's current leadership in the constellation of the global jihad leadership.

But the new intelligence estimate is the first report since the war began to present a comprehensive picture about the trends in global terrorism.

In recent months, some senior American intelligence officials have offered glimpses into the estimate's conclusions in public speeches.

DOJ_NMG_0068219

"New jihadist networks and cells, sometimes united by little more than their anti-Western agendas, are increasingly likely to emerge," said Gen. Michael V. Hayden, during a speech in San Antonio in April, the month that the new estimate was completed. "If this trend continues, threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide," said the general, who was then Mr. Negroponte's top deputy and is now director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

For more than two years, there has been tension between the Bush administration and American spy agencies over the violence in Iraq and the prospects for a stable democracy in the country. Some intelligence officials have said the White House has consistently presented a more optimistic picture of the situation in Iraq than justified by intelligence reports from the field.

Spy agencies usually produce several national intelligence estimates each year on a variety of subjects. The most controversial of these in recent years was an October 2002 document assessing Iraq's illicit weapons programs. Several government investigations have discredited that report, and the intelligence community is overhauling how it analyzes data, largely as a result of those investigations.

The broad judgments of the new intelligence estimate are consistent with assessments of global terrorist threats by American allies and independent terrorism experts.

The panel investigating the London terrorist bombings of July 2005 reported in May that the leaders of Britain's domestic and international intelligence services, MI5 and MI6, "emphasized to the committee the growing scale of the Islamist terrorist threat."

More recently, the Council on Global Terrorism, an independent research group of respected terrorism experts, assigned a grade of "D+" to United States efforts over the past five years to combat Islamic extremism. The council concluded that "there is every sign that radicalization in the Muslim world is spreading rather than shrinking."

Report: Iraq Invasion Spurred Terrorism (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, September 24, 2006

A classified report prepared by U.S. intelligence agencies says the Iraq invasion has made the world less safe from terrorism, The New York Times reports.

The Times story was based on interviews with government officials and outside experts, all of them speaking on condition their names would not be used. The National Intelligence Estimate, "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," describes Iraq as a spawning ground for Islamic revolutionaries.

The report reaches different conclusions than those contained in documents released by the Bush administration that focused on the dismantling of al-Qaida.

The Internet has also become a haven for terrorists, the report said, taking the place of the secure base al-Qaida once had in Afghanistan.

However, the report concludes that al-Qaida has become less important with the rise of "self-generating" small groups that use al-Qaida as a model.

New US Intelligence Report Says Terror Spreads Because Of Iraq: Report (AFP)

AFP, September 24, 2006

A new classified US intelligence report has concluded that the war in Iraq has helped spawn a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the September 11, 2001, attacks, The New York Times reported on its website.

The findings contained in the National Intelligence Estimate appear to be in stark contradiction with claims by President George W. Bush and other top administration officials, who insist that Iraq is and will remain the central front in the war on terror.

Citing unnamed officials who have read the final document, the newspaper said that the intelligence estimate, completed in April, is the first formal appraisal of global terrorism by United States intelligence agencies since the Iraq war began and represents a consensus view of the 16 different spy services inside government.

The report "says that the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," the paper quotes one of the officials as saying.

Analysts began working on the estimate in 2004, but it was not finalized until this year, The Times said.

Part of the reason was that some government officials were unhappy with the structure and focus of earlier versions of the document, according to the report.

The paper said that previous drafts described actions by the US government that were determined to have stoked the jihadist movement, like the indefinite detention of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal.

It is unclear whether the final draft of the intelligence estimate criticizes individual policies of the United States, The Times pointed out, but intelligence officials involved in preparing the document said its conclusions were not softened or massaged for political purposes.

Why We Don't Have Enough Troops In Iraq (TIME)

By Brian Bennett And Sally B. Donnelly

Time, September 24, 2006

As the Pentagon weighs whether to put more boots on the ground, TIME examines the reasons behind the U.S.'s chronic manpower shortage

The scenes almost seem lifted from a different war: On a scorching afternoon in Ur, a neighborhood in northeast Baghdad, members of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade are on a charm offensive. The soldiers spent 12 months in the restive city of Mosul, before having their tour in Iraq extended to help in the U.S.'s campaign to pacify Baghdad. The unit's experience shows. They are alert but relaxed, carrying themselves with a gentle posture, weapons down, waving to the locals, talking with them. Kids hold hands with the Americans; an Iraqi mother hands a soldier her baby to hold. Locals invite U.S. officers in to sit and have glasses upon glasses of tea, orange Fanta, Pepsi and Arabic coffee. They don't go into a house without a few Iraqi soldiers who can better gauge if someone looks suspicious. Walking out of one Iraqi home, Lieut. Colonel John Norris, commander of the Stryker 4th Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment Tomahawks, enjoys a moment of guarded optimism. "Days like this you think, wow, they can really do it. If they can just stop the killing."

It's the glimmers of hope that make the realities in Iraq so heartbreaking. Residents of Ur say that with the Strykers around, sectarian murders have all but disappeared. Neighbors emerge from their homes to chat and allow their sons and daughters to play in the street. But the Iraqis and Americans know that such sanity won't last. Though 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have moved to the capital to try to defuse sectarian violence, the level of killing across the city remains as high as ever. That's because the U.S. doesn't have enough troops to maintain the peace in the areas they've secured, instead relying on Iraqi units who have yet to prove they can impose order. In Ghazaliyah, a west Baghdad neighborhood the 172nd Strykers cleared weeks earlier, violence has already gone back up to previous levels. For all the progress made in Ur, the troops know the cycle is bound to repeat itself there too. "We leave," says Sergeant First Class Joshua Brown, as his Stryker pulls out of Ur city, "and it turns into f------ Somalia."

Despite isolated success stories, there is a palpable sense that things are getting worse in Iraq. A U.N. report says a record 6,600 Iraqis were killed in the past two months amid the lawlessness. Major General William Caldwell told reporters last week that six weeks into the battle for Baghdad there was an upward "spike in execution-style murders" in the city. The two major challenges facing the U.S. — quelling Sunni-Shi'ite conflict in Baghdad while subduing the jihadist insurgency in western Iraq — have raised questions among officers in Iraq about whether the U.S. has enough troops to keep the country from falling apart, let alone achieve anything resembling stability. That perception was bolstered this month by a classified Marine intelligence report that estimated the U.S. needed an additional 10,000 to 15,000 troops to defeat al-Qaeda-led rebels in Anbar province. In an acknowledgement of the problem, General John Abizaid last week reversed hints of a drawdown by the end of the year, saying U.S. troops will stay around the current 140,000 in Iraq until next spring.

Will that be enough?

The experience of sending the Strykers to Baghdad indicates that more troops could help in the short term. A growing number of analysts in Washington, including some conservative supporters of the Bush Administration, have called for a substantial increase in U.S. troop levels to stop Iraq's slide into civil war. But expanding the total U.S. force in Iraq remains unlikely — military officials interviewed by TIME say that the U.S. command remains reluctant to make a major manpower boost. To some, that reluctance is indicative of the leadership's broader failure to heed complaints about U.S. troop strength that have been voiced by officers in Iraq for more then three years. "I know I could have used more forces," says a Lieut. Colonel who served in Iraq. "We could have held more territory... I asked, but I'm not sure the request ever made it."

The roots of the U.S.'s current troop shortage stretch back to the earliest days of the occupation. Despite projections by former Army chief of staff General Eric Shinseki that "several hundred thousand soldiers" would be needed to occupy Iraq after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and former U.S. Central Command (Centcom) chief General Tommy Franks chose to go with a much smaller force of 125,000. As the insurgency intensified in 2003 and 2004, government and military sources say Abizaid did not ask the Bush Administration to send reinforcements. The sources say that in at least two White House meetings in 2004, Abizaid told Bush he "had everything he needed." That may have been at odds with what he was being told by officers on the ground. "I wouldn't say [the commanders] lied," says a colonel who served on the Centcom staff during the first year of the war, "but there was some intellectual dishonesty."

Once the force levels were set, the military's complex schedule for mobilizing troops and moving them in and out of the war zone made it difficult to make big increases rapidly. "It was the failure to adapt after the fall of Baghdad that set the Army on [this] course," says one retired officer. "Once you start the process of sustaining a force of 130,000 it is hard to shift."

But that doesn't entirely explain why the shortfalls persist. Military sources say they don't know of specific instances in which Abizaid and Gen. George Casey, the commander of ground troops in Iraq, failed to forward requests for more troops. Still, a senior Army officer says the nature of the Army's command naturally quashes sobering assessments. "One of the big reasons you don't tend to ask for more troops is the culture. If a superior asks how's it going, you say, 'Going great, sir' " says the officer. "It's a can-do culture."

The commanders' tendency to portray the situation in Iraq in a positive light has been compounded by disagreements about whether more U.S. troops, at this point, would intimidate the insurgency or just give them more targets to shoot at. And though the U.S. has enough active-duty troops to accommodate a troop increase, doing so would cause even more pain for the families of Army and Marine grunts, more than a third of whom have already done a tour in Iraq. "No one knows where the red line is that will break the Army," says Washington-based military analyst Andrew Krepinevich, "But Army leaders want to make sure they do everything they can to avoid crossing it."

The military's focus is on pushing Iraqi forces forward to make up for the shortage in U.S. boots on the ground. "The U.S. needs to find out if the Iraqi Army will fight," says Krepinevich. And yet after two years, a good portion of the 300,000 U.S.-trained Iraqi troops on the front lines can't handle the security challenges in Baghdad; in many cases, their willingness to fight is compromised by their sectarian loyalties. During a recent patrol, members of the 172nd ventured to the edge of Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Kids threw bricks at the soldiers and one smashed a fake Molotov cocktail filled with cooking oil against the eight-wheeled armored Stryker vehicle. A military intelligence officer determined the kids were part of a plan by al-Sadr's militia to provoke an attack on civilians that would inflame the population. The next morning, a battalion of the Stryker Brigade organized a rendezvous with Iraqi troops, but the Iraqis never showed. "They failed," says a U.S. company commander. "It's the biggest operation in Baghdad and they failed. That's why they're here."

The question is whether the Iraqis can prove their mettle and win the trust of citizens before the violence spills out of control. For now, the best that troops like the 172nd can hope to do is prevent things from getting worse. At current troop levels, commanders acknowledge the coalition can only clear three neighborhoods in Baghdad at a time. Some military officials have floated the possibility of a "surge" force of fresh troops to try to contain the violence. But that's still a short-term fix for a chronic problem — one that has already exhausted the patience of many Americans. "You can do a surge of 30,000 to 50,000 once or twice, but in an insurgency it's virtually impossible to guarantee that one surge will mean victory," says the retired Army officer. "This is a slow-grind war." And it's becoming harder to know just what it will take to win it.

Bomb Near Group Of Iraqi Women Kills At Least 35 (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Hosham Hussein

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068222

BAGHDAD, Sept. 23 — A horrific explosion on Saturday morning in the huge Sadr City district here killed at least 35 people, mostly women and children, when a bomb detonated next to a line of women waiting to receive cooking fuel from a tanker truck, according to residents and officials at nearby hospitals.

Many of the victims were burned to death. Two dozen of the dead were women or girls, as were 26 of the 36 wounded, the hospital officials said. The blast struck at the beginning of the holy month of Ramadan, in which more attacks were expected, given what has happened in past years, according to American and Iraqi officials.

Elsewhere, four Americans were killed. One soldier died after his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb in northern Baghdad on Saturday. Two other soldiers died and three were wounded when a roadside bomb struck their patrol near Kirkuk. An American working as a State Department contractor was killed Friday during a rocket attack in the southern city of Basra, and a Danish soldier was reported killed by a roadside bomb in Basra.

A senior military official in Baghdad said some death squad members captured since United States forces began sweeps through the capital last month also worked for or had affiliation with the Ministry of Interior or other government agencies.

American troops have killed 25 death squad members and captured 215 more since the sweeps began, the official said, adding that most have not had governmental affiliations. There are now 23 militias in Baghdad, said the official.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicate nature of the issue. "There is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government."

After the Sadr City blast, a Sunni insurgent group issued an Internet statement claiming credit, and saying the bombing was retaliation for Shiite militia attacks on Sunnis.

Some residents of Sadr City, a huge Shiite slum in northern Baghdad, said the attackers appeared to have exploited the fact that Saturday was the designated day for women to receive long-delayed allotments of kerosene in the Dakhil neighborhood. Men were scheduled to line up for fuel on Sunday, but attacking on Saturday would be easier, they said, because women are often not searched before they join the line.

Some reports quoted the police as saying that the bomb was hidden in a barrel, or in a car parked near the tanker.

Yet Bassim Mohammed, a 40-year-old worker, said one woman pretended she had shown up to receive kerosene but instead carried a bomb hidden inside an empty fuel can. The bomb was apparently detonated by remote control after the woman left, he said.

"It was like an oven," said Mr. Mohammed, who was fighting back tears as he recounted the blast. "Bodies were burned everywhere. I saw seven bodies of small boys. They are just boys! They did nothing. Why do they attack us?"

The casualty toll was worsened, he said, because concrete barriers near the line made it hard for people to flee the blast and the resulting fire.

In another grisly attack, gunmen riding in BMW's discarded nine severed heads in a square in downtown Bayji, north of Baghdad. The gunmen clashed with the police before escaping, according to a Salahaddin provincial spokesman. One of the victims was an interpreter for American forces and the others were army recruits, he said.

A group linked to Al Qaeda posted a Web video on Saturday purporting to show the bodies of two American soldiers being dragged behind a truck and then set on fire, The Associated Press reported. The act was apparently in retaliation for the alleged rape and killing of a young Iraqi woman by American troops from the same unit, the 101st Airborne Division.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an organization of insurgent groups, including Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia — posted a previous video in June showing the soldiers' mutilated bodies, and claiming that it killed them. It was not clear whether video posted Saturday was a continuation of that footage, or why it was released.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi military said American and Iraqi troops captured a leader of one of the most vicious Sunni terrorist groups, Ansar al-Sunna, during a raid early Saturday morning in the restive town of Miqdadiya, northeast of Baghdad. The raid captured Muntasir Hammoudi Alaiwi and two other insurgents, said Brigadier Qassim al-Mussawi. The group took credit for the December 2004 bombing of an Army mess tent in Mosul that killed 18 Americans and four others.

Fiery Blast In Baghdad Kills 38 (WP)

Most Victims Are Women, Children

BAGHDAD, Sept. 23 -- A fiery explosion tore through a line of people waiting to buy fuel on Saturday and killed at least 38 people, most of them women and children, continuing the wave of tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

The horrific blast sent women engulfed in flames screaming through the streets. Two preteen girls embraced each other as they burned to death, witnesses said. Later, wailing mourners thronged the scene of the blast, which was strewn with the shoes of victims and a woman's bloodied cloak, and voiced doubt that the reprisal violence would ever end.

"We carry our death certificates with us now, waiting only to fill in the date of death," said Bayan Jasem al-Kaaby, 40, a minibus driver, after he was burned by the explosion that rocked the Shiite Muslim slum of Sadr City at about 10 a.m.

A Sunni Arab insurgent group, Jamaat Jund al-Sahaaba, or Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions, asserted responsibility for the bombing. The group said in an Internet statement that the attack was retribution for assaults on Sunnis in the Hurriyah district of Baghdad, where police said two mosques were attacked and five people were killed Friday.

"We tell the malicious Shiites that our swords are able to reach the depths of your areas, so stop the killing" of the Sunni people, the statement said, according to a translation by the Washington-based SITE Institute.

It was not immediately clear what caused the explosion. Jamaat Jund al-Sahaaba asserted that it had detonated a booby-trapped car, but witnesses said they saw a female suicide bomber, wearing a black veil that left only her eyes exposed, detonate explosives as she tried to cut into a line of women waiting for kerosene. The bomber pushed a cart carrying a metal barrel filled with ball bearings, witnesses said.

An Interior Ministry spokesman, Brig. Gen. Mohammed Salman, said at least 31 people were wounded.

By midafternoon, the street where the explosion took place was still littered with abandoned yellow, red and blue jerrycans. Bits of flesh flecked the muddy ground, and blood pooled in front of Um Ali's home, left by a woman who clutched her infant child as she bled from a wound in her neck.

"She mumbled some words incoherently," said Um Ali, 44. "Then she fell at my doorstep and died."

Local residents blamed the blast on Sunnis. "This is the work of the infidels who want to kill the Shiites with the help of the American forces and even this government," said a Shiite militiaman who identified himself as Sheik Mohammed.

Outside a hospital in Sadr City, a woman pummeled her face with her hands and shrieked the name of her dead younger sister Eman, the mother of three children.

"What am I going to say to your children and your husband? What shall I say? That I killed you when I sent you to that gas station?" wailed the woman, who refused to give her name. "I took her along to buy kerosene without her husband's permission. As we stood in line, I told her I had forgotten something and would be back soon. As I reached the end of the alley, the explosion happened and I was thrown on the ground.

"I got up and ran but could not find Eman. She was gone, nothing left of her," the woman cried. "What shall I tell my mother, or her husband, or her children?"

Violence also flared elsewhere across Iraq on Saturday. At about 5:30 p.m. in Baiji, north of Baghdad, six hooded men stepped out of their cars in the middle of the city, removed two large boxes from their trunks and then left the cartons behind, according to police 1st Lt. Musttafa Thabit.

The contents: 10 human heads.

Thabit said the victims appeared to have been either employees or contractors at the U.S. military base in Baiji. "This is the destiny of the traitors," read a note left in each box.

The U.S. military on Saturday announced the deaths of three soldiers. Two of them, assigned to Task Force Lightning, were killed when a bomb exploded while they were on patrol near Kirkuk. Another was killed after his vehicle was struck by a bomb in northern Baghdad.

In Basra, a State Department contractor was killed Friday by a rocket attack, the U.S. Embassy said. No details were released.

Bomb Kills 37 In Iraq; 3 U.S. Troops Die (AP)

By Hamid Ahmed

AP, September 24, 2006

A bomb claimed by a Sunni Arab extremist group killed at least 37 Shiites in Baghdad on Saturday as they stocked up on fuel for Ramadan, just days after the U.S. military warned that sectarian bloodshed could worsen during the Islamic holy month.

The group said it carried out the bombing to avenge a Friday attack by a suspected Shiite death squad on Sunni Arab homes and mosques that killed four people in a mixed Baghdad neighborhood.

Iraq's armed forces said they struck a blow against groups affiliated with al-Qaida in Iraq, announcing the arrest of a senior leader of Ansar al-Sunnah, a radical Sunni group responsible for attacks on U.S. forces, kidnappings and beheadings.

Al-Qaida in Iraq, meanwhile, put a previously released video on the Internet showing what it said was the group's new leader killing a Turkish hostage two years ago. The statement identifying the masked killer as Abu Ayyub al-Masri couldn't be independently confirmed.

The tape's release was seen as a possible signal by Al-Masri, who was named the group's leader after a U.S. air raid killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June and earlier this month called on Sunnis to step up attacks on American troops.

A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northern Baghdad, and two other American soldiers were killed and three injured when a bomb exploded near their patrol outside Hawija, 150 miles north of the capital, the U.S. command said.

A Danish soldier was also reported killed and eight wounded in a roadside bombing in southern Iraq. He was the fourth Danish soldier to die in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion ousted Saddam Hussein's regime more than three years ago.

The Sunni extremist group Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba — Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions — claimed responsibility for the bomb attack on Shiites in Sadr City, a sprawling slum that is home to more than 2 million people and a stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Police said the bomb went off as people crowded behind a kerosene truck to buy fuel for Ramadan, during which people gather just after sunset for a communal meal to break a daylong abstention from food and water.

Dhiyaa Ali, a 24-year-old college student, said he heard the explosion from his nearby home and ran to the street to help people. He said bodies and blood were everywhere.

"I went into the flames just to get anyone left out of the fire," he told The Associated Press. "I saw a mother holding her child, both of them burned and dead."

Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba blamed al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia for the Friday attack that killed four people in the Hurryah neighborhood, where a Shiite militia last week openly threatened members of the Sunni minority.

"This operation comes in retaliation for the crimes perpetrated by the Mahdi Army against our Sunni people in Baghdad," the group said, warning of more attacks. The authenticity of the statement could not be independently verified.

The killings came on the first day of Ramadan for Sunni Arabs. Shiites, along with the Shiite-led Iraqi government, were expected to declare Sunday as the first day of the holy month, a tangible sign of the differences separating the two Islamic sects.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, spokesman for the U.S.-led military coalition, warned earlier of the danger of Iraq's already severe sectarian violence escalating during Ramadan.

In Kut, a city 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, eight apparent victims of sectarian death squads were turned in at the morgue. Their bodies had been dumped in the Tigris River.

One person was killed and six civilians injured in Saturday evening in a northern Baghdad district when a motorcycle rigged with a bomb exploded, police said.

Caldwell also said a spike in attacks by al-Qaida in Iraq could be coming after the threat issued Sept. 7 by al-Masri.

The video posted on a Web site often used by Islamic extremists was the first purported appearance of al-Masri since he was announced as the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq this summer.

In a statement accompanying the video, the group said the masked man shown shooting a blindfolded Turkish hostage three times in the head was al-Masri. The video was originally released Aug. 2, 2004, but none of the three militants on it were identified at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0068225

Another al-Qaida-linked group posted a Web video purporting to show the bodies of two U.S. soldiers being dragged behind a truck in June, then set on fire in apparent retaliation for the alleged rape-slaying of an Iraqi woman by U.S. troops.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida, posted another video in June showing the two soldiers' mutilated bodies and claiming it killed them. It was not clear whether the video posted Saturday was a continuation of that footage.

Muntasir Hamoud Ileiwi al-Jubouri and two aides were captured late Friday near Muqdadiyah, 56 miles northeast of Baghdad, Brig. Qassim al-Mussawi, spokesman for the General Command of the Armed Forces, told The Associated Press.

The Sunni militant group has claimed responsibility for numerous suicide attacks as well as the August 2004 execution of 12 Nepalese hostages and a December 2004 bombing that killed 22 people at a U.S. military mess hall in the northern city of Mosul.

Insurgent violence continued. In the northern city of Beiji, gunmen threw the decapitated heads of 10 Iraqi army soldiers into a popular open-air market, police said.

The Washington Times/AP, September 24, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Sunni terrorists opened the Muslim holy month of Ramadan yesterday with a bomb attack in a Shi'ite neighborhood that killed at least 37 women and children who were purchasing kerosene to cook celebratory evening meals to break each daylong fast.

The Sunni extremist group Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba -- Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions -- claimed responsibility for the bomb attack in Sadr City, a sprawling slum that is home to more than 2 million people and a stronghold of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Woman May Have Set Baghdad Bomb (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, September 24, 2006

The holy month of Ramadan opened Saturday in Iraq with a bomb that killed at least 37 people, mostly women lined up for kerosene in Sadr City.

Investigators say the bomb, which set off a massive blast when a tanker truck exploded, may have been placed by a woman, The New York Times reported. Men, who were scheduled to pick up kerosene Sunday, would have been searched.

More than half of those killed or injured were women and girls.

A Sunni group issued a statement claiming responsibility for the bombing and saying it was a response to killings by the Mahdi Army, a Shiite group loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, The Observer reported.

Bassim Mohammed, an eyewitness to the bombing, told the Times that concrete security barriers may have increased the number of casualties by preventing victims from escaping.

Iraqi defense officials said Saturday the leader of one of the most militant Sunni groups, Ansar al-Sunna, had been arrested about 50 miles north of Baghdad.

U.S. military officials did not immediately confirm the arrest of Sheikh Muntasser Hmoud E'laiwi El-Jbouri, whose group has been tied to al-Qaida.

The group, whose name means Protectors of Faith, fought the U.S.-led occupation and continues to fight the new ruling government.

At least two coalition soldiers were killed by roadside bombs Saturday, military officials said. A U.S. soldier died in northern Baghdad and a Danish soldier was killed in Basra.

Baghdad Blast Kills 35 Waiting For Fuel (LAT)

By Raheem Salman And Doug Smith, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The dead include 22 women and eight children waiting in an alley to collect rations in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City.

BAGHDAD — A bomb exploded Saturday in an alleyway of a vast Shiite neighborhood where women and children had gathered to collect fuel rations, peppering victims with ball bearings and engulfing them in an inferno that killed at least 35.

Rescuers entering the alley wrapped themselves in wet blankets as they attempted to reach victims whose clothes were on fire.

"We were choosing those who we thought were still alive to carry them out," said Hassan Moosawi, 26, one of the rescuers. "Their flesh was scalded by the fire."

Police and hospital officials said 22 of the dead were women and eight were children. At least 36 people were injured.

DOJ_NMG_0068227

The attack in Sadr City, a poor, predominantly Shiite neighborhood of 2 million people, was a setback for U.S. efforts to pacify the capital, which has been ravaged by sectarian carnage and paramilitary killings since the February bombing of the Shiite shrine of the Golden Mosque in Samarra.

The alley blast took place as the holy month of Ramadan began for Sunnis and neared for Shiites.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had predicted an increase in violence during Ramadan, when Muslims fast during daylight hours. Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, violence has flared each year during Ramadan.

A buildup of U.S. and Iraqi forces in August briefly slowed the pace of killings in Baghdad, which topped 1,800 in July, but the rate has been increasing. On Friday, a U.S. commander said that although 4,000 additional U.S. troops were patrolling the city's streets, only a fourth of the 4,000 expected Iraqi troops had shown up.

While the rescue of blast victims was still in progress Saturday, onlookers vented their wrath at the Iraqi government and the United States.

One man, who declined to identify himself, argued that the increased presence of the U.S. military in Baghdad had weakened Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, which has provided security in Sadr City.

"Before, our youths used to search and protect the people gathering here, but the Americans started to detain them," the man said. "This is the result."

Sadr City is a major center of support for Sadr, who controls more than 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament. His militia has been linked to Shiite death squads and has clashed repeatedly with the U.S. military.

Another Sadr City resident, Hussein Radhi Khafaji, suggested that the neighborhood close itself off from the rest of Baghdad.

"We have the capability not to allow the Americans to enter our city! Neither the government nor the Americans will stay here," he said.

U.S. Army officials said Saturday that they had begun patrols in Sadr City, but out of political considerations had avoided a full-scale operation.

Observance of Ramadan follows a lunar calendar. Sunni Muslims began their fasting Saturday. Based on a different interpretation of when the new moon appears, Shiites will start Monday.

A shadowy group calling itself the Sahaba Soldiers said in an Internet posting that it was responsible for the bombing, and that the blast was a reprisal for attacks on Sunnis, including "forced displacements, burning of mosques, kidnappings and assassinations" by Sadr's militia.

The claim could not be verified. The group said it had used a car bomb, but the evidence at the scene did not support that claim.

Although authorities had not determined the nature of the bomb, some witnesses said they believed that it was detonated by a woman who mixed with the crowd.

Sadiq Abbas, 36, said survivors told him that a woman wearing a veil put a jerrycan near the entrance and beckoned others to come closer. "Then the explosion happened," Abbas said.

The bomb went off next to a door in one of the walls. The victims had carried jerrycans to the door, where attendants from an adjacent gas station dispensed gasoline for home generators and kerosene, which was being stockpiled for the coming winter.

The fuel erupted into a fireball.

"A teenager was burning," said Khafaji, 32. "He climbed this wall to fall on the other side."

An abaya, the black robe worn by many Iraqi women, was snagged at the top of the wall. Adil Rauf Miftin, 27, said it belonged to his neighbor, Bahiya Sultan, 55, a mother of seven who died, possibly as she was trying to scale the wall. A crumpled bicycle nearby belonged to a 9-year-old boy who also died, he said.

Hundreds of ball bearings from the bomb lay scattered around the alley, where the victims were trapped between two walls a few feet apart.

A prominent Shiite leader said the attack highlighted the desperation of the attackers.

DOJ_NMG_0068228

"Only women were there to receive the kerosene," said Hadi Amri, a parliament member and leader of the Badr Brigade, one of Iraq's largest Shiite paramilitary groups. "Attacking poor innocents who have no power is their strategy now."

In another attack in Sadr City, a booby-trapped motorbike exploded near a U.S. military convoy, killing a civilian and wounding six.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Army reported the deaths Saturday of three U.S. soldiers. One was killed by a roadside bomb in north Baghdad, and two were killed and three were injured by a roadside bomb in Hawija, in the northern province of Al Tamim. Their names were withheld.

The State Department also reported that an American contractor for the consulate in the southern city of Basra had been killed in a rocket attack Friday. It did not disclose his name.

Also in Basra, the Associated Press reported that a Danish soldier was killed and eight were wounded by a roadside bomb.

A grisly scene unfolded in Baiji, 120 miles north of Baghdad, when armed men in a car tossed a plastic bag containing nine severed heads into a marketplace. Identity cards in the bag named the victims as members of the Iraqi army.

In Tikrit, the predominantly Sunni Arab hometown of former President Saddam Hussein, Police Brig. Gen. Ismael Ijhian was assassinated by a group of men as he left the house of a friend.

In another development Saturday, Iraqi authorities announced the capture of a man they described as a terrorist leader whose group had claimed responsibility for several attacks in the north. U.S. officials had no comment on the report.

Maj. Gen. Qasim Almusawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi Defense Ministry, said a joint U.S. and Iraqi force had arrested Muntasar Hmoud Ilawi Aljiboori, head of Ansar al Sunna, and two subordinates in an area of orchards about 30 miles west of Baqubah. The same group said in an Internet message Saturday that it recently had ambushed 10 Indian and Pakistani pilgrims on the highway to Syria. It claimed they were agents for Shiite militias, and said the 10 had been killed.

The successor to slain Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi resurfaced Saturday in an Internet video.

In the video, three masked men are seen standing behind a kneeling man who is described as a Turkish hostage. Later in the video, a hand with a pistol appears and fires three shots into the man's head. The shooter is identified as Abu Ayyub Masri, named to lead the group after Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

U.S. Contractor Killed By Rocket In Iraq (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

An American contractor working for the State Department was killed in a rocket attack in Basra, the U.S. Embassy said Saturday.

The contractor was killed in an attack on the city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad on Friday, the embassy said in a statement.

"As a member of our embassy community, this American citizen worked toward assisting the people of Iraq build a stable, democratic, and prosperous country," said Daniel Speckhard, the U.S. Embassy's charge d'affaires. "On behalf of the U.S. Embassy and the entire American community in Iraq, I would like to extend our deepest sympathies to the family and friends of our colleague."

No further details were released.

Terror Group Denies Leader's Capture (MST/AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP, September 24, 2006

An Internet statement posted Sunday said that the leader of an al-Qaida-linked terror group had not been captured, contradicting an Iraqi government report.

Iraq's armed forces announced the arrest Friday of Muntasir Hamoud Ileiwi al-Jubouri, a senior leader of the Ansar al-Sunnah group, and two of his aides near Muqdadiyah, 55 miles northeast of Baghdad.

"At the time we deny this report," said the statement posted on a Web site used by Islamist militants and attributed to Ansar al-Sunnah. It charged that the announcement of the arrests "indicates clearly the weakness and bankruptcy of this government."

DOJ_NMG_0068229

The statement whose authenticity could not be verified, said "our jihad continues as well as our operations."

Ansar al-Sunnah's statement contained no information demonstrating that al-Jubouri or his aides remain at large.

The Sunni militant group has claimed responsibility for numerous suicide attacks as well as the August 2004 execution of 12 Nepalese hostages, and a December 2004 bombing that killed 22 people at a U.S. military mess hall in the northern city of Mosul.

It's Moving Day, All Over Iraq (NYT)

By Edward Wong

BAGHDAD

THE threats come in different ways: a telephone call at night, a bomb placed by a car, a bullet left on a shop counter.

For the family of one 23-year-old Sunni Arab, who insisted on being identified as Abu Ahmed rather than his full name, the threat came in a note delivered last December to the doorstep of the family's home in Shuala, a Shiite neighborhood in northern Baghdad controlled by the militia of the radical cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Abu Ahmed said his mother picked it up and began crying. "Leave the house and go away; otherwise we will slaughter you," the note read, he recalled. It had his father's name on it. The family fled to Ghazaliya, a Sunni-dominated neighborhood in western Baghdad.

So goes de facto partitioning of Iraq, with extremist groups forcing people to segregate themselves by sect across the country and within Baghdad. They are moving from neighborhood to neighborhood or city to city, a tide of migration that is hardening the Sunni-Shiite divide. The movements began in large numbers after the February bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra and accelerated over the summer.

The Iraqi Ministry of Migration and Displacement estimated that as of Sept. 4, about 39,000 families had relocated, the vast majority since February. That number was 44 percent higher than in late July and 10 times the total in mid-March. Many go to places where they can live with relatives. A few live in small camps until they can find housing.

The areas that receive the most migrants are either overwhelmingly Sunni or Shiite and thus less prone to sectarian violence.

Najaf and Karbala, two Shiite holy cities in the south, are popular destinations for Shiite families, particularly ones from Baghdad, which is plagued by insurgents, militiamen and criminal gangs. Many Sunni-Arab families flee to Falluja, a former Sunni insurgent stronghold 35 miles west of the capital.

That was where Turki Abdullah, 56, brought his family recently after execution-style killings began to rise in their western Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad. In one incident there last July, Shiite gunmen killed up to 50 people during the day after dragging them from their cars and homes and checking their ID cards to see whether they had Sunni or Shiite names.

Mr. Abdullah said he knew at least a dozen Sunni-Arab friends who had moved their families from Baghdad.

Friends who have stayed in the capital "tell us that the militias and interior ministry commandos carry out patrols at night and call through loudspeakers for the Sunnis to leave," Mr. Abdullah said in a low voice, as he stood in the hallway of a relative's home in Falluja. "They threaten the Sunnis by saying the families will regret staying in the neighborhood."

In recent weeks, tribal sheiks have been urging families not to relocate, and some Iraqis who had fled their homes are now returning.

But, "there is a huge amount of distrust," Mr. Abdullah said. "This is the start, and the end will be bigger than this."

Al-Zarqawi Successor's Video Shown Again (AP)

By Maggie Michael

AP, September 24, 2006

The man purported to be the new leader of Al-Qaida in Iraq appeared in previously released video showing him execute a Turkish hostage, the terror group says in a statement posted on the Internet along with a repeat of the recording.

If described accurately, the images would be the first of Abu Ayyub al-Masri to be released since the group announced that he had succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. air strike in Iraq on June 7.

DOJ_NMG_0068230

The posting appeared Friday night on a Web site frequently used by Islamic militants just as Sunni Arabs in Iraq began Ramadan, the Islamic holy month. U.S. officials have warned that attacks could intensify during Ramadan, and the video could be a signal from al-Masri to his followers.

The video, which the statement described only as "old," first appeared on Aug. 2, 2004.

In the video, three masked men stand behind a hostage seated on the ground wearing a tan shirt. The militant in the middle, identified in the latest Web posting as al-Masri, reads a statement in Arabic, then the hostage, Murad Yucer from Ankara, reads a statement in Turkish.

After Yucer finishes, the militant in the middle shoots the now-blindfolded hostage three times in the head.

The scarves make it impossible to identify the three militants. However, the statement says the execution was performed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Masri's militant name.

Al-Masri, a Sunni Muslim, has been relatively silent since taking over control of al-Qaida in Iraq — a sharp contrast with al-Zarqawi, who frequently issued audiotapes and even a videotape that showed his face a few weeks before he was killed.

A statement appeared in al-Masri's name shortly after al-Zarqawi's death and earlier this month an audio recording attributed to him was posted on the Internet.

Yucer was an employee of a Turkish company that subcontracted for a Jordanian company providing services to U.S. military bases.

Several Turks have been kidnapped and killed in Iraq and at least seven Turkish companies have announced their withdrawal from Iraq to secure the release of kidnapped staff.

Video Purportedly Shows Americans Burned (AP)

By Omar Sinan

AP, September 24, 2006

An al-Qaida-linked group posted a Web video Saturday purporting to show the bodies of two American soldiers being dragged behind a truck, then set on fire in apparent retaliation for the alleged rape-slaying of a young Iraqi woman by U.S. troops from the same unit.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida in Iraq — posted a previous video in June showing the soldiers' mutilated bodies, and claiming it killed them. It was not clear whether Saturday's video was a continuation of that footage, or why it was released.

The new footage came hours after the posting of another al-Qaida video, an apparent re-release of a tape showing the execution of a Turkish hostage — by the man purported to be the new leader of Al-Qaida in Iraq.

The images would be the first of Abu Ayyub al-Masri to be released since the group announced that he had succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. airstrike in Iraq on June 7.

Both videos appeared just as Sunni Arabs in Iraq began Ramadan, the Islamic holy month. U.S. officials have warned that attacks could intensify during Ramadan.

It was impossible to identify the bodies in the second video, but it was believed to show Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, who went missing after being attacked by insurgents on June 16 at a checkpoint south of Baghdad. Their remains were found three days later, and the U.S. military said they had been mutilated.

The video showed masked men dragging the corpses and later setting them on fire. Below the graphic footage is a subtitle: "The two soldiers belong to the same brigade of the soldier who raped our sister in Mahmoudiya."

The U.S military has charged four soldiers of the 101st Airborne Division — Spc. James P. Barker, Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman and Pfc. Bryan L. Howard — in the March 12 alleged rape and murder of 14-year-old Abeer Qassim al-Janabi in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. Sgt. Anthony W. Yribe is accused of failing to report the attack but is not alleged to have been a direct participant.

A fifth suspect, Pfc. Steven D. Green, was discharged from the army because of a "personality disorder" before the allegations became known. He has pleaded not guilty to rape and murder charges and is being held in a civilian court in the United States.

Mahmoudiya is an extremely violent region in Iraq in an area known as the "triangle of death" for the numerous attacks by insurgents.

The two slain soldiers also were from the 101st Airborne Division.

The video of the Turkish hostage first appeared on Aug. 2, 2004. It shows what has since then become an iconic scene of violence in Iraq — three masked men standing behind a hostage seated on the ground.

The militant in the middle, identified in the latest Web posting as al-Masri, reads a statement in Arabic, and then the hostage, Murad Yucer from Ankara, reads a statement in Turkish. After Yucer finishes, al-Masri shoots him three times in the head.

The scarves make it impossible to identify the three militants. However, a statement posted alongside the video says the execution was performed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Masri's militant name.

Al-Masri, a Sunni Muslim, has been relatively silent since taking over control of al-Qaida in Iraq — a sharp contrast with al-Zarqawi, who frequently issued audiotapes and even a videotape that showed his face a few weeks before he was killed.

The Army Vs. Spec. Richmond (WP)

By Anne Hull

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Edward Richmond Jr. says he was doing his duty when he shot a civilian in Iraq, but the Army convicted him of manslaughter. His father's mission is to clear his name.

GONZALES, La. E ddie Richmond's son got back from the war in June. He wanted nothing in the way of a homecoming, no yellow ribbons tied around trees, none of the piles of boiled crawfish that sent him off.

While other sons came home from Iraq with duffel bags that spilled sand from the desert, 22-year-old Edward Richmond Jr. carried release papers from an Army jail.

Edward had been among the first soldiers to be sent to prison for killing a civilian in the Iraq war, and among the first to walk out of prison. What waited for him was a parole officer in heat-struck Louisiana.

Ascension Parish was the same -- green and mossy lowlands afloat with Whataburgers, Starcuts, daiquiri drive-throughs and gas stations that sell hot shrimp by the pound -- but Edward was different.

He didn't like anyone standing too close. He slept on the floor instead of the bed. When he went through a box the Army had sent home, he found his uniform, infantry badges and ribbons. The vestments of a soldier's life. Edward put all of it in the trash.

His release coincided with a wave of investigations into U.S. soldiers killing civilians in Iraq. After an incident at Haditha, more than a dozen Marines are being questioned in the deaths of as many as two dozen civilians. Some blamed the fog of war or the stress of combat. Others said they only did what they were trained to do.

"War is not a pretty thing," Edward's father often said. "Things happen in a war zone."

The Army had trained his son to kill. Then Edward went to Iraq, and the Army decided he had killed someone the wrong way.

For two years now, his father has asked the Army why his son was prosecuted.

Even after Edward's release from prison, the 52-year-old Richmond's war rages on. He owns an air conditioning and heating business, and as he changed out compressors in the mosquito-rife back yards around Baton Rouge, sweating and heaving, Iraq was with him. He cited page numbers and footnotes from his son's case, like a record needle dropping down mid-song: "In Captain Morgan's statement on the 28th . . . "

Edward was a casualty of something, and so was his father.

In Gonzales, a large American flag hangs outside the Richmond house on two shaded acres. If the family feels any shame or anger, they keep it to themselves.

Eddie Richmond strolled into a coffee shop one afternoon and proudly told the owner, "Edward's home, he's healthy as a mule, he's just getting settled."

DOJ_NMG_0068232

But many in Gonzales know about the father's crusade against the Army. It is an awkward fight for someone who drives a truck with a decal that says, "Home of the Free, Because of the Brave." Eddie gets his news from Fox and his accent from the rural hills of north Louisiana. His own father was a decorated Marine disabled in the Korean War. He served three years in the Air Force.

What fueled his frustration was a cache of confidential Army documents he had gotten his hands on that described how another soldier in Edward's brigade with the 1st Battalion, 27th Infantry Regiment, had shot and killed unarmed civilians. But Edward was the one who went to prison.

There seemed little left to fight for. Edward had served his time, been dishonorably discharged, lost his right to vote or carry a firearm, and couldn't leave the state without permission from his parole officer.

The general who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq and convened Edward's court-martial, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, said he has faith in the military justice system. "If I were Dad, I would be focused on Donald Rumsfeld and his leadership, which took our great military to war without a strategy, with insufficient troops on the ground, which allowed chaos to rein in early 2004," Batiste said.

So Iraq was a mess and Edward was folded into the mess. This was unacceptable to Eddie Richmond.

Father and son shared the same name, but it was the elder Richmond who went by "Eddie" and his son the more formal "Edward." The son was always the guarded one in life, and he came home from prison burning with mistrust. At Fort Sill, Edward spent much of his time in a segregated cell for discipline violations. "You gotta understand, he didn't believe he belonged there," said Charles W. Gittins, a civilian lawyer handling his appeal.

It is impossible to know whether Edward wanted his name cleared as much as his father. He refused to be interviewed for this story.

His second week back, Edward got a job at a foundry outside Gonzales. He woke at 4 each morning and spent the next 10 hours near a furnace so hot that his boots smoked. One day his boss called him "jarhead." People knew his story.

While Louisiana sweltered and beer signs blinked in the windows of the bars where the Blind River Outlaws played "brain-busting, spine-tingling Southern metal," all Edward did was work.

His schoolteachers had always imagined that the exceptionally bright boy would be a mathematician or an engineer. His parents liked to say he joined the Army after 9/11, but Edward was less a twin towers avenger than an 18-year-old who needed a fresh start.

As a boy, he preferred playing computer games to hunting squirrels with his dad. He took medication for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. He competed on the math team and was described as a "genius" by two former teachers.

But Edward refused to follow instructions if he thought they were pointless. His father made many trips to meet with administrators at East Ascension High School, including assistant principal Gwynne Pecue, who found him overprotective but struggling to understand his son. At the start of 11th grade, Edward announced that high school had nothing more to teach him, and he dropped out.

He was involved in an altercation with some local boys the next year, and he was charged with resisting arrest and disturbing the peace. His next run-in was more serious. A few months shy of his 18th birthday, Edward was arrested with crack cocaine and marijuana in an undercover drug sting. After deputies swooped in, he punched an officer in the chest and tried to run. He was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of marijuana, battery of a police officer and resisting arrest.

Edward did a 30-day stint in rehab, passed his GED and enrolled at Louisiana State University, but he still faced felony drug charges. The military was his answer.

"There was the understanding that if you don't do this, the DA will prosecute you," said his attorney, Carl E. Babin of Baton Rouge. A soldier was born. The prosecutor did not seek a conviction.

A recruiter who worked in the Gonzales office at the time said Edward scored high on his tests and said he wanted to serve his country. "He had some problems, but it wasn't anything that we couldn't put him in the Army for," said the recruiter, who was not supposed to discuss Edward and asked that his name not be used.

DOJ_NMG_0068233

From basic training, Edward shipped to Schofield Barracks in Hawaii, home of the 1st Batallion/27th Infantry Regiment of the 25th Infantry Division. He broke his jaw in a bar fight and joined the headquarters company mortar platoon. In "Lightning Thrust Warrior" training exercises, Edward was chosen as best gunner and "hero of the battle."

His father counseled him about challenging his superiors. "Regardless of whether they are right or not, they are wearing stripes," he said.

"Daddy," Edward answered, "dumb people are hard to deal with."

For a kid from the middle-class suburbs, he could trash-talk like a thug, "but when he put on those glasses and buried his nose in a book, his whole attitude changed," said Sgt. Shaun Mittler, Edward's squad leader in Hawaii.

Sometimes he came off as a know-it-all. By the time his mortar platoon got its orders for Iraq, "everybody turned on him," said his buddy, Pfc. Frederick Sidney. "He would speak out. Everybody else was trying to suck up."

Spec. Richmond went home to Gonzales before deploying. Yellow ribbons were tied around the oaks in his yard. A photograph shows Edward at a picnic table giving his little sister a playful headlock. In another shot he is shirtless and handsome, with deep-set eyes and vacation stubble, staring steadily into the camera.

"I'm ready," he told his mother.'Frightening and Chaotic'

Iraq was cold and rainy when the mortar platoon got there in February of 2004. The mud was frozen around Forward Operating Base McHenry, a primitive outpost south of Kirkuk. To fend off sniper attacks, a 10-foot mound of dirt, topped with triple-stand razor wire, surrounded the base. Beyond the wire were outlying roads littered with bombs, especially on the way to Hawija.

"We didn't know anything about the people or their land," said Mittler, the sergeant. "We all had our finger on the trigger. It was frightening and chaotic."

Late one night, according to Army court documents, Edward's squad was briefed on a mission. Word came that high-level insurgents were hiding in the village of Taal Al Jal, possibly with weapons. The plan was for Alpha Company to perform the raid while Edward and the mortar guys set up a security checkpoint outside the mud wall of the village. Sgt. Jeffrey Waruch relayed their orders: Shoot any males fleeing the village, but check with him if possible before firing.

The raid started at daybreak. Edward could hear screaming in Arabic and English, and shotguns blowing the locks from doors. After the sun was up, cow and sheep herders from the village made their way into the fields with their animals.

A call came over the radio to detain all males leaving the village. Edward saw a cow herder in a field about 200 yards away. Waruch would later testify that Edward asked if he could shoot the man; Edward said he asked if he was supposed to shoot the man.

Waruch said no and set out for the cow herder, telling Edward to come along.

The man wore sweat pants, a baggy top and a head scarf. As the two soldiers approached with rifles and plastic flex-cuffs, the Iraqi became angry and began pointing back to the village.

Waruch pantomimed for the man to put his hands in the air. As the soldiers came within three yards of the Iraqi, Waruch told Edward to stand guard with his rifle while he handcuffed the man. Waruch did a quick upper-body search. As he tried to pull the man's wrists down to handcuff him, he resisted, and Waruch ordered Edward to raise his weapon to "high ready."

Edward would later say that Waruch told him to "shoot him if he moves," a statement Waruch would deny making.

Edward was at close range, but he flipped his rifle scope up, training its red dot on the cow herder's head.

The man stopped resisting as Waruch cuffed him, and the sergeant turned to lead him back to the road. As they walked on the uneven field, the man lost his balance and stumbled into Waruch.

A single shot from Edward's M4 rang out. The Iraqi dropped. Waruch squatted down, covering his ears.

Edward was pale and holding his rifle with one hand. He said the Iraqi had jumped at the sergeant.

Brain matter was seeping from the man's eyes. His cows were wandering away in the field.

Another soldier came up. Seeing the dead man's bound hands, he said to Edward with profane prescience, "You are f - - - - - ."

Edward had been in Iraq less than three weeks.A Soldier's Trial

DOJ_NMG_0068234

Eddie Richmond bought a $1,700 ticket from New Orleans to Kuwait, then caught military transports the rest of the way in. A hot, sandy wind swirled through the Black Hawk helicopter that carried him to the 1st First Infantry Division's headquarters in Tikrit. Edward's battalion, normally with the 25th Infantry Division, fell under the command of the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq.

As the months had passed, Eddie felt sure that the Army would drop its case against Edward. "I know my son, and he would not just shoot someone," he said. "How many of our kids over there hesitate and die?"

But the Army charged Edward with unpremeditated murder and scheduled his general court-martial in Tikrit in August. He faced life in prison.

The trial was held in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces near the Tigris River. At night, father and son slept in a room with some special operations soldiers. Eddie found it surreal: The same Army that was his gracious host was prosecuting his son.

He sat behind Edward in the makeshift courtroom. When the prosecution showed photos of the dead cow herder on a projection screen, Eddie felt a knot in his stomach. The man's name was Muhamad Husain Kadir. Part of his head was missing.

The key witness against Edward was Waruch. The sergeant testified that after he handcuffed Kadir, he patted him on the shoulder and said to Edward, "He's good, let's go." Waruch said he even saw Edward lower his rifle. Then came the blast.

Edward took the stand, wearing his desert camouflage and glasses. His accent dripped like the river parish he came from.

Edward testified that Waruch ordered him to shoot Kadir if he moved, so he raised his rifle and aimed at the man's head. Looking through his scope, he was unable to see Waruch put the handcuffs on. When he saw what looked like Kadir lunging at Waruch, he believed that his sergeant's life was in danger.

The defense tried to keep out a statement Edward gave a month after the incident, admitting that he was pumped on adrenaline and "had to know" that Kadir was cuffed "before I shot him but it just did not register in my mind at that time." Edward signed the statement after an agent with the Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID) told him he flunked a polygraph; he really hadn't.

Prosecutors goaded him. Hadn't it been obvious that a herder walking in a field with cows was not fleeing the village?

"You don't look at everybody as Saddam Hussein himself, sir, but until it is clarified otherwise, you have to be suspicious," Edward answered. "I mean, people are dying every day, so you have be suspicious of everyone, sir."

"Answer the question," the prosecutor said. "Did you or did you not assume that Mr. Kadir had escaped from the village?"

"I knew he had come from the village, sir," Edward said. "I didn't know. I hadn't formed an opinion based off that."

Two of Edward's fellow soldiers testified that he often talked about wanting to kill an Iraqi. But under cross-examination, they said most soldiers did. Edward's sergeant said he was one of the better soldiers in his platoon.

Waruch's credibility was also on trial. Staff Sgt. Marcus Warner testified that Waruch was a "compulsive liar." His nickname was "Shady Jay."

Eddie Richmond watched his son, admiring his confidence. Edward never second-guessed himself. "Daddy, I've done my job, and I did what I thought was right," he said. He believed he would be acquitted.

He was only partly right. The jury found him not guilty of unpremeditated murder but guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The prosecution was recommending eight years in prison and a dishonorable discharge.

Edward had one chance to address the court before sentencing. Instead of asking for mercy, he expressed a vague regret.

"If I had known everything then that I know now, it wouldn't have happened, and I am sorry that it had to come to this," he said.

The jury gave him three years, a demotion in rank and a dishonorable discharge. He was shipped to the Fort Sill Regional Correctional Facility, an Army prison in the hills of Oklahoma, where he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder.Sadness Turns To Anger

His father went home to Gonzales.

"You could see the mourning," said his friend Marvin "Bud" Ragland, a retired rice farmer. "His son -- his oldest child -- went to war for his country and was branded by that country as a murderer."

DOJ_NMG_0068235

But Eddie received something in the mail that would shift him to outrage. Inside an envelope with no return address were confidential Army documents. One page was stamped "Serious Incident Report." It was part of an Army investigative file, known as a 15-6. The subject was Sgt. Jeffrey Waruch.

Eddie sat in his kitchen and began to read. Waruch had shot three female civilians, one of whom died. Eddie vaguely remembered the sergeant being asked about it at Edward's trial, but the judge had limited the questions. Edward never mentioned it to him. The documents Eddie held in his hand -- sworn statements by Waruch and several other soldiers -- laid out what happened in detail.

Ten days before Edward shot the cow herder, the mortar platoon was riding in a convoy to Al-Abassi when a roadside bomb exploded. Soldiers began firing from the sides of their vehicles. No one was seriously hurt by the bomb, but orders went out to stop any Iraqis fleeing the area.

Waruch began running across farmland after a group of several Iraqis in the distance. After crossing a muddy stream in pursuit, he fired warning shots in the air and screamed for them to stop.

According to his written statement, Waruch said he was 200 yards away when one of the Iraqis knelt down with what looked like a tube-like object, possibly a rocket-propelled grenade. Waruch fired about five times, knocking down two bodies. This subdued the group, but as he moved closer, two other Iraqis suddenly started to run toward him, with one reaching into her clothes. He fired five more rounds.

Arriving at the group in the field, he saw that a girl was shot in the head and her pulse was gone. Another female was hit in the thigh and going into shock. Another was shot in the knee.

Waruch had fired on a mother and her two daughters, killing a 14-year-old. The survivors would later tell a reporter that they had been weeding a bean field and had started to run as the Americans ran toward them.

Waruch was initially cleared of any wrongdoing, but a second review found that he had violated the rules of engagement. The girl had been trying to surrender when she was shot. No weapons were found.

As a result of the shootings, the battalion commander ordered that the soldiers be retrained: no spraying of bullets, aimed shots only, and only when under hostile intent.

Eddie felt his eyes burning with tears. Whoever sent him the file wanted him to see that the prosecution's key witness against his son was under investigation for his own civilian casualties. As he studied the documents, he saw that one soldier had escaped punishment and that another was needed to pay for the platoon's mistakes.

Eddie wrote to members of Congress and the Army CID. When a reporter from the Dayton Daily News in Ohio called, researching a story on civilian deaths in Iraq, Eddie shared his documents and pushed the Army for more. Eddie wanted the same spotlight that burned on his son to burn on Waruch.

In May 2005, more than a year after the incident, the CID opened an investigation into the shooting of the three female civilians. Waruch left the Army early this year. The investigation remains open. Attempts to reach Waruch for comment for this story were unsuccessful.

Edward turned 22 in prison. He subscribed to the Wall Street Journal, gorged on science fiction novels and built muscle. He refused to bend to the will of Fort Sill, spending much of his time in a segregation cell for discipline violations.

"It's a mental war," he wrote his parents. "I'll be fine."

Eddie contacted Defend the Defenders, an organization that raises funds for the legal defense of soldiers and Marines accused of crimes in combat. It was founded by Merry Pantano, whose son, Marine 2nd Lt. Ilario Pantano, was charged with murdering two Iraqis but was acquitted last year by the Marine Corps. Pantano agreed to fund Edward's appeal.

Eddie slapped his truck with "Defend the Defenders" stickers and wore the group's T-shirt that said, "Who's Got Their Backs?" The war in Iraq roiled on, but for Eddie it was frozen on two days, 10 days apart, in February 2004.

Then came a break. In April, the Army's clemency board granted Edward parole.

When he was released in June, he had served nearly two years of a three-year sentence. He called from the airport in Lawton, Okla., and told his parents, "I'm a free man." They picked him up in Baton Rouge. He was pale but rock-hard from exercise, and still had a grunt's haircut.

DOJ_NMG_0068236

He soon received a congratulatory call from Ilario Pantano, the Marine acquitted of murder. In a sense they both belonged to the same fraternity of the misunderstood.

Edward told his father he didn't want anyone feeling sorry for him. He wanted to start over. But his father could not let go so easily. After Edward put his Army uniform and ribbons in the trash, Eddie retrieved them and took them to the charity bins behind the grocery store in town.

In Iraq, the Army has tried to make up for the tragedies.

The family of Muhamad Husain Kadir was paid $1,000 for his death.

The Army paid more than $4,000 to the family of the girl killed by Waruch, among them her wounded sister and mother, whose leg was amputated. The 1st Battalion commander wrote a sympathy letter to the family. "I ask for your continued support as we attempt to provide a safe and secure environment," wrote Lt. Col. C. Scott Leith. He closed by quoting the Koran: "We belong to Allah and to him we shall return."

The former 1st Infantry Division commander in Iraq, Batiste, is now the president of a steel company.

The chapter was closing, but not for Eddie Richmond.

"I just want the truth to come out," he said. As summer turns to fall, he wears his Defend the Defenders T-shirt, waiting for word on his son's appeal.

Jane, We Hardly Knew Ye Died (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

LT. EMILY J. T. PEREZ, 23, a West Point graduate who outran many men, directed a gospel choir and read the Bible every day, was at the head of a weekly convoy as it rolled down roads pocked with bombs and bullets near Najaf. As platoon leader, she insisted on leading her troops from the front.

Two weeks ago, one of those bombs tripped her up, detonating near her Humvee in Kifl, south of Baghdad. She died Sept. 12, the 64th woman from the United States military to be killed in Iraq or Afghanistan. Eight died in Vietnam.

Despite longstanding predictions that America would shudder to see its women coming home in coffins, Lieutenant Perez's death, and those of the other women, the majority of whom died from hostile fire (the 65th died in a Baghdad car bombing a day later), have stirred no less — and no more — reaction at home than the nearly 2,900 male dead. The same can be said of the hundreds of wounded women.

There is no shortage of guesses as to why: Americans are no longer especially shocked by the idea of a woman's violent death. Most don't know how many women have fallen, or under what circumstances. Photographs of body bags and coffins are rarely seen. And nobody wants to kick up a fuss and risk insulting grieving families.

"The public doesn't seem concerned they are dying," said Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University who has closely studied national service. "They would rather have someone's else daughter die than their son."

What's more, no one in the strained military is eager to engage in a debate about women and the risks they are taking in Iraq because, quite simply, the women are sorely needed in this modern-day insurgent conflict. As has happened many times in war, circumstances have outpaced arguments. They are sure to be taken up again at some point, only this time, the military will have real-life data on the performance of women in the field to supplant the hypotheticals.

Like most soldiers on the job, Lieutenant Perez, who will be buried at West Point on Tuesday, was focused on her mission, not on her groundbreaking role in a war that seems to have dispelled a litany of notions about women warriors.

For the first time, women by the thousands are on the ground and engaging the enemy in a war that has no front line, and little in the way of safe havens. In this 360-degree war, they are in the thick of it, hauling heavy equipment and expected to shoot and defend themselves and others from an enemy that is all around them. They are driving huge rigs down treacherous roads, frisking Iraqi women at dangerous checkpoints, handling gun turrets personnel carriers and providing cover for other soldiers.

It is not so much the job titles that have changed — the policy shift that allowed women to serve in combat support units close to the front lines occurred in 1994. Rather it is the job conditions.

"We are asking far more of our female soldiers than ever before in history," said Elaine Donnelly, director of the Center for Military Readiness, a conservative think tank.

But a line in the Iraqi sand exists. Under the 1994 Pentagon policy, women were still barred from serving in ground combat forces — infantry, armor, field artillery — but are allowed to serve as fighter pilots and on warships. In Iraq, women were not involved in the initial invasion; they did not clear insurgents from Falluja; they don't drive tanks or, in most cases, kick down doors in house searches.

They are also barred, technically, from "co-located units" that support combat troops. A woman can serve as a medic, for example, but not as a medic in a unit that "co-locates and remains" or accompanies a unit on the front line, like an infantry unit.

In reality, though, this so-called co-location is taking place, analysts say, although it is unclear how widespread it is. The Pentagon has stretched the language of the policy, mostly because there are not enough troops, men or women. It has done so because the language is fuzzy. An effort by some House Republican leaders last year to challenge the practice was beaten back by the Pentagon, which argued that it could not sustain the mission without women in these jobs.

"It says you can have female medics, but they can't see combat," said Capt. Megan O'Connor, who served in Iraq for a year and a half in the New Jersey Army National Guard as a medical operations and plans officer. "It's all combat in Ramadi. It's so gray. They put the rules down on paper. It looks good. It reads good. But for a commander to implement, it's impossible."

"The women were itching for it," she added, and accumulating commendations and medals for bravery along the way.

Ms. Donnelly said the Pentagon was openly flouting current policy and sending women out directly with combat troops, with no debate, no hearings in Congress and, so far, no consequences. She has no qualms about women, who make up 10 percent of the troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, doing the jobs they are assigned in dangerous circumstances. That is standard. But to send them out with combat troops is illegal, she said.

"I have enormous respect for these women," said Ms. Donnelly, who opposes allowing women into ground combat forces. "My criticism is not of the women in the military. They are fulfilling their responsibility to the greatest degree, and that, too, is unprecedented. The policymakers should not be ordering them into areas that are not gender integrated."

But the fact that the Army is successfully using women in this way is likely to lead policymakers to revisit the rule, some analysts say. "It's that policy that when this war is over is going to have to change, even if we have to keep women out of the infantry per se," said Lory Manning, a retired Navy captain who is the director for the women-in-the-military project at the Women's Research and Education Institute, a nonprofit public policy group. "The next door to open is ground combat. That's the last frontier. A lot of the social conservatives have powerful feelings about training mothers to kill."

Conventional wisdom has long dictated that women were not suited to the battlefield — too frail, emotionally and physically, to survive combat pressure. Men, it was said, would crumble at the sight of a bloodied female soldier, or put themselves at risk to protect her. The public would not stomach women coming back in body bags or suffering life-changing wounds. And mixing men and women — with all the sexual and emotional pitfalls — would strain the unit dynamic, which can lead to deadly mistakes.

Those sorts of arguments were revived last week when the former Navy secretary James Webb, running for Senate in Virginia, was reminded of his assertions 30 years ago that women could not, and should not, fight, assertions he has distanced himself from.

None of this, so far, has come to pass. "They are pulling their own weight and performing as well as men," Ms. Manning said. "And the American public is not any more upset about women coming home in body bags than men."

Mady Wechsler Segal, a professor of sociology at the University of Maryland and the associate director for the Center for Research on Military Organization, said succinctly, "If they weren't doing a good job, we would be hearing about it."

Certainly, women in Iraq and Afghanistan face different challenges, both at war and at home. Incidents of sexual harassment on military bases are common enough, and fending that off without offending peers and superiors is tricky. Sexual assault, while less common, only intensifies combat stress, leading to greater vulnerability. It also leads to new complications. What if your attacker is also the person you must defend, or must defend you?

A whole crop of veterans are suffering from post-traumatic stress and lost limbs, circumstances that sometimes prove more difficult for women who often fill the role of nurturers to their families.

And there are practical considerations. Women on smaller bases in Iraq often share sleeping quarters with men. Equipment in women's sizes can sometimes be harder to come by. Some women use newer forms of birth control to make their periods less frequent. Even urinating can become a problem. The military has disbursed portable contraptions the women affectionately call a weenus, for use on long truck drives.

Women also face resistance among some male commanders, who are not keen to put women at risk, some women who have served in Iraq say. But many commanders, they added, treated them no differently.

Capt. Tammy Spicer, who commanded a transportation company for the Missouri National Guard, said women were often being watched to see if they are up to the job. Driving trucks is dangerous work in Iraq, and her company drove a million and a half miles with no enemy-related casualties.

If anything was taxing, she said, it was in 2003 in Kuwait, when she and four other women shared a tent with 45 men. The women shared showers with men, on rotation, and always got the worst hours, she said. "Their bickering, their cursing, their body noises," she said, laughing. "They would leave their food out and we would have rats. There was no relief from men."

NATO Kills 23 Insurgents In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

NATO aircraft have killed 23 suspected insurgents in southern Afghanistan, the military alliance said Sunday.

A helicopter attacked 20 insurgents who shot at a NATO patrol in Helmand province on Friday, killing 15 of the suspected insurgents, the alliance said.

An attack helicopter fired on another group of insurgents who shot at a support helicopter in the same province on Thursday, killing eight of the militants, the statement said. There were no NATO casualties in the attacks.

In recent months southern Afghanistan has seen some of the fiercest fighting since the U.S.-led invasion toppled the Taliban regime in 2001.

Rockets Rain After Taliban Deal (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Since Pakistan signed a pact meant to defang the Taliban on its side of the border with Afghanistan, U.S. forces have been hit with "highly unusual" attacks there, the Daily News has learned.

Although stressing it's too early to gauge whether the Pakistani government's Sept. 5 deal with tribal leaders in the Waziristan area will thwart border-hopping insurgents, a military spokesman said the fighting has continued.

"Just in the last two days along the Paktika province border, we've had two series of a large number of rockets fired at a couple of our bases along the border," Army Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan, told The News on Friday.

Fitzpatrick said 78 Katyusha rockets were fired "from just inside the border of Pakistan" in two attacks last week on U.S. firebases in Gayan and Bermel.

Neither attack caused casualties, but he added, "To have a battery of rockets fired at us at our bases is highly unusual."

"We've been in quite a few firefights, particularly in the border region," Army 1st Lt. Shawn Parnell, a platoon leader in Bermel, said in a coalition statement.

The same statement quoted other commanders calling the Bermel district "a major infiltration route," where "engaging in firefights is almost daily life."

Since the Waziristan truce - which calls on tribal elders to ensure that foreign fighters live peacefully - the Taliban also has issued two statements making claims of 17 attacks along the border.

Some Afghan officials have called the truce a deal with the Taliban.

Asked about the deal last week, President Bush said Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf assured him it was a good idea, adding, "I believe him."

DOJ_NMG_0068239

But counterterrorism officers who have fought Al Qaeda in border combat have expressed skepticism to The News.

The 82nd Airborne Division is set to return by year's end to take over from the Fort Drum, N.Y.-based 10th Mountain Division. They will join 20,000 U.S. troops who have turned east to fight Al Qaeda at the border with Pakistan as NATO takes over patrolling southern Afghanistan, Fitzpatrick said.

Despite the Pakistani truce, military coordination has never been better with Musharraf's army, Fitzpatrick said.

Last year, red tape often frustrated U.S. commanders in Afghanistan from chasing ambushers as they fled into Pakistan. But a half-dozen times this year, Pakistani forces have nabbed or killed fleeing insurgents upon request, he said.

"The border is not a sanctuary anymore," Fitzpatrick said.

British Army Defends Itself Against Criticism From Officers (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 23 — For the second time in two days, the army defended itself on Saturday against charges by middle-ranking officers in Afghanistan that British ground troops had received inadequate air support and other backing in their fight against the Taliban.

British officers in the field have traditionally tended to keep their complaints within the military. But with many soldiers using e-mail messages and video technology, it is easier for complaints to spread, possibly beyond where the officers intended.

The army's statements came in response to critical e-mail messages from officers that were leaked to the news media. Military specialists have said soldiers may be voicing their concerns more openly out of fear that the British public is unaware of the ferocity of the war in Afghanistan. This month, television news aired video recorded on a soldier's digital camera or cellphone showing troops in desert camouflage fatigues and full battle-dress in a furious firefight with Taliban insurgents.

With around 5,000 troops in the restive Helmand Province in the south, Britain is part of a NATO force trying to subdue insurgents to permit reconstruction.

But as Defense Minister Des Browne acknowledged in an address this week to the Royal United Services Institute, a security research organization, "we do have to accept that it's been even harder than we expected: the Taliban's tenacity in the face of massive losses has been a surprise, absorbing more of our effort than we predicted it would.''

During his speech, he rejected suggestions that British forces were poorly supported, describing conditions in Helmand as "hard, dirty and beyond the experience of most of us to understand.'' Like other NATO officials, he said the alliance was making inroads into Taliban resistance.

But in two sets of e-mail messages leaked to British news organizations later in the week, mid-ranking officers voiced serious complaints. On Thursday, Maj. Jon Swift said in a message from Afghanistan, "The scale of casualties has not been properly reported and shows no sign of reducing.'' His comments were posted on a regimental Web site, but were quickly withdrawn, the domestic Press Association news agency reported.

On Friday, several British broadcasters quoted from an e-mail message written by Maj. James Loden. "The R.A.F. have been utterly, utterly useless,'' Maj. Loden was quoted as saying, referring to two instances involving Harrier warplanes during close ground combat.

"A female Harrier pilot 'couldn't identify the target,' fired two phosphorous rockets that just missed our own compound so that we thought they were incoming RPG's, and then strafed our perimeter, missing the enemy by 200 meters,'' he wrote, according to British news reports. RPG stands for rocket-propelled grenade.

In contrast to Britain's Royal Air Force, Maj. Loden said, the United States Air Force had been "fantastic.''

Publication of the remarks represented an acute embarrassment for the military leadership, prompting a string of rebuttals by high-ranking officers.

Sir Richard Dannatt, the Chief of General Staff, said in a written statement, "The way the R.A.F. has performed in support of our operations in Afghanistan has been exceptional. Irresponsible comments, based on a snapshot, are regrettable.''

The Ministry of Defense in London said of Maj. Loden's remarks: "It must be remembered that this is the opinion of only one man. The general view is very different.''

DOJ_NMG_0068240

In a television interview, Sir Richard also denied that the British authorities were seeking to underplay casualty figures. "We have got nothing to hide as far as that is concerned," he said. "The truth is what matters."

The officers' complaints reflect concern in the British military and elsewhere that, with 7,000 troops in southern Iraq, the army is overstretched.

On BBC radio, Sir Richard said Saturday that while the army was "coping'' in Afghanistan, it could not take on further deployments.

The debate over British troops in Afghanistan coincided with fresh displays of public opposition to the war in Iraq. Tens of thousands of protesters gathered in the northern city of Manchester Saturday, the eve of the annual conference of the governing Labor Party there, to demand that Prime Minister Tony Blair withdraw British troops from Iraq, then quit.

The police said some 20,000 people joined the protest, but organizers put the figure at 60,000.

The Key To Afghanistan: More Time (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

American commanders worry that Afghanistan is "the forgotten war" as it recedes into the shadow of the bloodier, more divisive conflict in Iraq. But they take some comfort from their relative obscurity: They need time, and they will take it any way they can get it.

The biggest challenge that U.S. and NATO forces face is not on the battlefield. It lies in building confidence in the country's rural tribes and sparse urban population that Western governments will stay deeply involved in Afghanistan for a decade or longer. If Afghans do not believe that, they are unlikely to take the risks of vast social and political change being demanded of them today.

In government-speak, this is called "pushing out the timelines." It means that Washington and other NATO capitals should accept the idea that they are providing a long-term military presence and significant development funding to Afghanistan as a matter of routine and strategy, rather than as a temporary military emergency.

Being "forgotten" in that sense is better than being at the center of the kind of urgent and partisan debate that Iraq has sparked. Whether the White House is willing to admit it or not, Iraq's particularities have eclipsed or altered the Bush administration's strategies of pushing democracy forward in the Middle East and of fighting the war on terrorism abroad rather than on American soil. The conflict there has become a war with Iraqi characteristics rather than an abstract struggle about greater goals and principles.

Afghanistan, on the other hand, still illustrates in fairly clear form the consequences and dynamics of fighting jihadist terrorist networks and their supporters in a failed Islamic state. Making a long-term commitment to Afghanistan as a matter of routine would require Congress to overhaul obsolete budgeting priorities that starve U.S. reconstruction and development projects. Europeans would have to fund expeditionary forces that are today ill equipped and ill trained for distant counterinsurgency operations. Both changes are desperately needed.

"Show me where the roads end, and I will show you where the Taliban begins," Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, says often to his staff. But while the United States spends about $10 billion a year to field about 20,000 troops there, Congress frequently rejects or blocks creative approaches to development and peacekeeping that would cost much less.

Recent NATO decisions to take greater command responsibilities and to put several thousand more soldiers into the country's most active war zones are seen by U.S. officials as promising signs of shifting attitudes in Europe. NATO currently has 20,000 troops in Afghanistan operating under a British general.

"As new commanders come in, they see the need to be building bridges and schools to buy space for development and to keep the Taliban out," says one U.S. senior officer. "That should generate requests back to their capitals."

Even so, managing expectations and hopes has become a major task for the United States, Canada, the European nations of NATO and the beleaguered government of President Hamid Karzai. The greatest Afghan challenge may lie in the fact that the very progress brought by five years of Western involvement stirs fierce resistance in a tradition-bound, poverty-stricken Islamic society.

The number of girls in elementary and secondary schools has gone from zero to 2 million in those five years. That is a stunning accomplishment -- and no doubt a great recruiting tool for the Taliban as it seeks to reestablish the savagely misogynistic version of Islam that helped tie it to al-Qaeda.

That is why "pushing out the timelines" is vital: Only when it becomes clear to Afghans that the changes brought by the toppling of the Taliban are durable and will shape their options a decade from now will they commit to building a more tolerant society. That is broadly true throughout the Middle East and Central Asia.

Afghanistan turned out not to be a model for waging the war on terrorism. The quick success that U.S. forces scored in the autumn of 2001 misled commanders and their civilian chiefs about what would happen in Iraq. The 2001 lightning campaign was not even a doctrinal model for what would come in Afghanistan: The United States has more troops there now than at any time in the conflict.

But how the long-term counterinsurgency is waged in Afghanistan will foreshadow the outcome of the broader struggle against jihadist extremism. The struggle there needs resources, it needs time -- and it needs never to be forgotten.

Our Five Iraq Wars (WT)

By James Jay Carafano, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

America has fought five wars in Iraq -- not merely one. And we've won or are winning four of them. Winning the last war, however, is all that counts. To cut and run now would leave America less safe than when we started.

War 1: Battling Saddam. The United States waged war in Iraq for one reason -- to remove Saddam from power. This was really a continuation of Desert Storm. After all, we halted the first Gulf war based on a host of promises Saddam made but never kept. Few doubt the United States, the peoples of the Middle East, and especially the Iraqis are better off with the Butcher of Baghdad out of power.

War 2: Combating chaos. Despite the scenes of rioting when the regime collapsed, America and its coalition partners managed to quickly avert a wide-scale humanitarian crisis. Although Iraq was (and is) hardly a danger-free zone, there was no mass starvation, floods of refuges, or disease outbreaks that usually accompany the aftermath of conflict.

War Three: Confronting al Qaeda. In the wake of the war, lacking any real success elsewhere in the world, transnational terrorists leaped into the vacuum in Iraq. In the first years following the regime's collapse, they accounted for the lion's share of murdering -- killing primarily innocent Iraqis. Even insurgent groups within Iraq that initially cooperated with al Qaeda in Iraq soured on the indiscriminate slaughter. Indeed, Ayman al-Zawahri (Osama bin Laden's deputy) warned that the terrorism in Iraq was alienating Muslims both inside and outside the country from the cause of al Qaeda.

Arguably, al Qaeda has lost in Iraq. Its most senior leadership has been killed or captured. Its popularity is low. And it no longer commands a significant following among the Iraqi insurgents.

War 4: The Sunni insurgency. The Sunni minority in Iraq largely abstained from the political process established to form a legitimate government. Democracy went on without them. Led by the other major groups, the Shi'ites and the Kurds, the Iraqis wrote a constitution, held a series of successful elections and seated an interim government. A Sunni insurgency first rose up to forestall the march of democracy. That failed. The insurgents then tried to force more compromises on the government. Over the last year, it appeared key Sunni leaders were giving up on the insurgency and were increasingly interested in negotiating a more equitable seat at the table and resolving key power-sharing issues.

War 5: Fighting the proxy war. Unfortunately for the United States, the wavering of the Sunni insurgency coincided with a decided increase in attacks by Shi'ite militias. These provocations have resulted in an increasingly cycle of retaliatory sectarian strikes between Sunnis and Shi'ites, as well as concerted efforts to kill more American soldiers using more deadly and accurate improvised explosive devices. This latest war may be the toughest to win because its principle authors are probably not inside Iraq. They are in Iran.

The most recent uptick in violence in Iraq parallels closely U.N. efforts to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear programs. Instability serves Iran's purposes. It diverts attention from the issue and undermines U.S. interests in the region.

There is a good deal of evidence to make this case. Weapons and funds to fuel the Shi'ite insurgency come across the border from Iran. In addition, Hezbollah, Iran's stooge in Lebanon, initiated a violent confrontation with Israel that also has shifted the focus away from what Iran's mullahs are up to.

Cutting and running in the face of this latest threat would yield only one result: It would empower Iran and make its radical government more aggressive, more reckless and more dangerous. That's obviously not in America's interest.

What the United States needs to do is finish the job in Iraq -- and that means strengthening Iraq's security forces so they can handle the insurgency. At the same time, it needs to focus on the other threats to regional stability -- helping empower the Lebanese government to disarm and defang Hezbollah and marshalling the international community to isolate and punish Iran for its adventurism.

That way, we can ensure that War 5 ends the same way the first four did.

Closing Of A Nation (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

It's an elementary principle of child psychology: safety leads to exploration. The child who feels securely loved at home will venture out and try new things. The child who is insecure will be more passive and cling to what is known.

What's true of children is true of adults, and in Iraq we now have a case study in human insecurity. The people of Iraq have endured decades of dictatorship, war, insurgency and civil strife, and the psychological costs have been ruinous. Iraq is the most xenophobic, sexist and reactionary society on earth.

Researchers from the invaluable World Values Survey have interviewed over 2,300 adults from all over Iraq. The results have just been published by Ronald Inglehart, Mansoor Moaddel and Mark Tessler in the journal Perspectives on Politics.

Inglehart, Moaddel and Tessler describe a people who, buffeted by violence, have withdrawn into mere survival mode. They are suspicious of outsiders and intolerant toward weak groups, and they cling fiercely to what is familiar and traditional.

The researchers asked the Iraqis if they would mind living next door to foreigners. In most societies, there is a small minority who say they would mind. Nine percent of Americans say they would mind, and in the median country internationally about 16 percent say they would mind. Ninety percent of the Iraqi Arab respondents rejected foreigners as neighbors.

As Inglehart, Moaddel and Tessler write, Iraqis "reject foreigners to a degree that is virtually unknown in other societies throughout the world, including more than a dozen predominantly Islamic countries."

Iraqi Arabs almost universally reject Americans, Britons and the French, and roughly 60 percent reject Iranians, Kuwaitis and Jordanians, the groups they are least hostile to.

Iraqis also viscerally resist social reform and deviation from the traditional ways of doing things. For example, 93 percent of Arab Iraqis said men made better leaders than women, the highest proportion of any group in the world.

Iraqi Arabs were asked which values they would like to instill in their children. They emphasized "obedience" and "religious faith" more than any of the 80 other societies that have been studied. They were less likely to try to instill "independence" in their children than people in 74 of the study's 80 societies.

Meanwhile, Iraqis cling fiercely to their primal identities. Roughly 86 percent of the Arab Iraqis said they were very proud to be Iraqi, and the Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds were very likely to trust members of their own community. Such in-group solidarity is almost without precedent.

Iraqi Kurds stood apart from the world in all these various measures, but Iraqi Arabs stood apart even more. This suggests that Saddam's tyranny had already had a corrosive effect on Iraqi society by 1991, when the Kurds were effectively liberated, but over the past 15 years, things have become much worse. It's impossible to tell how much of the trauma has been caused since the American invasion.

We do know, however, that American policy makers were surprised to learn how religious Iraqi society had become during the 1990's. (Iraqi exiles had not prepared them for this.) And we also know this climate of opinion works against the Iraqi leaders as they try to create a functioning nation.

In essence, Iraqis are like turtles trying to pull into their shells, but the big tasks now require non-shell behavior. They require getting Shiites and Sunnis to trust each other enough to negotiate a settlement on sharing oil revenue. They require getting Shiite policemen to crack down on their own, and on Moktada al-Sadr's Shiite militia.

The larger lesson, as we think about future efforts to reform the Middle East and combat extremism, is that the Chinese model probably works best. That is, it's best to champion economic reform before political reform.

We know from a wealth of historical experience that when people see their standard of living rise, they reject the reactionary survival mentality and they become more open to others and to change. If people already see their lives improving materially, they will be more likely to keep their cool as their political institutions are reinvented.

In the age of terror, statesmanship means knowing how to create a sense of security so you can lead people on a voyage of reform. Most of all, it means that if you're going to do nation-building, you have to understand the values of the people you're going to build a nation with.

Stuff Happens Again In Baghdad (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

IT'S not just about torture. Even if there had never been an Abu Ghraib, a Guantánamo or an American president determined to rewrite the Geneva Conventions, America would still be losing the war for hearts and minds in the Arab world. Our first major defeat in that war happened at the dawn of the Iraq occupation, before "detainee abuse" entered our language: the "Stuff happens!" moment at the National Museum in Baghdad.

Three and a half years later, have we learned anything? You have to wonder. As the looting of the museum was the first clear warning of disasters soon to come, so the stuff that's happening at the museum today is a grim indicator of where we're headed in Iraq: America is empowering the very Islamic radicals this war was supposed to smite. But even now we seem to be averting our eyes from reality on the ground in Baghdad.

Our blindness back in April 2003 seems ludicrous in retrospect. As the looting flared, an oblivious President Bush told the Iraqi people in a televised address that they were "the heirs of a great civilization that contributes to all humanity." Our actions — or, more accurately, our inaction as the artifacts of that great civilization were carted away — spoke louder than those pretty words. As Fred Ikle, the Reagan administration Pentagon policy chief, puts it in Thomas Ricks's "Fiasco," "America lost most of its prestige and respect in that episode."

That disaster might have been mitigated if our leaders had not dismissed the whole episode as a triviality. But Donald Rumsfeld likened the chaos to the aftermath of a soccer game and joked that television was exaggerating the story by recycling video of a single looter with a vase. Gen. Richard Myers defended our failure to intervene as "a matter of priorities" (we had protected the oil ministry). Lt. Gen. William Wallace, countering a wildly inflated early claim by a former museum employee that 170,000 artifacts had been destroyed, put the number of objects still unaccounted for at "as few as 17." (The actual number was closer to 14,000.)

The war's many cheerleaders in the press fell into line. In keeping with the mood of the time, administration enforcers like Charles Krauthammer and Andrew Sullivan damned Mr. Rumsfeld's critics as fatuous aesthetes exploiting a passing incident to denigrate the liberation of Iraq. In a column in Salon titled "Idiocy of the Week" (that idiot would be me), Mr. Sullivan asked rhetorically who was right about "the alleged ransacking" of the museum, Mr. Rumsfeld or his critics? "Rummy, of course. He almost always is."

Of course, dear old Rummy's what-me-worry take on the museum was the tip-off to how he would be wrong about everything that would follow: he reacted with exactly the same disdain and indifference to the insurgency happening under his own nose and to Abu Ghraib. There would be a hasty corrective to the looting, at least: a heroic Marine Reserve colonel, Matthew Bogdanos, commanded a team that ultimately tracked down a bit more than a third of the vanished objects. (It was too late to rescue tens of thousands of additional treasures in Iraq's National Library and National Archives, both also looted and torched.) But Mr. Rumsfeld's "Stuff happens!" proved indelible because it so resonantly set forth an enduring theme of the occupation: that the Americans in charge of Iraq were contemptuous of the local populace to whom they were so grandly bequeathing democracy and other fruits of civilization.

The cavalier American reaction to the museum looting was mimicked in the $22 billion reconstruction effort, an orgy of corruption and waste that still hasn't brought Iraqis reliable electricity. In a new account of the civilian nation-builders in the Green Zone, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," Rajiv Chandrasekaran of The Washington Post details how L. Paul Bremer III and his underlings enlisted cronies and apparatchiks rather than those who might actually know anything about the country's people or their needs. Thus we saddled Iraq with Bernie Kerik, G.O.P. fund-raisers and politically connected young ideologues chosen over more qualified job applicants who knew Arabic. They saw Iraq as a guinea pig for irrelevant (and doomed) experiments, including an antismoking campaign and an elaborate American-style stock exchange. Mr. Chandrasekaran's book, while nonfiction, is as chilling an indictment of America's tragic cultural myopia as Graham Greene's prescient 1955 novel of the American debacle in Indochina, "The Quiet American."

Our public diplomacy efforts were equally tone-deaf to Iraqis and their neighbors. In the early going, the State Department hired a Madison Avenue whiz who made sunny TV testimonials about America's love of Muslims. These ads won no hearts or minds, but wasted tons of money and even more valuable time. Now this job belongs to Karen Hughes, the presidential flack, whose patronizing photo-op tour of the region last year earned mostly ridicule.

Our broadcasting outreach there is supervised by a longtime Karl Rove pal, Kenneth Tomlinson, who last month was found by State Department investigators to be using his office — literally — to run a "horse-racing operation." One of Mr. Tomlinson's thoroughbreds is named Karzai, in supposed honor of the Afghan president. If that's his idea of lifting America's image in the Muslim world, he might as well be on Al Jazeera's payroll. On Wednesday, ABC News reported the bottom line of such P.R. misfires: a confidential Pentagon survey found that 75 percent of Iraq's Sunni Muslims support the insurgency, up from 14 percent in 2003.

Speaking before the United Nations last week in what may be the run-up to our new war, Mr. Bush was still on his battle-for-civilization kick, flattering Iranians much as he has the Iraqis. "We admire your rich history, your vibrant culture, and your many contributions to civilization," he said. All Iranians have to do is look to the Baghdad museum today to see that such words are worth no more now than they were in 2003.

It's symbolic of the anarchy throughout Iraq's capital that the museum's entrances are now sealed with concrete to keep out new hordes of killers and thieves. But the violence, which seems to spiral with each declaration of a new security crackdown, is old news. More revealing is the other half of the museum's current plight: it is now in the hands of Iraq's version of the Taliban. That sad denouement is another symbol, standing for our defeat in the larger war of ideas.

The museum changed hands in August, when Donny George, its longtime administrator and the chairman of Iraq's official antiquities board, fled the country fearing for his life and for the treasures in his care, both at the museum and the country's many archaeological sites. Mr. George is a Christian and had good reason to fear. The new government minister placed in charge of the museum, a dentist, is an acolyte of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose goal is to make Iraq a fundamentalist theocracy. To Mr. Sadr and his followers, the museum's legendary pre-Islam antiquities, harking back to the ancient civilizations of Mesopotamia, are infidels' idols to be sacked.

You might think, given Mr. Sadr's radicalism, that he is a fugitive terrorist on the lam as, say, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was. After all, Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, is a font of death squads at the heart of the sectarian warfare; he's an enthusiastic ally of Hezbollah besides. But he is instead a major player in the "democracy" we have installed in Iraq, controlling at least 30 of 275 seats in the Parliament and six government ministries, including the power centers of transportation and health.

Back in 2004, the Americans made plans to take down Mr. Sadr, but as Larry Diamond, a senior adviser to the coalition authority in Baghdad, writes in his book "Squandered Victory," those plans were shelved for "various reasons, including political calculations in Washington." American forces arrested some Sadr aides last week, but such periodic skirmishes notwithstanding, his influence continues to grow. He is a crucial ally of the prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, who would not be in office without his support. In the past few days, both Tony Snow and Condi Rice have been reaffirming that the administration has what the secretary of state called "enormous confidence" in Mr. Maliki, despite Washington chatter to the contrary.

One of the first Westerners to warn strongly of the dangers of someone like Mr. Sadr was Gertrude Bell (1868-1926), the legendary archaeologist, explorer, author and British political officer who masterminded the unlikely cobbling together of the modern Iraq state after World War I. She warned that a Shiite theocracy in the new country would be "the very devil." As it happened, it was also Bell who created the Iraqi National Museum in 1923.

The fortunes of her museum, once considered the finest in the Middle East, have been synonymous with the fate of Iraq ever since. That's because, like any such national institution, it is not merely some building that houses art but a repository of a country's heart and soul. That America has stood helplessly by as Mr. Sadr folds the museum into his orbit of power is as ominous a predictor of what lies ahead in this war as was our callous reaction to the looting of 2003. For all of America's talk of stamping out a "murderous ideology" and promoting civilization and democracy in Iraq, we are now handing the very devil the keys.

THE GREATEST STORY EVER SOLD

The Decline and Fall of Truth from 9/11 to Katrina

By Frank Rich

Penguin Press. 341 pp. $25.95

Throughout George W. Bush's presidency, no columnist has been more perceptive than Frank Rich of the New York Times. A longtime film and drama critic, Rich, for the past decade, has used his insights into performance and stagecraft to explain a political culture increasingly dominated by simulation and spectacle.

Exploring the news each week through the lens of pop culture -- the film "United 93" or the TV show "24," for example -- Rich teases out implications that escape straight-news pundits. The technique allows him to illuminate not only the submerged political currents of mass entertainment but also the theatricality of Washington politics today.

Now Rich has written The Greatest Story Ever Sold , a gripping, witty and devastating indictment of President Bush's reliance on public relations to market his Iraq and counterterrorism policies. Future historians will turn to other works -- by James Bamford, Thomas E. Ricks, James Risen, Ron Suskind and Bob Woodward -- to understand White House and Pentagon decision-making after 9/11. But Rich's overview will be indispensable for grasping how Americans experienced the events of these years.

For those who have largely opposed Bush's policies, reading Rich's book summons up familiar feelings of outrage and helplessness. Those readers who have tipped from being Bush supporters to critics may gain some wisdom into why they were originally led astray. And even die-hard Bushies may appreciate this volume as a shrewd study in the history of political PR -- if, that is, they can get past Rich's wry, withering tone.

As in his columns, Rich uses cultural touchstones such as Philip Roth's novel The Plot Against America and the movie "Chicago" to help us see how populist demagoguery works or how a huckster can con a press pack. But the book's core is a survey of the White House spins and shams since 9/11, including then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's "mushroom cloud" scare tactics, Colin Powell's Adlai Stevenson impersonation at the United Nations and, of course, Bush's May 2003 "Mission Accomplished" declaration on the flight deck. Rich deftly arranges these and other public moments alongside cases of secret government propaganda -- the payola to working journalists, the fake "video news releases" slipped into local TV news shows -- to construct a persuasive picture of an administration bent on creating "our own reality," as one Bush aide famously put it.

Rich does let a few people off the hook. He's too easy on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who, while fashioning himself as the second coming of Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox, has abetted the president's anti-press campaign by jailing one reporter for not playing ball and threatening others.

In my view, Rich lays too much blame for the free hand that Bush has enjoyed at the door of the Fourth Estate. Rich doesn't go as far as some other recent books that lambaste reporters as lapdogs, but he laments that "there was only sporadic digging into the war-ennobled administration by mainstream journalists" and that TV news "barely raised any questions at all."

Obviously, individual outlets, including the New York Times for which Rich writes, erred badly in overplaying claims about the menace Saddam Hussein posed. Some Washington correspondents went native, identifying too closely with insider sources. The tabloid tenor of most broadcast news -- about which Rich has written brilliantly -- fanned Americans' crudest urges.

But Rich's well-researched narrative testifies to the dogged, independent-minded reporting that -- despite this oppressive climate -- revealed official mistakes, lies and violations of law. In recounting the long trail of administration deceptions and blunders, Rich credits the reporters at The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal who discovered them. He cites scoops from outlets as diverse as Roll Call, the National Journal, the Smoking Gun, Vanity Fair and the New Yorker. Even the generally abysmal TV news shows did some worthy investigation, he tells us: CBS News exposed the abuses at Abu Ghraib, and anchors such as Diane Sawyer, Tom Brokaw and Ted Koppel grilled Bush and other evasive heavies at key moments.

What The Greatest Story Ever Sold illustrates is that most Americans did not back the Iraq invasion because they were credulous, though many were, or even because the administration was dishonest, though it was -- reprehensibly so. In the end, notwithstanding the hype, the truth wasn't all that hard to see; even Bush's misleading claims that Saddam Hussein was about to acquire nukes were debunked on the front pages, as Rich points out, before the invasion began. Yet most citizens, despite access to evidence, chose to follow the president anyway. Rich doesn't get into why they did so, but I think the reasons boil down to a widespread popular desire to exorcise post-9/11 feelings of shame and vulnerability with the nationalistic pride achieved through the exercise of military might.

Many people who might have supported the Iraq war under different circumstances remained intractably opposed because they believed Bush hadn't proven that Baghdad was making nuclear weapons or working with al-Qaeda. They held this view because, among other reasons, in the months and years after 9/11, they were reading the smart, critical and blessedly spin-proof writings of Frank Rich. Â·

What Would Jefferson Say About Iraq? (PHI)

By R.K. Ramazani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 24, 2006

In the next few days - and only a few days are left of this term of Congress - both houses are expected to embrace the compromise between leading Republicans and the White House on the treatment of prisoners of war. When they strike this agreement, they will do more than protect American troops captured abroad; they also will uphold the Founding Fathers' principle of humane treatment of prisoners of war.

Since President Bush has made the Middle East region the centerpiece of his foreign policy, the American public should expect that the founding principles of the American republic would apply to the invasion of Iraq and the promotion of democracy there, as the model for the broader Middle East. American treatment of prisoners of war should be nothing less than a model as well.

In contrast to Bush, Thomas Jefferson, the intellectual father of America, decried what today are called "wars of choice." He clearly considered the one war for which he was U.S. commander in chief, the war against the Barbary Pirates, a defensive war. He said he banished "the legitimacy of war to dark ages" and in 1797 said, "I abhor war and view it as the greatest scourge of mankind." While Jefferson would have seen U.S. military operations in Afghanistan as justified after 9/11, he would not have advocated a so-called preventive attack on Iraq.

What would Jefferson have thought about the Bush administration's approach to promoting democracy in Iraq, the broader Middle East, and the world? Jefferson wrote: "I hope and firmly believe that the whole world will sooner than later feel benefit from the issue of our assertion of the right of man." For Jefferson, this was an aspiration, not a foreign-policy goal.

Jefferson would have opposed the imposition of democracy on any society by military action for several reasons. He believed that coercion is incompatible with liberty and that a society must undergo an evolutionary process before it will embrace democracy and the liberal values of justice, public education and a free press necessary for it to function. Jefferson would have faulted the Bush administration's launch of democratization in Iraq without regard to the realities of Iraqi society, in which most people still have higher loyalties to family, religion and tribe than to the nation-state. The U.S. Department of State produced such an assessment of the Iraqi situation in its 2002-03 "Future of Iraq" project, but the Pentagon rejected the findings of the study, and the invasion of Iraq proceeded.

Instead, if asked how best to spread democracy, Jefferson would have suggested three alternative and peaceful methods. First among these would be America's own example of liberal democratic practices. In 1801, he wrote: "A just and solid republican government here will be a standing monument and example for the aim and imitation of people of other countries."

Second would be effective use of what we now call public diplomacy. That includes widespread sharing of information and a fair degree of transparency in our dealings with other countries. He wrote in 1810: "No one more sincerely wishes the spread of information among mankind than I do, and none has greater confidence in its supporting free and good government."

Third, and most important, Jefferson would have stressed support for the American system of higher education. In today's parlance, he would have advocated expanding American educational initiatives, such as the Fulbright exchange program. Jefferson firmly believed that public education was a vital weapon in uprooting authoritarian rulers and promoting the creation of democratic governments. In his memorable words: "Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppression of body and mind will vanish like evil spirits at the dawn of day."

And regarding the treatment of prisoners of war, Jefferson would have insisted on upholding the principles of international law in general, and the Geneva Conventions in particular. There are echoes of the Jeffersonian precepts of 1781 in Article 3 of the Conventions - which has been the focus of so much negotiation between the president and Senate Republicans - and in the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. Both Article 3 and Hamdan bar inhumane treatment of war prisoners. More than 200 years ago, Jefferson urged that Americans should endeavor "as far as possible to alleviate the inevitable miseries of war by treating captives as humanity and national honor requires."

Strong presidential power is important in times of war. Even so, the checks and balances embodied in Congress and the courts are vital to the democratic process. Congress was created to check "the dog of war," as Jefferson put it. Regarding prisoners of war, he would have called for their just treatment to show the United States as a beacon of liberty and justice throughout the world.

Jefferson would have been appalled by Bush's misguided policy in the Middle East as tactically shortsighted, strategically ineffective, and above all, dishonorable. He would have applauded the Supreme Court's ruling in June against the Bush administration's position on allowing military tribunals to withhold evidence from prisoners of war, as depriving the accused of due process guaranteed in the Bill of Rights. And he would have endorsed the efforts of Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and other congressional leaders to put the brakes on Bush's foreign policy and redirect the country, even in these difficult times, to a path that preserves the morals of our founders: duty, justice and national honor.

Otherwise, what are we defending?

Dividing Iraq Would Just Mean More Threats (LAT)

By W. Robert Pearson, W. Robert Pearson Was U.s. Ambassador To Turkey From 2000 To 2003.

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Separate Sunni, Shiite and Kurd states are a seductive solution, but a single central government is Iraq's best chance for stability.

PROMINENT EXPERTS have begun to argue that dividing Iraq into three parts — Sunni, Shiite and Kurd — is more viable than trying to build a single, central Iraqi state. They reason that the only solution to sectarian violence is for Sunnis and Shiites to live apart. The Kurds, they argue, have demonstrated their ability to live autonomously since 1990. Nothing else has worked, so why not let the pieces fall where they may? But this is not a plan; it is a destabilizing default strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0068248

Thoughtful observers, such as Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Leslie Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, have argued for a federated Iraqi with near-statehood status for the three regions and an agreement on dividing the oil money. If such a deal could be struck, and if the breakup could be halted there, Iraq might see greater stability. But the more likely outcome is a loose federation plagued by conflict, with one or more parties trying to win full independence. Confederation could prove a Pandora's box for the U.S. and the region.

Dividing Iraq would invite Tehran to make even more mischief within the Iraqi Shiite community, especially to further exploit the rivalry between the two major clerics, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani and Muqtada Sadr. If the Shiite areas in southern and eastern Iraq fell under Iranian influence, would Tehran not be tempted to turn its attention to the Sunnis in the west and the Kurds in the north? How would the global energy situation be affected if Iran were to gain influence over a rump Shiite state as its protector? How would neighboring Sunni states — Jordan and Saudi Arabia — react? Would Hezbollah, Iran's proxy against Israel, not feel strengthened in Lebanon?

All the countries in the region with sizable Kurdish populations would oppose the creation of an independent Kurdish state, fearing territorial claims and divided loyalties among their ethnic Kurds. Turkey worries most of all. U.S. acquiescence in an independent Kurdistan would confirm the Turks' worst fears about American engagement in Iraq. Turkey has the largest Kurdish population in the Middle East — four to five times greater than that in northern Iraq. The Turks fear that an independent Kurdistan on former Iraqi territory would agitate to include Turkish Kurds. It was just in 1999 that Turkey brought to a close a 20-year battle with its Kurdish insurgency in which more than 30,000 people died. And since the beginning of the Iraq war, Turkey has watched the same insurgency renew a guerrilla campaign. Meanwhile, its decision not to allow the U.S. to launch a northern front to invade Iraq via Turkey cost Ankara both its influence in northern Iraq and any chance to cooperate with the U.S. in shaping postwar Iraq.

Although many Americans rightly praise Iraqi Kurds as allies who helped us in the 2003 war, the U.S. should think twice about giving security guarantees to an independent Kurdistan. The Iraqi province of Kurdistan has no access to the sea and is wholly dependent on its neighbors for the export and import of goods, including the oil it wants to control. Is the U.S. willing to have a permanent military presence in an independent Kurdistan, putting our troops at risk for no strategic benefit?

Finally, Kurds might ask themselves whether they really want full independence. With no powerful protector in the region, they would have to stand alone among unfriendly neighbors. In addition, the Kurds' current unity masks deep rivalries between two major factions, each possessing independent armies. And they aren't alone in the northern province. The Turkmens will continue to look to Ankara for support. Disputes continue with the Iraqi Arabs, who for years were sent north by Saddam Hussein to displace local Kurds. Add the struggle for control of Kirkuk's oil fields to the mix and the ethnic and political tensions rise further. Civil wars have erupted over less. Shiites and Sunnis won't support an independent Kurdish state unless it shares the Kirkuk fields. Would Kirkuk then be internationalized? The history of internationalized cities is not a happy one.

An Iraqi split might seem seductive, but those who are tempted might recall Horace Greeley's advice in 1861 to deal with the South by letting the "erring sisters depart in peace." Greeley later changed his mind and urged the North to fight to preserve the Union.

As hard as it is to imagine, the consequences of a divided Iraq could be even worse than the woes of today. The United States should use whatever influence it has in Iraq, and in the region, to foster a central government in Baghdad capable of moving the country toward stability through negotiation among the contending parties — whatever we may think of their arrangements. That would be the best protection — under the circumstances — for all Iraqis.

Rally On Mall Supports Troops (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Backers of the war on terrorism rallied on the Mall yesterday for the second annual Support the Troops and Their Mission Weekend in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0068249

A crowd estimated at between 70 and 100 people waved U.S. and military flags as they listened to speeches by family members of soldiers and representatives of groups such as FreeRepublic.com, the sponsor of the rally; Project 21; and Military Families Voice of Victory.

Kristinn Taylor, co-founder and spokesman for the D.C. chapter of Free Republic, moderated the event, which honored Gold Star and Blue Star families.

"The myth is that we've all come together after 9/11, which isn't entirely true," he said. "The left [wing] is the left. It will always attack America first, will always blame America first, will always work with our enemies to bring down America.

"So, we made a vow that we would not allow the anti-American left to do to this country and this generation of our military what they did to them during Vietnam, and we've kept that vow for five years now," he said.

Mychal Massie, a member of Project 21, a network of black conservatives, agreed.

U.S. troops "place service to America before service to themselves, realizing that service to America is indeed service to us all," Mr. Massie said. "They need to know that we support their families, their friends and, most of all, their children. ... Tomorrow's freedom rests on their [children's] shoulders."

Richard August of North Kingstown, R.I., whose son, Matthew, was an Army captain killed in Iraq two weeks before his 29th birthday in 2004, said he doesn't regard his son's death as a tragedy.

"My son died in the service of his country," he said. "He and eight other soldiers of his company died during their deployment because, in my son's words, they were in Iraq trying to help the majority of Iraqi people overcome the brutal effects of a dictator's rule over 30 years.

"Theirs were not tragic deaths. Theirs were noble deaths," he said.

Richard Linn of Chesterfield, Va., said his son, Lance Cpl. Karl R. Linn, 20, was killed with three others from his unit in January 2005 in an ambush in Iraq's Anbar province.

"One thing Karl and I agreed on was, despite whatever reasons we've got [for being] over there, that the only thing to do was to finish the job correctly," he said. "And to that end, I support our efforts, and I support our troops to this day."

Leo Flood of Fort Hood, Texas, who has a son in the Navy, said he opens his home and his wallet to all military members whom his son brings home to visit.

"We shouldn't even have to be here," he said of the rally. "It should be an automatic assumption that we support our troops and their mission in any way, shape, form or fashion."

Evan Sayet, a comedian and political commentator, said he was a liberal until he witnessed their reaction to September 11, which he said ultimately showed their disloyalty to the country when they railed against the war.

"The left rejects fact, reason and logic as an act of bigotry," he said. "How do they think they're making a better world by siding wholly with evil over good, wrong over right, and the behaviors that lead to failure over those that lead to success?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dangers Of A World Without Rules (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

IT was just another ho-hum week on Wall Street: the Federal Reserve held rates steady, stocks were about flat — and a hedge fund called Amaranth Advisors lost $6 billion.

Amaranth and its investors are still sorting out the fund's huge, wrong-way bet on natural gas prices that appears to have cost it two-thirds of its $9.25 billion in assets. In the meantime, where were commodities regulators as Amaranth amassed its positions that in the unwinding have had such an impact on energy prices?

To answer that question, we must travel back to Dec. 15, 2000, the final day of the 106th Congress, when a last-minute provision was inserted into legislation removing regulatory oversight from energy commodities traded on over-the-counter electronic exchanges.

The provision was an early Christmas gift to a company that had worked hard to persuade members of Congress that electronic energy exchanges and all the trades made on them should be exempt from regulators' prying eyes. The company was Enron.

With one swift kick, the Commodity Futures Modernization Act, as the legislation was called, booted commodity cops off a now-large segment of the energy trading beat. While the New York Mercantile Exchange requires its participants to file so-called large trader reports with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission to help it spot manipulation, over-the-counter electronic exchanges do not make such filings. Instead, the electronic energy markets are left to pretty much regulate themselves.

Many of Amaranth's monster trades in the natural gas markets were conducted on over-the-counter markets or with so-called voice brokers and so were not on regulators' radar screens.

It is too soon to tell what role Amaranth's gamble had on natural gas prices. But speculators played a significant role in the astonishing rise in energy prices in recent years.

Such is the conclusion of a compelling Congressional report produced in June by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. The 49-page report detailed the explosion in energy speculation on unregulated trading markets and recommended eliminating the so-called Enron loophole that put electronic energy trading off the regulatory reservation.

The Oil and Gas Traders Oversight Act of 2006 would close the loophole. Until last week the bill was languishing. With any luck, the Amaranth debacle may change that.

The bill is sponsored by four senators: three Democrats — Dianne Feinstein of California, Carl Levin of Michigan and Maria E. Cantwell of Washington — and a Republican, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine.

"We didn't need more evidence that there is a big Enron loophole that's gaping in our regulation of these energy traders, but we sure got it" with Amaranth, Mr. Levin said. "This is proof that you've got to have oversight."

Mr. Levin said that a similar amendment was narrowly defeated several years ago. "We've got a unanimous consent agreement to bring the bill up, but the Republican leader is not going to schedule it," he said, referring to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, "which probably reflects the power of the oil and gas industry around here."

Speculators have been a force in the rise in energy prices in recent years. Supply has not been a problem — the amount of natural gas in storage since mid-2004, for example, has exceeded the previous five-year average, except for a Katrina-related shock.

Even so, prices of natural gas have also exceeded their five-year average. This highly unusual situation has occurred as investors, disappointed with middling returns elsewhere, have poured money into commodities.

Philip K. Verleger Jr., an economist who runs his own firm in Aspen, Colo., estimates that in the past two years, $130 billion has flowed into commodities index funds. An additional $150 billion has gone directly into energy commodities, he said.

"Commodities as an alternative asset class has always been a great idea," Mr. Verleger said. "But like all investment ideas, everything is good in moderation and nothing ever happens in moderation."

Hedge fund traders have been among the biggest beneficiaries of this boom, booking billions in profits — and pay — in recent years.

But another big winner has been the IntercontinentalExchange, the leading electronic exchange for energy trading. Known as ICE, the exchange was formed in 2000 by seven investment banks and oil companies, including Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley, BP Amoco and the Royal Dutch/Shell Group. Based in Atlanta, it has been a public company for almost a year; not surprisingly, its stock has doubled so far this year.

Traders have flocked to ICE. In 2003, 13.7 million natural gas contracts traded there, with a notional value of $186 billion. Last year, 55.5 million such contracts traded, with a notional value of $1.3 trillion.

In regulatory terms, ICE operates its over-the-counter markets as an exempt commercial market, meaning it is subject to the Commodity Exchange Act's bans on fraud and manipulation but not subject to the C.F.T.C.'s regulatory oversight.

"The history of the commodities markets demonstrates it is unrealistic to rely on the self-interest of a few large traders as a substitute for dedicated, independent oversight to protect the public interest," the Congressional report noted dryly.

Johnathan H. Short, ICE's general counsel, said: "If anybody is doing anything inappropriate they would stand to be liable if it were proven that they manipulated a market. We have thousands of people looking at our screens; if somebody sees something unusual we have an obligation to report into the C.F.T.C. so it can take appropriate investigative action."

Many of those screen-watchers are hedge funds — the fastest-growing constituency at ICE. While hedge funds and other proprietary trading outfits accounted for 4.6 percent of total commissions in 2003, they accounted for 28 percent in the second quarter this year. The percentage of commissions generated by commercial companies and financial institutions has fallen during this time.

Government filings indicate that ICE would prefer to keep the regulatory setup precisely as it is. Noting in its annual report that members of Congress had introduced legislation in the past that would bring the exchange's business under direct regulation by the C.F.T.C., the company said: "If adopted, this legislation could require us and our participants to operate under heightened regulatory burdens and incur additional costs." Such a bill, it added, could also "deter some participants from trading on our O.T.C. platform."

WHAT does the C.F.T.C. think of the Amaranth situation? So far, "it appears that the system is working the way it is supposed to, in terms of the market discipline of creditors, brokers and clearinghouses," said James A. Overdahl, chief economist at the C.F.T.C. He is confident, he said, that the commission can spot manipulation on over-the-counter markets, even if it does not regulate them, because the prices of O.T.C. contracts are set by trades on the Nymex, which is under its jurisdiction.

But the propane manipulation case brought against traders at BP earlier this year suggests otherwise. The C.F.T.C. did not detect the manipulation, which involved over-the-counter trades — it learned of the problem from a whistleblower. One former trader pleaded guilty to participating in a conspiracy to manipulate and corner the propane market. BP has denied wrongdoing and is cooperating with the inquiry.

The energy markets are too important to the economy and the American consumer to be left to bet-the-ranch hedge fund traders. Isn't it interesting: Enron has been dead for almost five years. But as last week's implosion of Amaranth shows, its troubling legacy lives on.

Regulating Hedge Funds (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

As debacles go, the one last week at the hedge fund Amaranth Advisors was orderly. The fund's star trader had bet big that natural gas prices would rise. They fell instead. On Monday, the fund admitted it had lost more than $3 billion, a sum later pegged at $6 billion. And yet, as of Friday, the fund, though badly battered, had managed to avoid liquidation.

It could have been much worse — and not just for the investors who were burned.

Hedge funds — largely unregulated investment pools for wealthy individuals and institutional investors — have infiltrated every corner of every market, taking big risks for big returns. Market players know that big risks can also mean big losses. But in the days after Amaranth's meltdown they were unnerved by what they did not know, such as how much of Amaranth's bet had been made with borrowed money. If questions about the fund's ability to make good on its obligations had persisted — or if a default had ensued — markets would have been vulnerable to a debilitating chain reaction in which financial entities like banks and brokerages slam the brakes on deal making, hoping to avoid the accident unfolding in front of them.

That didn't happen this time. But Amaranth is only one of 9,000 hedge funds that collectively manage an estimated $1.2 trillion in assets — a size and scope undreamed of a decade ago. Not all hedge funds throw borrowed money at hot-handed traders to make outsized bets. But it would be naïve to think there aren't more shocks in store.

With that in mind, regulators need to act now to translate their various calls for hedge-fund oversight into enforceable rules and, in some instances, into concrete proposals for Congress to enact.

A week before the Amaranth debacle, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, Timothy Geithner, said in a speech that the growth in hedge funds would eventually force regulators to think about ways to better protect the financial system. Eventually is now. Two years ago, the Securities and Exchange Commission passed a rule to register hedge funds, with the goal of greater oversight of pension investments in hedge funds. The rule was flawed, and was overturned in court. But the aim was a good one. The S.E.C. should pursue a focused set of hedge-fund reforms and Congress should pass a law to prevent pension funds from investing in hedge funds that do not submit to federal regulation.

Congress should also repeal a law from 2000 that limits regulators' ability to monitor over-the-counter derivative securities — financial instruments not listed on the exchanges. That market has grown markedly in recent years and contributes greatly to hedge funds' wheeling and dealing.

Policy makers know hedge funds cannot adequately police themselves. What are they waiting for?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Timing In Case Against Jefferson Tricky (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 24, 2006

Election may affect when feds tip hand

WASHINGTON -- With the selection last week of a technology expert to copy documents from computer hard drives taken from Rep. William Jefferson's office, the Justice Department might soon have the material it says it needs to wrap up its 18-month investigation of the New Orleans Democrat.

That could leave the agency with a dilemma: Should the department decide whether to seek an indictment of Jefferson before the Nov. 7 primary or wait until after the race is decided?

Jefferson, facing the first tough re-election challenge since his election to the House of Representatives in 1990, has attracted 12 opponents.

While the timing of elections is one of many factors that the Justice Department examines in deciding whether to indict an elected official, matters of law are the paramount concern, former and current federal prosecutors said.

"The policy is that you should bring an indictment when you have the evidence and when you are ready to proceed without consideration for an election," said Eric Holder, who headed the department's public integrity section during the Clinton administration.

A current Justice Department official, who asked not to be identified because he feared his "general remarks about process" might seem aimed at the Jefferson probe, said an election could be one of many factors considered. But he said it is a relatively minor one and is even less important in a case where the public is already aware that the elected official is the target of a probe.

Jefferson has all but said he expects to be indicted, proclaiming that he looks forward to vigorously proclaiming his innocence in the "appropriate time and forum."

No good choice

The investigation, in which a cooperating witness secretly recorded conversations with Jefferson, has netted two guilty pleas from former associates who say the congressman demanded and accepted bribes through businesses operated by his family in return for pushing technology projects in Africa.

In the past, the Justice Department has indicted elected officials right before and right after elections. Either way, the timing has generated criticism. Indictments just after an election have been criticized for not giving voters information they needed to evaluate the candidate up for re-election. Indictments just prior to an election have been attacked as attempts to snuff out the official's re-election chances.

"Either way you decide to do things -- whether to bring charges before an election or after an election -- can be considered political," said Binny Miller, a law professor at American University's Washington College of Law. "If you indict before an election, let's face it, some people consider being charged with the crime the same as being found guilty by a jury, ignoring the long-held belief by many that a prosecutor could get a grand jury to indict a ham sandwich."

Stanley Brand, a former counsel to the House of Representatives, said it's not as if investigations of House members can occur at convenient intervals.

"House members run every two years," Brand said, "so there really isn't any good time to indict if you don't want to influence elections."

In Jefferson's case, it's unclear how an indictment before the November election would affect his chances. Significant information about the case has already come out, including the discovery of $90,000 in $100 bills packed inside the freezer of his Washington, D.C., home. So it's possible that voters already think they know the worst and have already decided whether they believe Jefferson's declarations of innocence.

An indictment might even boost Jefferson's claim that the Justice Department, which subjected him to the first-ever raid of a congressional office, was unfairly targeting him.

Often seen as guilty verdict

On the other hand, as Miller, the American University law professor, says, some voters see an indictment as almost tantamount to being found guilty, regardless of the presumption of innocence guaranteed defendants.

Among the examples of government indictments that generated controversy was the 1988 decision to prosecute Rep. Robert Garcia, D-N.Y., on bribery-extortion charges, announced two weeks after he was elected to a sixth term. Asked why the indictment wasn't brought before the election so voters could weigh the charges, the federal prosecutor, Rudolph Giuliani, later mayor of New York, responded that the timing was based entirely on legal, not political, considerations.

In 1978, Rep. Joshua Eilberg, D-Pa., was indicted two weeks before the general election on charges of receiving illegal compensation to help a hospital get a federal grant. Eilberg, who died in 2004, lost the election.

Asked why the indictment was brought so close to the election, then-U.S. Attorney Peter Vaira said: "We have one rule: Whenever an investigation is finished, we bring an indictment. To do otherwise would be unfair."

Last week, U.S. Magistrate John Facciola ordered the computer forensics firm of Stroz Friedberg LLC to begin searching computer images seized from Jefferson's office, instructing the firm to deliver computer documents to him on a "rolling basis" of no fewer than 1,500 pages, and not more than 1,700 pages. Some involved in the case expect that process to continue for two or three weeks.

Under a process established by a three-judge appellate court, Jefferson's attorneys would have 48 hours after getting all the material seized from his office to argue what documents they think should be denied to federal prosecutors.

If Chief District Court Judge Thomas Hogan rejects Jefferson's request, his ruling would likely set up another appellate hearing, although it's not certain it would hold up distribution of the documents federal prosecutors say they need to wrap up their investigation.

Marlinga May Learn His Fate This Week (MACOMBD)

By Jameson Cook, Macomb Daily Staff Writer

Macomb (MI) Daily, September 24, 2006

Outcome of federal corruption trial hard to predict due to circumstantial nature

Whatever anyone thinks about the strength of the federal criminal case against Carl Marlinga won't matter this week as a jury will begin deliberating the former prosecutor's fate.

Advertisement

Predicting a jury verdict is difficult, especially in a circumstantial case such as this, according to experts.

"This isn't an open and shut case," said Lawrence Dubin, University of Detroit Mercy law professor. "You never know what a jury will do in a case."

Prominent Macomb County defense lawyer Stephen Rabaut said: "You don't know because even if the evidence points your way, if it doesn't pass the 'smell test,' it could go the other way. If there is a strong personality on the jury who is not on your side, then you're in trouble."

The 14-person jury, which will be whittled down to 12 for deliberations, will begin mulling Marlinga's fate late Monday or Tuesday in U.S. District Court in downtown Detroit, after Marlinga completes testifying in his defense.

Marlinga, 59, Macomb County prosecutor for 20 years until 2005, is charged with five counts in connection with supposedly exerting influence in two criminal cases his office handled in exchange for more than $30,000 in campaign contributions, as well as exceeding the limits of contributions. He faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison, if convicted.

Marlinga will continue testifying in his defense Monday morning under cross examination by U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, after beginning Wednesday (No trial took place Thursday and Friday). Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department and Marlinga's defense will make their last-ditch arguments to jurors after Marlinga completes his testimony. Closing statements by both sides will take place on the same day.

Following instructions by Judge Victoria Roberts, the case will be out of the attorneys' hands and into the hands of the jury, which now consists of 10 women and four men.

During Wednesday's testimony, Marlinga staunchly defended his actions, saying that campaign contributions from people involved with criminal defendants in two cases for his failed bid for Congress in 2002 didn't influence his legal opinions. In one case, he said he didn't even provide enough influence to matter.

"Money would not make a difference. Money could not make a difference. Money would never make a difference," Marlinga said defiantly.

He insisted his fund-raising activities were legal, and any potentially illegal maneuvers designed to skirt campaigning finance laws were committed by others and unknown by him.

Dubin and Rabaut said Marlinga taking the stand in the trial should help him with the jury, although they agreed he should not have testified to the grand jury investigating the case in 2004 and 2005.

"A lot depends on his ability to explain what he did was within his ethical duty as a prosecutor," Dubin said.

Rabaut called his decision to go in front of the grand jury "ridiculous."

"All you can do is hurt yourself and open yourself up to contradiction," he said.

In fact, U.S. attorneys Cares and Jonathan Tukel during the trial have pointed out many passages of Marlinga's two grand jury appearances, displaying some long paragraphs on a large screen in the courtroom. They have pointed to some slight differences in his testimony.

"It's hard for any human being to be 100 percent consistent," Rabaut said. "You can be honest and not be 100 percent consistent."

Part of the case involves Marlinga providing favorable comments to the state Supreme Court for Jeffrey Moldowan of Warren, who was convicted in 1991 of rape, attempted murder and kidnapping for a 1990 incident that began in Warren. The high court ordered a new trial in 2002, and, in 2003, Moldowan, now 36, was acquitted by a Macomb County Circuit Court jury.

Marlinga received $4,000 in campaign contributions from Moldowan-advocate Ralph Roberts and his wife in 2001 and 2002 about the same time he drafted a legal brief that conceded Moldowan suffered "actual prejudice" in his original trial due to evidentiary problems.

Rabaut said that while the jury may be instructed not to consider the outcome of the Moldowan trial, it may do so, and it could cut either way. The jury may believe Marlinga's legal instincts in the end were justified and morally correct by the not guilty verdict, or the jury could conclude that Moldowan should not have been found not guilty.

Judge Roberts has said from the bench "I am not trying the Moldowan case" in this federal trial, but much of the case has been rehashed in detail by attorneys on both sides.

Marlinga also received more than $20,000 in contributions from criminal defendant James Hulet of St. Clair Shores, who was charged in 2001 with rape, drug delivery and gun possession, through his defense attorneys Dennis Johnston and Robert Leithauser and their family members. The government says Marlinga influenced the outcome of Hulet's case. He pleaded guilty to a lesser sexual contact charge and lesser drug charge, and was sentenced in January 2004 to two years in prison on the original gun charge, and is serving three additional years of probation.

As part of the more than $20,000 supplied by Hulet, Johnston donated $10,000 to the Michigan Democratic Party. In addition, Johnston gave $4,000 to state Sen. James Barcia, and Barcia's federal campaign committee and political action committee in turn gave $4,000 to Marlinga's campaign.

Marlinga is accused with one count of bribery in connection with the Moldowan case. Marlinga additionally is charged with bribery, lying to investigators, mail fraud and exceeding campaign contributions in connection with the Hulet case as well as the alleged "conduit" scheme with Barcia's campaign.

The alleged campaign contribution violation is a misdemeanor while the other offenses are felonies.

Roberts and Barcia originally also were indicted for their roles, but those charges were dropped.

Marlinga, a Democrat who raised $988,000 in his bid to beat Republican U.S. Rep. Candice Miller, who raised $1.6 million, lost the race in November 2002.

After leaving the prosecutor post, Marlinga, who lives with his wife, Barbara, in Sterling Heights, opened a law practice in a building on Elizabeth Road in Clinton Township, across the street from the Macomb County Sheriff's Office and Jail in Mount Clemens.

Pursuit Of Death Penalty In Moonda Case Surprises Attorney (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 24, 2006

Prosecutors in Donna Moonda case say killing of her husband was greedy, premeditated crime

Bonnie Brown Heady kidnapped and murdered a 6-year-old boy. Ethel Rosenberg leaked atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

The U.S. government executed them both in 1953. No woman has been put to death in a federal case since.

Given that history, Donna Moonda and her attorney did not expect prosecutors to seek the death penalty against her.

"I was surprised when they did," Roger Synenberg, Mrs. Moonda's attorney, said of the government's decision this month to pursue a capital case. "I didn't think this would happen."

Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Hermitage in Mercer County, is charged with hiring her 25-year-old lover to murder her husband.

She says she is innocent. Prosecutors say she is a cold, money-hungry killer who planned the murder of Dr. Gulam Moonda for six months.

Dr. Moonda 69, a urologist, died in front of his wife and mother-in-law on the Ohio Turnpike the evening of May 13, 2005. Damian Bradford, who was having an affair with Mrs. Moonda, shot the doctor dead. He says it was premeditated murder that was supposed to look like a highway robbery.

Mr. Bradford admits he killed because of greed, saying Donna Moonda promised him a seven-figure payoff. He said she expected to collect millions in inheritance and life insurance proceeds from her husband's death and told him he would receive half of the money.

The planning that went into the crime is one reason U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White, of the Northern District of Ohio, is seeking the death penalty against Mrs. Moonda.

Another factor is that Mrs. Moonda's mother, Dorothy Smouse, then 74 years old, was in the car with Dr. Moonda when Mr. Bradford shot him.

"She made her own mother a witness to murder, and placed her in the line of fire when she planned that her husband would be shot to death," Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Barr said in a brief filed in the summer, when Mrs. Moonda was trying for bail.

Mr. Synenberg said he did not expect a capital case because the government reached a "sweetheart" plea bargain with Mr. Bradford. He could receive as little as 171/2 years in prison in return for his testimony against Mrs. Moonda.

"One issue that is supposed to be considered in death-penalty decisions is disparity of sentences," Mr. Synenberg said. "They gave the person who pulled the trigger 17 years and they want to put my client to death."

Mr. White declined to be interviewed, but he and his trial staff consider Mrs. Moonda the instigator of the plot. They believe Mr. Bradford, a small-time drug dealer in Beaver County before the murder, had no inclination to kill the doctor until she set the plan into motion.

Mr. Synenberg, though, has begun arguing that Mr. Bradford killed on his own, without any help from Donna Moonda.

"Bradford saw a sugar daddy," Mr. Synenberg said. "By killing him, he thought, he could get his hands on a lot of money."

DOJ_NMG_0068256

Mr. Bradford and Mrs. Moonda met in 2004 in a Beaver County drug-rehabilitation center. He said he was addicted to cocaine. She had stolen the painkiller fentanyl from hospitals where she worked as a nurse anesthetist. The second drug case led to her firing and a criminal prosecution.

He said she told him she was 31 years old and married to a doctor in his 50s. In December 2004, Mr. Bradford said, she decided she wanted her husband dead.

By that time, he said, Mrs. Moonda was in the habit of giving him money and gifts. She smuggled him steroids from her husband's medical office to indulge Mr. Bradford's nascent interest in bodybuilding, he said.

Though Mr. White recommended a death-penalty prosecution against Mrs. Moonda, the final decision was made by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He must authorize every capital case in the federal system.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C., said federal prosecutors had a record of diligence in capital cases.

"Money is spent to do these cases right," said Mr. Dieter, whose organization takes no moral stand on the death penalty, but monitors the fairness of state and federal prosecutions.

She was sentenced in December for the 1993 murders of five people in Mason City, Iowa. The victims included two girls, ages 6 and 10.

Iowa is one of 12 states that have no death penalty, but Ms. Johnson and her boyfriend, Dustin Honken, were prosecuted by the U.S. government.

A methamphetamine dealer, Mr. Honken also has been sentenced to death for the murders. Ms. Johnson, 41, says she had no knowledge of her boyfriend's plan to kill anyone. She has years of appeals ahead to press that claim.

That was not the case with the first woman executed by the federal government.

She was Mary Surratt, who was hanged July 7, 1865, for conspiring in the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln. Her execution came 83 days after the president's death.

Execution was even swifter for Bonnie Brown Heady. An alcoholic and a prostitute, she was smooth enough to escort 6-year-old Bobby Greenlease from his Kansas City, Mo., elementary school in September 1953 by falsely claiming to be his aunt.

Bobby's father was one of the wealthiest auto dealers in America. Ms. Heady and her boyfriend, Carl A. Hall, had been watching the Greenleases for months, intent on extorting money from them.

They shot Bobby in an Overland Park, Kan., field less than an hour after abducting him, then demanded a $600,000 ransom from his family, who assured the boy was alive.

Because Ms. Heady and Mr. Hall had crossed state lines in the crime, they were prosecuted by the federal government. They were executed Dec. 18, 1953, 81 days after Bobby's death.

Ms. Heady, 41 when she went to the gas chamber, died six months after Ethel Rosenberg. Mrs. Rosenberg, 37, and her husband, Julius, 35, were electrocuted after being convicted of espionage.

Theirs was perhaps the most publicized federal death-penalty case until Timothy McVeigh's. He was executed for killing 168 people in the Oklahoma City bombing of 1995.

A Quiet Bombshell In The Legal World (LAT)

By Robert Weisberg, Robert Weisberg Is A Professor Of Law At Stanford University And Director Of The Stanford Criminal J

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

A single high court decision puts mandatory sentencing laws in limbo.

VIRTUALLY every American knows about Miranda, the famous U.S. Supreme Court decision requiring police officers to inform suspects of their rights. But not even many lawyers know about Blakely vs. Washington. Yet this Supreme Court ruling in 2004 took its place alongside Miranda and others — including Gideon vs. Wainwright (which required states to provide a lawyer to indigent felony defendants) and Terry vs. Ohio (which allowed police to stop and frisk subjects without probable cause) — as a precedent that would change the course of American criminal justice.

Although the decision had its roots in a dry and abstract legal question, the case itself centered on a horrific crime. Ralph Blakely Jr., a rancher from the state of Washington, had kidnapped his estranged wife at knifepoint, bound her with duct tape and stuffed her into a box in his pickup truck. At sentencing, the trial judge concluded that Blakely had acted with "deliberate cruelty" — an "aggravating factor" expressly legislated under Washington's sentencing statute — and, as a result, sentenced Blakely to 90 months in prison instead of the standard 53 months.

But the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the sentence, saying that the 6th Amendment right to a jury trial prohibited judges from increasing criminal sentences on the basis of facts that had not been decided by a jury or confessed to by the defendant. Because a jury had not determined beyond a reasonable doubt that Blakely acted with "deliberate cruelty," the judge could not rely on that fact to increase the sentence. That may not sound like an enormous decision, but it proved revolutionary. Overnight, sentencing rules across the country were thrown into turmoil. Dozens of sentences — maybe hundreds — were called into question. If the decision were applied retroactively, how many felons might challenge their sentences?

As many predicted when the Blakely ruling was handed down, the next shoe to drop involved the federal sentencing guidelines for criminal trials — a massively complex and controversial structure created in the 1980s. Last year, the Supreme Court ruled that this vast system of rules also violated the decision in Blakely. The result, for the last two years, has been a state of suspended animation for federal sentencing. Although the justices didn't wipe the federal sentencing guidelines off the books, they ruled that, henceforth, the guidelines must be considered "advisory" rather than mandatory.

As the court enters its new session next week, it continues to face the consequences (perhaps unintended) of its watershed Blakely decision.

For instance, in Cunningham vs. California, which is to be argued Oct. 11, the court is being asked to decide whether California's sentencing laws violate Blakely. The case involves John Cunningham of Contra Costa County, who was convicted on charges of sexually abusing his son. Under California's sentencing rules, the judge was allowed to sentence him to a "lower," "medium" or "maximum" sentence. Because the judge thought that the "aggravating" factors outweighed the "mitigating" factors, he sentenced Cunningham to the maximum: 16 years. But because five out of six of those factors had not been determined by a jury, Cunningham has challenged the sentence, saying the California "triad" structure too closely resembles the unconstitutional Washington scheme. At stake is the California sentencing system.

The other big question still facing the court in the wake of the Blakely decision involves not where the ruling applies but when. In Burton vs. Waddington, the court is being asked to decide whether Lonnie Lee Burton, convicted on charges of raping a 15-year-old boy in Indiana in 1991, can have his case reopened under the Blakely ruling.

The question is about the retroactivity of judicial decisions, a very esoteric area of the law. In theory, judges never "make" law but simply interpret or discern its meaning. So if the 6th Amendment means what the high court said in Blakely, it has always meant that, even if earlier judges didn't notice.

By that theory, all decisions ought to be applied retroactively. But if judges feared that refining or expanding laws would lead to the reopening of vast numbers of old cases, they might choose never to do so. So our legal system has created a strange compromise. Roughly put, a decision can be applied retroactively if it looks like a mere extension of an established rule — but not if it is the announcement of a new rule. It also can be applied retroactively if the rule seems absolutely fundamental to a fair trial, not a more technical rule.

So in deciding whether to apply Blakely retroactively, the court will tell us just how important or new it thinks its 2004 creation is after all. But this esoteric little piece of legal doctrine has already proved pretty powerful.

Two Former Restaurant Owners Sentenced To Jail For Bank Fraud (DEKDC)

DeKalb (IL) Daily Chronicle, September 24, 2006

ROCKFORD - The former owners of two DeKalb restaurants were sentenced Friday to time in a federal prison for bank fraud.

According to a press release from the Department of Justice, George Broches, 43, of DeKalb was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison without parole, and must pay $271,997.62 in restitution. His former business partner, Dimitrios Brotsis, 47, of Creston, was sentenced to one year in prison and $97,309.78 in restitution. The men were the owners of the Spring Garden Restaurant and Arcade Dreams Bar and Grill in DeKalb.

DOJ_NMG_0068258

The men were indicted in April 2005 in a federal court in Rockford on charges of bank fraud. According to the Justice Department, Broches and Brotsis deposited bad checks into the bank accounts for the two businesses in January 2000, then withdrew money from the accounts before the bank realized the checks were worthless. They reportedly defrauded the bank out of more than $97,000 during the two-week period.

Broches also was convicted of making a false statement on a commercial loan application in 1999 and on a mortgage application in 2000, and of producing counterfeit credit cards and gift cards from 2002 to 2004 and using them to make purchases.

In a related case, Betty Broches, 38, of Sycamore pled guilty to making a false statement on a loan application and was sentenced to four years of probation, four years of electronic home monitoring and $45,000 in restitution. Her relationship to George Broches is not clear.

Brotsis and Betty Broches pled guilty to the charges on May 25, 2006, and George Broches pled guilty June 2.

The case was investigated by the Rockford division of the FBI and the Chicago division of the U.S. Secret Service, with help from DeKalb Police and the Ogle County Sheriff's Office.

Polygamy. (CHIT)

By Kirsten Scharnberg And Manya A. Brachear, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, September 24, 2006

(Utah's open little secret)

But beneath the all-American veneer, much is different in this upscale subdivision 40 miles south of Salt Lake City.

"Pretty much everyone who lives here is polygamous," said Mary--a woman who gave a recent tour of the area and is herself the second wife of a Utah man. She, like other polygamists interviewed for this story, asked to be identified only by her first name for fear of prosecution. "There may be one or two houses that aren't, but virtually everyone else here is one of ours."

In the weeks since the arrest of Warren Jeffs, the fundamentalist Mormon leader who made the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list for allegations that he facilitated the rape and marriage of underage girls, there have been constant questions about the real pervasiveness and peril of polygamy in Utah.

Mainstream Mormons in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with 12 million members worldwide, have asserted that all polygamous denominations--including Jeffs' Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints--are aberrations in a state where the influential Mormon Church suspended the practice of polygamy more than a century ago. But Utah's attorney general, pro-polygamy activists and other experts estimate there are 40,000 people living in polygamous families or communities like this one across the Western U.S.--with a large portion of them residing in suburban Utah.

Although it is rare that allegations of abuse are as systemic or egregious as those reported in the community led by Jeffs, virtually every other polygamous sect practicing in Utah today has been linked to financial, sexual or spiritual improprieties. Federal grand juries in Arizona and state investigators in Nevada are probing polygamist practices in those states, according to media reports.

Earlier this month, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), himself a Mormon, asked U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to create a federal task force to investigate polygamy sects in the Western U.S., particularly Jeffs' church, a group in which girls as young as 13 are being married and hundreds of boys have been excommunicated and cut off from their parents in an alleged effort to reduce the elders' competition for wives. Still, in his letter, Reid's comments made clear he was referring to Utah's polygamy subculture in general as much as to Jeffs' community along the Utah-Arizona border.

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom," he wrote. "But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated."

Defending their faith

DOJ_NMG_0068259

In the wake of such comments, Utah polygamists have come forward in unprecedented force to defend their faith, values and lifestyle. They say plural marriage fulfills the mission of all Mormons to be fruitful and multiply and to ascend to the highest reaches of heaven. They say it breaks their hearts that the mainstream church in 1890 abandoned polygamy--or what one expert called "the process of polishing the soul"--to appease the federal government and ensure Utah would earn statehood. They point to such communities as Eagle Mountain and Rocky Ridge, where polygamous families appear to be happy and prosperous, often with multiple wives of one husband living in palatial homes with adjoining yards.

"We're really sickeningly boring," said Jane, another wife to the same husband as Mary. "There is no high drama. We are the people next door--it's just that there are more of us."

During the 2004 campaign for Utah attorney general, polygamy was called the state's "dirty little secret," and candidates for the top law-enforcement position debated how best to deal with it. Mark Shurtleff won and has since implemented a policy to essentially leave polygamists alone unless they are committing other crimes simultaneously. Although the act of having more than one spouse is a felony punishable by up to 5 years in prison in Utah, authorities long ago stopped actively going after polygamists.

"We don't have the resources, nor do I think that we should use our resources, to convict every polygamist in Utah, put them in jail and put 20,000 kids into foster care," Shurtleff told a Canadian reporter recently when asked the state's approach to cracking down on polygamy. "What we're focusing on are crimes against women and children and tax fraud and other crimes involving misuse of public money."

Indeed, long before Jeffs was arrested on a highway outside Las Vegas, those crimes have been evident. For example:

The True and Living Church of Jesus Christ of Saints of the Last Days was the subject of much criticism when a young woman fled the community and went to authorities alleging she had been coerced into marrying her stepfather after years of being told she would burn in hell otherwise, according to a book detailing the case. Utah's attorney general chose not to prosecute the man, a charismatic preacher who has claimed to be the reincarnated Mormon prophet Joseph Smith, because the woman was 20 years old and deemed a consenting adult.

The Apostolic United Brethren, a polygamous community in Utah with 7,500 members, a beautiful suburban complex with athletic fields, an outdoor dance pavilion and a private school, was found in court to have bilked a wealthy member out of more than $1.5 million, and a judge ruled the sect and its leaders had to return it.

In the Davis County Cooperative Society, a polygamous community north of Salt Lake City, the leading family, the Kingstons, has been said by state prosecutors to have assets worth well over $150 million. Yet court testimony in a recent child-abuse and custody case revealed that one of the community's patriarchs argued he could not pay the monthly child support ordered by a judge for the children of one of his several wives. Another of the family's leaders was convicted in 1999 of felony incest for taking his 16-year-old niece as his 15th wife.

Yet even the most vocal critics are careful not to allege that every polygamist is guilty of such abuses.

"Listen," said John Llewellyn, one of the leading polygamy critics in Utah today. "I'm a former law-enforcement officer, a former polygamist and now someone who's working against polygamy. I've seen this from every side. And the bottom line is that there are a lot of polygamists out there who are good, honest people. There are, unfortunately, that many--or more--who are out there perpetuating every kind of horrible abuse you can't even imagine."

The Apostolic United Brethren community, whose members are scattered throughout Salt Lake City suburbs such as Eagle Mountain, is largely considered by authorities and even several polygamy critics like Llewellyn to be a group in which abuse is neither rampant nor tolerated.

`The highest heaven'

Charles, 41, a computer programmer with three wives and 14 children, lives in central Utah and says he simply wants to carry out God's plan. He and his first wife joined the Apostolic United Brethren, or AUB, and later he took second and third wives, Jeni and Alorah.

"We believe the purpose of plural marriage is to bring spirits here waiting to be born into good families that will teach them the gospel," he said. "A lot of people around here want to live plural marriage so they make it to the highest heaven. When I see what the savior has done for me, you just want to pay him back and do what he says."

But it's not for every fundamentalist Mormon. Charles' third wife, Alorah, said her mother was the third of four wives and still her decision to enter into plural marriage required intense prayer.

"There's a saying that is kind of common among the girls in this group, that if you can have 10 percent of a 100 percent man, instead of 100 percent of a 10 percent man, then what would you choose?"

Over the decades, polygamous communities have burgeoned statewide--and continue to do so because polygamists have such large families.

Mary and Jane are both married to one AUB community member, a middle-age man who is something of a real-life equivalent of Bill Henrickson, the character in HBO's series "Big Love" who lives in the Salt Lake City suburbs with his three wives, seven kids and ever-mounting bills.

Over dinner at a suburban seafood restaurant, Jane and Mary jointly make fun of their husband while he good-naturedly laughs at their quips. The women brush off questions about jealousy between them by saying he isn't worth fighting over, but they later expound on the Mormon principle of building large families on Earth that later can be replicated in heaven.

The family explains the mechanics of their lives: The two wives have houses next door to one another. (Jane jokingly complains that Mary has the better lawn.) The husband, who asked not to be identified, spends three nights each week with each wife and family; they rotate every other week on who gets the fourth night.

The family grows somber when they discuss allegations that abuses are inexorably linked to polygamy. They go to pains to say their community strongly discourages marrying before the age of 18. Mary is visibly proud when she tells that one of her sons discovered a man in the community was abusing an underage girl and went to police with the information.

"Bottom line," she says, "if you wake up a 13-year-old girl in the middle of the night and marry her off to a man 20 years older than her, that's abuse. Absolutely."

It's families like these that polygamy advocates hold up when they make their most frequent argument: decriminalization. They say that if the fear of prosecution is removed, polygamous groups could stop living in seclusion and secrecy, the very conditions that often enable many of the alleged abuses. Even more, they would then feel less fear about going to authorities to turn in abusers within their ranks.

"It would be all about going after the crimes, not the culture," said Anne Wilde, a former plural wife who now is widowed and the co-director of Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group.

Yet anti-polygamy activists are equally adamant that the culture invariably leads to problems. At minimum, they say, women are marginalized by a religious doctrine that turns them into a modern harem for their husbands. They tell of marriages in which the husband had more children than he could ever hope to support, thus leaving wives to scrape by as best they could on welfare. But worse, they say, is that the culture has a long tradition of physical abuse, rape, incest and underage marriage that endures.

"I've lived that life," said Vicky Prunty, a co-director of Tapestry Against Polygamy, the state's most vocal anti-polygamy group. "Anyone who tells you women are not being hurt there--forced into allowing their husbands to take on other wives in the name of religion, getting married too young to men much older, being hit or worse--[is] not being truthful."

Elaine Tyler, a volunteer at The HOPE Organization, a group geared toward helping those who have left polygamous communities, has seen firsthand the effects a polygamous lifestyle has on some of its members.

Tyler has met dozens of women, many of whom were forcibly married to much older men long before their 16th birthday, the legal age for marriage in Utah. Many also said they were abused by family members in the Jeffs communities of Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah, where incest has become so widespread that the group has what are believed to be the world's highest rates of fumarase deficiency, a rare genetic disease that causes profound mental retardation.

"The abuses are shocking," Tyler said. "Most of the women to emerge from these communities have no idea how unacceptable what has happened to them is. If all they've ever seen is their sister in bed next to them getting molested, then when it starts happening to them they don't think, `Hey, this is wrong.' They think, `Now it's my turn.'"

Reluctant witnesses

In fact, getting witnesses to testify to abuses is always the hardest part of polygamy prosecutions. Llewellyn, a former lieutenant in the Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office who secretly took three wives himself before becoming an outspoken polygamy author and critic, said one of the key reasons he disavowed the lifestyle was seeing how polygamous communities routinely refused to testify against those within their fold who were committing crimes.

"I guess what I hope now is that I can pay back for some of the things I've done and been a part of," said Llewellyn, who wrote "Polygamy's Rape of Rachel Strong," a book that chronicled the life of a young woman who left a heavy-handed polygamous community, but only after being pressured into marrying her middle-age stepfather. Llewellyn argues in the book that Strong's stepfather, well-known Utah polygamist James Harmston, forced her into marriage and sex through a campaign of spiritual coercion as "effective as putting a gun to her head." Harmston has called Strong mentally ill and denied having forced her into the marriage.

On a recent Friday evening, as the fall chill began to creep into the mountain air, teenagers from a polygamous community on the outskirts of Salt Lake City gathered for a barn dance.

Erin Thompson, 15, typified the youth of the community who were there: bright, polite, optimistic. She spoke of her plans to attend college, perhaps become a dentist. Looking further ahead, she spoke of marriage and children, and, without hesitation, said she hoped to be a plural wife. She said she felt a religious calling to do so and believed that having to share a husband would teach her about sacrifice and prevent her from making him the center of her universe.

"Bad things happen in every community, whether they are polygamous or not," she said. "I know that. But I believe that this lifestyle can bring more blessings than you can imagine if it is lived correctly, and I understand that if it is lived wrongly it can bring that same amount of pain."

CIVIL LAW:

To Build A Better Fraud Trap (STPPP)

By Julie Forster

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 24, 2006

With insurers paying out billions of dollars in bogus claims each year, UnitedHealth figured there had to be a better way to identify medical fraud. So over a year ago, fraud investigators at Ingenix, a division of UnitedHealth Group, were told to do something bold.

The result: Ingenix took a page from the credit card industry, developing an analytical tool that helps predict fraud. Ingenix is hoping the technology — now in testing — will work so well that other insurers will be interested in buying it.

Ingenix has company in pursuing the better fraud trap. Fair Isaac, the Minneapolis-based firm well-known in the banking business for its credit card scoring model, has been pushing its own fraud-detection system for more than three years. Though each company says its technology is better than the other's, both agree that fraud is one driver of skyrocketing health care costs.

Estimates of the money lost to health care fraud range widely, from 3 percent of annual health care spending — or some $60 billion — to more than $170 billion. The U.S. General Accounting Office in a 1996 report on health care fraud, noted: "The amount of fraud within the health care system is, by its nature, impossible to accurately detect."

"No one really knows how much fraud is out there," acknowledged Christopher Dorn, director of anti-fraud and recovery solutions for Eden Prairie-based Ingenix. Even so, based on the 3 percent estimate, Dorn claims that Ingenix can identify and save an insurer about half of that.

Squeezing fraud out of the system has taken on new urgency in an era when insurers are having a tougher time increasing premiums. For UnitedHealth Group, that includes its insurance business unit, which is called UnitedHealthcare.

Companies like Ingenix are using computers to sift through massive amounts of data and spot subtle aberrant patterns. Using sophisticated software, the company's real-life experience and its millions of medical histories and records, Ingenix contends that it can tabulate a health care fraud "score." "Cases with a high score are an indication for us to start an investigation," Dorn said.

While this fraud score is derived from potentially thousands of variables, common ones include the distance between a patient's home and where services were allegedly rendered or the incidence of patients being treated after-hours and on holidays.

Most insurers have some capacity to identify billing errors, fraud and abuse. The problem is, most fraud is detected after the claim has been paid. At that point, it's difficult and costly to recover the money. If any money is recovered, it's typically dimes on the dollar. Industry officials agree: a "prevent-and-save versus a pay-and-chase approach" is more effective.

The technology is basically a computer model that acts like a human brain in learning to spot fraud. It's not easy. The billing system physicians use to get reimbursed from insurers requires thousands of codes.

Interpreting those codes is complex. While that leaves opportunity for manipulation, it also leaves a lot of room for innocent billing errors or just differences in interpretation between two groups of people with different goals — the insurers, which are often public companies, and the physicians.

"It's really pretty gray and that grayness creates tension around the relationship between providers and payers," said Roy Sailor, Ingenix's senior vice president, payer solutions.

While doctors are as quick as anybody to criticize fraud, they also have concerns about the new brand of fraud-fighting software. "We think a big distinction needs to be made between intentional acts to defraud from inadvertent billing errors or legitimate differences in medical interpretation," said Dr. Edward Hill, a Tupelo, Miss., physician and past president of the American Medical Association. "This is a very complex area where opinions even among physicians will differ a great many times. Doctors feel intimidated by health insurers that use this kind of mechanism to almost be accusing of doctors of committing a fraud."

At Ingenix headquarters in Eden Prairie, 220 doctors, nurses, mathematicians, lawyers, former law-enforcement officers and others work to detect scams and abuse. The company is working with ID Analytics, an identify-fraud company based in San Diego, to develop the technology.

It is testing the technology on four clients. The millions of claims they generate are assessed and given a score, much like a so-called FICO score that is used to judge a person's creditworthiness. (Fair Isaac developed the FICO score years ago.)

Health care fraud is widespread because the opportunities for profit are great. Brokers, health-plan employees, hospitals, doctors and health-plan members all have the ability to commit wrongdoing. In fact, two years ago UnitedHealthcare agreed to pay the government $3.5 million to settle allegations that the company defrauded the Medicare program, according to the U.S. Justice Department. The company did not admit wrongdoing.

Increasingly, these schemes are being pulled off by organized crime groups, according to the FBI, the primary investigative agency against health care fraud in both public and private health insurance programs.

The big challenge is accurately determining which claims should have a harder look, said Louis Saccoccio, executive director of the National Health Care Anti-Fraud Association in Washington D.C.

Many states have laws requiring insurers to pay providers speedily after the claim is filed. Unless there is evidence of fraud — and that exception is tightly defined — Saccoccio says, claims must be paid promptly. "You cannot hold back large numbers of claims simply because you suspect fraud."

That's important, particularly given the wide and ever-evolving number of schemes. Fraud can run the gamut from physicians filing a claim for service not provided to multimillion-dollar scams.

One scam, involving scores of patients at a Southern California outpatient surgery centers, generated more than $1 billion in claims nationally. The patients were recruited to undergo unnecessary medical services in return for cash or cosmetic surgery. Close to $500 million in claims were reportedly paid. UnitedHealth was one of the first insurers to notice a strange pattern in the claims it processed and notified the FBI.

In some of those cases, recruiters who worked in factories were paid to recruit their co-workers to earn money in exchange for a medical procedure. Patients from across the country — including Minnesota — were flown to Southern California to have needless endoscopies and colonoscopies; procedures that normally are billed at about $5,000. UnitedHealthcare was charged $50,000 and $70,000 per procedure, according to Ingenix.

The scam continually morphed into new forms of fraud. One involved groups of minorities — including hundreds of Hmong in St. Paul — who were targeted for sweaty palm surgery. Recruiters would talk low-income workers into a weekend trip to California for surgery in exchange for a kickback in the hundreds of dollars, Ingenix investigators said.

Ferreting out intentional crime from a legitimate mistake or simply a difference in opinion between a doctor and insurer is not always black and white. Robin Mathias, a health care fraud consultant based in Santa Rosa, Calif., noted that while it is cutting edge, the technology is not as clear-cut when used to find health care fraud as it is in finding fraud in the credit card industry.

For one thing, it may be very limited in the type of fraud it can detect. "Predictive modeling is a great advance but it is still limited in the context of health care fraud detection," Mathias said.

Fair Isaac started using a tool similar to what Ingenix is developing with ID Analytics more than three years ago.

Fair Isaac, the king of the FICO score, is definitely the "gold standard" said Bryan Boda, director of health care solutions for Fair Isaac. He said whether Ingenix's product will be viable competition is hard to say. "Based on what I've heard, it sounds like they are trying to tap into a market that Fair Isaac has made," he said. "If they are successful at developing a product, than they would be trying to compete for that business."

Fair Isaac is busy signing up insurance companies to use its product. Boda declined to specify how many clients it has using the new technology or the amount of revenue generated by the product.

The challenge in developing the tool is to create something that is accurately detecting fraud against huge volume. At least until Ingenix actually rolls out its product, Boda says Fair Isaac is alone in its niche.

"No one else," Boda said, "has proven ability to solve that problem."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

KC Grapples With Peril Of Slavery (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 24, 2006

Slavery.

It's a cruel reality for hundreds of thousands of men, women and children around the world.

And, as Kansas City learned last week, it's even here.

Eight young men from Russia were duped into driving ice cream trucks for up to 14 hours a day, seven days a week, for meager pay, federal prosecutors said. The case came three months after a Kansas City man was charged with forcing three teenage girls — two of them 13 — to work as prostitutes.

Those local cases involve the two most pervasive forms of modern slavery: Forced labor and sexual trafficking.

"I think most people see it as a problem in the Third World," said Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri. "It's right here in our backyard."

Federal prosecutors earlier this summer established a local human trafficking task force similar to those operating in about two dozen other American cities, and it didn't take long for the streets of Kansas City to provide the first case.

"How could it not be in Kansas City? I've seen it everywhere else," Schlozman said. "This is one of the most evil crimes imaginable, exploiting the most vulnerable members of society."

Since Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000, it has been used to prosecute dozens of cases. About two-thirds have involved the sex industry.

A photograph from one of those cases haunted Schlozman. It showed the place in Florida where traffickers from Mexico kept a girl in virtual bondage.

She was 14 and far away from home, childhood a long-ago memory. She lived and worked in a space the size of a bathroom stall. Her job was to sexually service as many as 30 men a day. When her work was done she slept on the same bed.

On a small table next to the bed was a roll of paper towels and the girl's only possession — a teddy bear.

DOJ_NMG_0068264

"It absolutely breaks your heart," Schlozman said.

Government officials estimate that 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders each year and forced to work in sweat shops, farm fields and brothels. As many as 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States annually, according to the Department of Justice.

"They might not have shackles, but slavery is the only way to describe their treatment," said Mark Taylor of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Last year, the U.S. government declared 230 people from more than 30 countries as human trafficking victims eligible to receive benefits comparable to political refugees. About half of the victims have received special visas that allow them to remain in the United States.

Forced labor

That process is now ongoing for the eight Russians in the ice cream case. Prosecutors are working with private social-service agencies to care for the college-age men, and citizens have contacted Schlozman's office to offer help.

Five people were indicted by a federal grand jury last week for allegedly using threats and coercion to force the Russian students to work in Kansas City this summer.

Despite the unique aspects of the case involving ice cream trucks and Russians brought to the Midwest, Taylor from the State Department said the allegations shared common denominators with typical trafficking cases.

According to the indictment, the students were recruited in their home country and were lied to about the work they would be doing and the amount of money they would earn. They each paid $2,500 for the program, which allowed them to enter the United States on legal work visas.

Once here, their passports and other documents were confiscated. They were isolated and prevented from contacting their families and warned that if they contacted authorities they would be arrested, deported and forbidden from ever returning to the United States.

Schlozman said he could not discuss the specifics of the case but said traffickers typically preyed on unsophisticated individuals who were unfamiliar with American laws and customs.

Often they come from countries where law enforcement corruption is pervasive and they distrust the police.

"The victims suffer extraordinary psychological abuse, emotional trauma and they often feel like they don't have anywhere to turn," Schlozman said.

The trauma is exacerbated in many of the sex trafficking cases because the victims are often minors.

"That is where we need to have the spotlight," said Kristy Childs, founder of Veronica's Voice, a Kansas City group that helps the victims of prostitution. "We have American girls that are being trafficked."

Most of the woman Childs tries to help are adults, but most said they were minors when they were introduced into prostitution. Under the federal law, prostituting minors is considered to be trafficking even if no coercion is involved.

Harsh life

Drugs, robberies, sexually transmitted diseases, car thefts and assaults are common baggage of the prostitution business, said Sgt. Brad Dumit of the Kansas City Police Department's vice section.

"These girls are abused emotionally, physically and spiritually," Dumit said. "It's a scary, scary lifestyle."

Take the case of J.G. She was 15 when she was recruited into the "stable" of a Kansas City man now jailed on multiple charges of promoting prostitution. He was charged in Jackson County Circuit Court before the federal trafficking task force was established.

According to court documents, he kept all the money she earned. In exchange she got a place to sleep, clothes, food and all the crack cocaine she could smoke. Once she tried to secretly keep some of her money. When he found out he punched her in the face and tore out her eyebrow ring.

Kansas City's first human trafficking case involved three area sisters who ran away from home. The twins were 13 and their older sibling was 15.

DOJ_NMG_0068265

Federal prosecutors said Don L. Elbert II, who pleaded not guilty and faces trial later this year, took it from there when he spotted them outside a liquor store.

According to prosecutors:

Elbert fed them, dressed them and gave them a place to stay. He also employed them.

Seven nights a week for about a month he dropped them off on a busy corner where they had unprotected sex with strangers for money, all of which they turned over to Elbert.

The scheme unraveled when one of the girls was arrested June 21 after making a deal with an undercover police officer to provide oral sex for $20.

Schlozman likens human traffickers to an “evil employment agency.”

“They are unscrupulous individuals who treat their workers like chattel,” he said. “It’s all about making a profit, and whoever suffers is no concern whatsoever.”

Despite the increased attention to the problem, Taylor said the true scope was not known.

“By its very nature it’s hidden,” he said. “Traffickers are extremely innovative at luring people into a trap for their economic gain.”

The Kansas City cases show that the problem can crop up anywhere and take any form.

“The true outer limits have yet to be defined,” he said.

Shooting By Police Called 'Murder' (STPPP)

By Aron Kahn

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 24, 2006

Black community leaders and relatives of Dominic Aries Felder on Friday accused Minneapolis police of murdering the allegedly emotionally disturbed man and intending to "whitewash" the probe of two officers involved in the incident.

"The police department messed up," the Rev. Devin Miller, pastor of Emmanuel Tabernacle Church in Minneapolis, said of Wednesday night's fatal skirmish. "There was no reason for the shooting, and we firmly believe they intended to shoot him to death."

The leaders said they could not trust the department to objectively investigate the case and will ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Monday to take control of the matter.

"Let this not be just another shooting," said Miller, a St. Paul resident and member of the God Squad, a group of ministers and laymen who try to bridge the gap between the police and citizens in St. Paul. "This is the fork in the road."

Minneapolis police on Friday continued to withhold all details of the incident, in which an officer's gun was fired seven times. The incident began with a report of a domestic dispute at Bloomington Avenue South near East 40th Street, in which the 27-year-old Felder was threatening to kill people, police said.

Two officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave pending a review of the incident — standard procedure in such cases. The officers are Lawrence Loonsfoot and Jason King, both of whom joined the department in 1993.

No other gun was found at the shooting scene, leading relatives and community leaders to believe police acted with unnecessary force in killing Felder.

"We recognize that this is a very painful time for Dominic Felder's family," interim Police Chief Tim Dolan said in a statement Friday. "We recognize that it may be difficult for the family to wait for the completion of the investigation before they have all of the answers, but it is important that we are confident that any information we release is completely accurate."

But surrounded by two dozen of Felder's relatives and friends, Miller and community leaders Ron Edwards and Spike Moss said at a news conference that police totally mishandled the matter, which began with a 911 call.

Edwards, a member of the city's Police Community Relations Council, said police should have sent members of a critical incident team because the 911 caller had told them Felder had severe emotional problems.

DOJ_NMG_0068266

Miller, who is the grandfather of one of Felder's children, said in an interview that Felder was suffering from undiagnosed, untreated depression and that he felt pressured by financial and family circumstances.

Felder lived in Minneapolis with Tiana Williams and their 5-year-old daughter, but that night he had difficulty reaching his other child, an 8-year-old girl who lived with her mother in St. Paul, Miller said.

"So he snapped," he said.

According to the police account Thursday, officers were told Felder was in an animated dispute with a resident, had threatened to kill neighbors and had smashed their front window with a 60-pound piece of concrete.

When the two officers arrived, Felder allegedly fled on foot, with the officers chasing him. A struggle ensued and one of the officer's guns fired seven rounds, police said.

Miller said there was no need to kill Felder, a small man who could be overpowered easily, and that the officers should be charged with "first-degree murder."

Relatives repeated that Felder had never been arrested, but the Pioneer Press reported Friday that he was convicted of fifth-degree misdemeanor assault last year in Apple Valley after being arrested on suspicion of "body-slamming" and then kicking a 21-year-old woman with whom he was living.

Edwards said the latest fatal shooting by police, the 15th in six years, should cause the City Council to delay approval of Dolan as chief, at least until the Felder matter is reconciled.

Mayor R.T. Rybak has recommended Dolan to replace Chief William McManus, who took the top police job in San Antonio in March. Dolan was assistant chief before then.

Faithful Take Turn In Political Pulpit (MJS)

By Bill Glauber

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 24, 2006

State marriage amendment divides religious

The battle over Wisconsin's marriage amendment isn't a simple political fight.

It's a struggle over values, too, an issue that bubbled for years in the statehouse and houses of worship, on the airwaves and in church pews. It likely will come to a boil in the closing weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

From sermons to lectures, DVDs and church bulletins, religious organizations and clergy are taking stands, a not-so-subtle intersection of religion and politics at the ballot box that in many ways is unprecedented in modern Wisconsin history.

Catholic bishops and evangelical Christian pastors are allied with some mainline Protestants who support passage of an amendment to the state constitution to recognize marriage as "between one man and one woman."

On the other side are at least eight mainline Protestant denominational bodies, scores of clergy and many Jewish leaders who oppose the amendment in part because the referendum also would prohibit "a legal status identical or substantially similar to that of marriage for unmarried individuals."

The stakes couldn't be greater as the state debates same-sex marriage and civil unions.

In Wisconsin, both sides organized for months and, in some cases several years, to garner support in churches and synagogues. Although religious leaders might be divided over the amendment, they appear more united in opposition to another Nov. 7 ballot initiative, the advisory referendum to restore the death penalty.

"This is a culture war, that's what it is," said Julaine Appling, executive director of the Family Research Institute of Wisconsin, a pro-amendment group.

"How many churches have gone down the path of jettisoning the authority of Scripture?" she said. "The churches that still accept the authority of God's word accept marriage is only between a man and a woman."

The main group that opposes the marriage amendment, Fair Wisconsin, also is making a push in the religious community.

"It's important for us to mobilize clergy on our side, who say, 'We are Christian, we love our neighbors,' " said Joshua Freker, the Fair Wisconsin spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0068267

"Christian and Jews compelled to oppose the amendment because of their faith" presents a powerful message, Freker said.

In the "faith campaign," religious leaders and organizations representing 5,000 churches and 2 million congregants support the amendment, Appling said. Organizations representing 500,000 congregants have passed resolutions against the amendment, according to Fair Wisconsin.

Religion and politics have long mixed in America.

But throwing a religious organization's full weight behind a candidate, at least in modern times, is unusual because of one simple item - the tax code. Tax-exempt organizations, such as religious groups, can't endorse candidates. But they can engage in lobbying activities, which include referendums and constitutional amendments.

Of course, tax laws don't keep clergy from endorsing candidates. But they have to be clear they're speaking on their own behalf. Religious groups have taken stands on the issues of the day, from the abolition of slavery to civil rights, abortion to matters of war and peace. Multifaceted issue

Defining marriage, and weighing whether to extend rights to same-sex relationships involving gays and lesbians, is an issue that crosses political, religious and social lines.

It's also part of a decades-long conversation conducted in places of worship, sometimes uniting congregations, sometimes dividing them. At the outset, clergy and parishioners struggled with the issue of how welcoming congregations should be with gays and lesbians. The conversation then extended to the debate over the ordination of gay and lesbian ministers and rabbis.

Religious organizations and clergy entered the political fray that erupted after a 2003 Massachusetts court ruling to legalize same-sex marriage. Twenty states have adopted marriage amendments.

It shouldn't be a surprise to see a marriage amendment campaign target churches.

According to a recent national survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, 78% of white evangelical Protestants, 74% of black Protestants, 58% of white Catholics and 47% of white mainline Protestants oppose gay marriage. Among those who were identified as seculars, 63% supported gay marriage.

Civil unions were opposed by majorities of white evangelicals, black Protestants and those who attend church but favored among majorities of white mainline Protestants, Catholics and seculars, the poll found.

The bottom line: "People know where they stand on the issue," said Kimberly Conger, an Iowa State University political science professor who has published extensively on Christian conservatives. "It's a matter of getting supporters to the polls." Taking fight to the pews

Appling's group has distributed more than 5,000 copies of a DVD called "The Battle for Marriage in Wisconsin" to churches.

Amendment opponents also have gone through churches to gain support, often gathering at sanctuaries before door-knocking campaigns or informational meetings.

Religious leaders have not shied from the debate. In fact, many have welcomed the opportunity to speak out.

The state's Catholic bishops weighed this summer when they issued a letter of support for the amendment while also stating "support for this amendment does not imply or justify animosity toward any individual or group."

"We're teachers," Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan said in an interview. "We're best when we encourage, educate and exhort."

Parishioners don't want bishops "to tell them how to vote, and woe to us if we did," Dolan said.

Dolan and the state's four other bishops began a letter during the winter on the marriage amendment, as well as the referendum on the death penalty, which they oppose, he said.

The bishops support the marriage amendment because "we feel as pastors we need to do anything we can to support and strengthen the pivotal institution of marriage," Dolan said.

He admitted that "we bishops find ourselves attacked by both sides."

"I don't mind that at all. We have people who are anti-gay, who say, 'You bishops are too soft on homosexuals, you keep telling us they need to be treated with dignity and respect and let's just say this is an abomination.' We say, 'Absolutely not.' A person's dignity is not dependent on their sexual orientation."

DOJ_NMG_0068268

Dolan admitted the bishops also face criticism from those who oppose the amendment.

"I guess what we're saying, marriage is not a human right. It's a responsibility and a gift," he said.

Bishop Paul Stumme-Diers, leader of the Greater Milwaukee Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, also views the marriage amendment as a defining issue.

Only, he's opposed.

In 2005, the synod passed a resolution in opposition to the legislation. At this year's synod assembly, the group decided to have a conversation about the amendment, a symbolic and substantive move to discuss an important issue of the day that Stumme-Diers hopes is continued at individual churches.

"I hear great concern about the marriage amendment both in terms of the tenor that it takes and the climate it creates in our state," he said. "People are saying the church needs to speak to this so we will have a more healthy and tolerant spirit. I hear from people that they are disturbed that civil rights are potentially going to be curtailed through such a referendum."

Stumme-Diers said the teachings of Jesus show the need to be "attentive to those who are often left on the outside."

"We need to be especially mindful of those who are vulnerable and ostracized by society. Jesus is all about honoring relationships and trying to find honest and safe relationships. For some people, their orientation leads them in ways that makes us heterosexuals uncomfortable.

"My opposition to the marriage amendment is also about strengthening traditional marriage. I'm a strong advocate of monogamy and of people being committed to another person."

Officials Wary Of Electronic Voting Machines (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A growing number of state and local officials are getting cold feet about electronic voting technology, and many are making last-minute efforts to limit or reverse the rollout of new machines in the November elections.

Less than two months before voters head to the polls, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. of Maryland this week became the most recent official to raise concerns publicly. Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, said he lacked confidence in the state's new $106 million electronic voting system and suggested a return to paper ballots.

Dozens of states have adopted electronic voting technology to comply with federal legislation in 2002 intended to phase out old-fashioned lever and punch-card machines after the "hanging chads" confusion of the 2000 presidential election.

But some election officials and voting experts say they fear that the new technology may have only swapped old problems for newer, more complicated ones. Their concerns became more urgent after widespread problems with the new technology were reported this year in primaries in Ohio, Arkansas, Illinois, Maryland and elsewhere.

This year, about one-third of all precincts nationwide are using the electronic voting technology for the first time, raising the chance of problems at the polls as workers struggle to adjust to the new system.

"I think there is good reason for concern headed into the midterm elections," said Richard F. Celeste, a Democrat and former Ohio governor who was co-chairman of a study of new machines for the National Research Council with Richard L. Thornburgh, a Republican and former governor of Pennsylvania.

"You have to train the poll workers," Mr. Celeste said, "especially since many of them are of a generation for whom this technology is a particular challenge. You need to have plans in place to relocate voters to another precinct if machines don't work, and I just don't know whether these steps have been taken."

Paperless touch-screen machines have been the biggest source of consternation, and with about 40 percent of registered voters nationally expected to cast their ballots on these machines in the midterm elections, many local officials fear that the lack of a paper trail will leave no way to verify votes in case of fraud or computer failure.

As a result, states are scrambling to make last-minute fixes before the technology has its biggest test in November, when voter turnout will be higher than in the primaries, many races will be close and the threat of litigation will be ever-present.

"We have the real chance of recounts in the coming elections, and if you have differences between the paper trail and the electronic record, which number prevails?" said Richard L. Hasen, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles and the author of the Election Law blog, www.electionlawblog.org.

Professor Hasen found that election challenges filed in court grew to 361 in 2004, up from 197 in 2000. "What you have coming up is the intersection of new technology and an unclear legal regime," he said.

Like Mr. Ehrlich, other state officials have decided on a late-hour change of course. In January, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico decided to reverse plans to use the touch-screen machines, opting instead to return to paper ballots with optical scanners. Last month, the Connecticut secretary of state, Susan Bysiewicz, decided to do the same.

"I didn't want my state to continue being an embarrassment like Ohio and Florida every four years," said Mr. Richardson, a Democrat, adding, "I also thought we needed to restore voter confidence, and that wasn't going to happen with the touch-screen machines."

In Pennsylvania, a state senator introduced a bill last week that would require every precinct to provide voters with the option to use paper ballots, which would involve printing extra absentee ballots and having them on site. A similar measure is being considered on the federal level.

In the last year or so, at least 27 states have adopted measures requiring a paper trail, which has often involved replacing paperless touch-screen machines with ones that have a printer attached.

But even the systems backed up by paper have problems. In a study released this month, the nonpartisan Election Science Institute found that about 10 percent of the paper ballots sampled from the May primary in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, were uncountable because printers had jammed and poll workers had loaded the paper in backward.

Lawsuits have been filed in Colorado, Arizona, California, Pennsylvania and Georgia seeking to prohibit the use of touch-screen machines.

Deborah L. Markowitz, the Vermont secretary of state and the president of the National Association of Secretaries of State, said that while there might be some problems in November, she expected them to be limited and isolated.

"The real story of the recent primary races was how few problems there were, considering how new this technology is," said Ms. Markowitz, a Democrat. "The failures we did see, like in Maryland, Ohio and Missouri, were small and most often from poll workers not being prepared."

Many states have installed the machines in the past year because of a federal deadline. If states wanted to take advantage of federal incentives offered by the Help America Vote Act, they had to upgrade their voting machines by 2006.

In the primary last week in Maryland, several counties reported machine-related problems, including computers that misidentified the party affiliations of voters, electronic voter registration lists that froze and voting-machine memory cards whose contents could not be electronically transmitted. In Montgomery County, election workers did not receive access cards to voting machines for the county's 238 precincts on time, forcing as many as 12,000 voters to use provisional paper ballots until they ran out.

"We had a bad experience in the primary that led to very long lines, which means people get discouraged and leave the polls without voting," said Governor Ehrlich, who is in a tight re-election race and has been accused by his critics of trying to use the voting issue to motivate his base. "We have hot races coming up in November and turnout will be high, so we can expect lines to be two or three times longer. If even a couple of these machines break down, we could be in serious trouble."

Problems during primaries elsewhere have been equally severe.

In the Illinois primary in March, Cook County officials delayed the results of the county board elections for a week because of human and mechanical problems at hundreds of sites with new voting machines made by Sequoia Voting Systems.

In the April primary in Tarrant County, Tex., machines made by Hart InterCivic counted some ballots as many as six times, recording 100,000 more votes than were cast. The problem was attributed to programming errors, not hacking.

In the past year, the Government Accountability Office, the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University and the Congressional Research Service have released reports raising concerns about the security of electronic machines.

Advocates of the new technology dispute the conclusions.

DOJ_NMG_0068270

"Many of these are exaggerated accusations by a handful of vocal activists," said Mark Radke, director of marketing for Diebold Election Systems, one of the largest sellers of touch-screen machines. "But if you want to talk about fraud and tabulation error, the newer technology is far more accurate."

Mr. Radke cited a study from the California Institute of Technology that found that between the 2000 election, when touch-screen machines were not used, and the 2004 election, when they were, there was a 40 percent reduction in voter error in Maryland, making the vote there the most accurate in the country.

"There is always the potential for human error," Mr. Radke said, "but that is easily correctible."

But critics say bugs and hackers could corrupt the machines.

A Princeton University study released this month on one of Diebold's machines — a model that Diebold says it no longer uses — found that hackers could easily tamper with electronic voting machines by installing a virus to disable the machines and change the vote totals.

Mr. Radke dismissed the concerns about hackers and bugs as most often based on unrealistic scenarios.

"We don't leave these machines sitting on a street corner," he said. "But in one of these cases, they gave the hackers complete and unfettered access to the machines."

Warren Stewart, legislative director for VoteTrustUSA, an advocacy group that has criticized electronic voting, said that after poll workers are trained to use the machines in the days before an election, many counties send the machines home with the workers. "That seems like pretty unfettered access to me," Mr. Stewart said.

The Big Gamble On Electronic Voting (NYT)

By Randall Stross

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

HANGING chads made it difficult to read voter intentions in 2000. Hotel minibar keys may do the same for the elections in November.

The mechanics of voting have undergone a major change since the imbroglio that engulfed presidential balloting in 2000. Embarrassed by an election that had to be settled by the Supreme Court, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act of 2002, which provided funds to improve voting equipment.

From 2003 to 2005, some $3 billion flew out of the federal purse for equipment purchases. Nothing said "state of the art" like a paperless voting machine that electronically records and tallies votes with the tap of a touch screen. Election Data Services, a political consulting firm that specializes in redistricting, estimates that about 40 percent of registered voters will use an electronic machine in the coming elections.

One brand of machine leads in market share by a sizable margin: the AccuVote, made by Diebold Election Systems. Two weeks ago, however, Diebold suffered one of the worst kinds of public embarrassment for a company that began in 1859 by making safes and vaults.

Edward W. Felten, a professor of computer science at Princeton, and his student collaborators conducted a demonstration with an AccuVote TS and noticed that the key to the machine's memory card slot appeared to be similar to one that a staff member had at home.

When he brought the key into the office and tried it, the door protecting the AccuVote's memory card slot swung open obligingly. Upon examination, the key turned out to be a standard industrial part used in simple locks for office furniture, computer cases, jukeboxes — and hotel minibars.

Once the memory card slot was accessible, how difficult would it be to introduce malicious software that could manipulate vote tallies? That is one of the questions that Professor Felten and two of his students, Ariel J. Feldman and J. Alex Haldeman, have been investigating. In the face of Diebold's refusal to let scientists test the AccuVote, the Princeton team got its hands on a machine only with the help of a third party.

Even before the researchers had made the serendipitous discovery about the minibar key, they had released a devastating critique of the AccuVote's security. For computer scientists, they supplied a technical paper; for the general public, they prepared an accompanying video. Their short answer to the question of the practicality of vote theft with the AccuVote: easily accomplished.

The researchers demonstrated the machine's vulnerability to an attack by means of code that can be introduced with a memory card. The program they devised does not tamper with the voting process. The machine records each vote as it should, and makes a backup copy, too.

Every 15 seconds or so, however, the rogue program checks the internal vote tallies, then adds and subtracts votes, as needed, to reach programmed targets; it also makes identical changes in the backup file. The alterations cannot be detected later because the total number of votes perfectly matches the total number of voters. At the end of the election day, the rogue program erases itself, leaving no trace.

On Sept. 13, when Princeton's Center for Information Technology Policy posted its findings, Diebold issued a press release that shrugged off the demonstration and analysis. It said Princeton's AccuVote machine was "two generations old" and "not used anywhere in the country."

I spoke last week with Professor Felten, who said he could not imagine how a newer version of the AccuVote's software could protect itself against this kind of attack. But he also said he would welcome the opportunity to test it. I called Diebold to see if it would lend Princeton a machine.

Mark G. Radke, director for marketing at Diebold, said that the AccuVote machines were certified by state election officials and that no academic researcher would be permitted to test an AccuVote supplied by the company. "This is analogous to launching a nuclear missile," he said enigmatically, adding that Diebold had to restrict "access to the buttons."

I persisted. Suppose, I asked, that a test machine were placed in the custodial care of the United States Election Assistance Commission, a government agency. Mr. Radke demurred again, saying the company's critics were so focused on software that they "have no appreciation of physical security" that protects the machines from intrusion.

This same point was featured prominently in the company's press release that criticized the Princeton study, saying it "all but ignores physical security and election procedures." It is a criticism that collides with the facts on Page 5 of the Princeton study, where the authors provide step-by-step details of how to install the malicious software in the AccuVote.

Even before the minibar lineage of the AccuVote key had been discovered, the researchers had learned that the lock was easily circumvented: one of them could consistently pick it in less than 10 seconds.

If skeptics cannot believe what they read about the ease of manipulating an election, they can watch the 10-minute online video: the AccuVote lock is picked, a memory card is inserted and the malicious software is loaded; the machine is rebooted, and within 60 seconds the machine is ready to throw the election in favor of any specified candidate.

Computer scientists with expertise in security issues have been sounding alarms for years. David L. Dill at Stanford and Douglas W. Jones at the University of Iowa were among the first to alert the public to potential problems. But the possibility of vote theft by electronic means remained nothing more than a hypothesis — until the summer of 2003, when the code for the AccuVote's operating system was discovered on a Diebold server that was publicly accessible.

The code quickly made its way into researchers' hands. Suspected vulnerabilities were confirmed, and never-contemplated sloppiness was added to the list of concerns. At a computer security conference, the AccuVote's anatomy was analyzed closely by a team: Aviel D. Rubin, a computer science professor at Johns Hopkins; two junior associates, Tadayoshi Kohno and Adam Stubblefield; and Dan S. Wallach, an associate professor in computer science at Rice. They described how the AccuVote software design rendered the machine vulnerable to manipulation by smart cards. They found that the standard protections to prevent alteration of the internal code were missing; they characterized the system as "far below even the most minimal security standards."

Professor Rubin has just published a nontechnical memoir, "Brave New Ballot: The Battle to Safeguard Democracy in the Age of Electronic Voting" (Morgan Road Books), that describes how his quiet life was upended after he and his colleagues published their paper. He recalls in his book that Diebold's lawyers sent each of the paper's authors a letter threatening the possibility of legal action, warning them to "exercise caution" in interviews with the press lest they make a statement that would "appear designed to improperly impair and impede Diebold's existing and future business." Johns Hopkins rallied to his side, however, and the university's president, William R. Brody, commended him for being on the case.

Recently, there have been signs that states are having second thoughts about trusting their AccuVote equipment. Officials in California, Florida and Pennsylvania have been outspoken about their concerns. In Maryland earlier this year, the state House of Delegates voted 137 to 0 in favor of a bill to prohibit the use of its AccuVote machines because they were not equipped to generate a paper audit trail. (The state Senate did not take up the measure and it died.)

Professor Rubin favors the use of touch screens only for "ballot marking" — capturing a voter's intended choice — then printing out a paper ballot with only the voter's chosen candidates that the voter can visually check. Election officials can then use the slip to tally votes with an optical scanner made by a different manufacturer.

Manual audits of the tallies in at least 1 percent of all precincts, as is now required in California, would provide a transparent method of checking for integrity. Should a full recount be necessary, the paper ballots, containing only the selected names, provide unambiguous records of original intent.

"Let computers do what they do best," Professor Rubin said, "and let paper do what it does best."

Ohio's Forgotten Men (NYT)

By Dan Chaon

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Cleveland

OHIO is not a third-world country, but we're working on it. Last month the Census Bureau declared that Cleveland had finally achieved the status of poorest big city in America. Add in all the voting problems we've been having recently — who knows what we'll end up with in November? "I mean really," says my friend Tom from California. "If the U.N. can supervise elections in Kosovo, why can't they go to Cleveland?" He's joking, I think.

Nevertheless, the big news all summer long was the botched May 2 primary in Cuyahoga County, with lurid tales of incompetent poll workers, disappearing memory cards and incompatible optical scan equipment. On the TV news, my wife and I watched as an elderly poll worker fed ballot paper into a machine, which then began, ruminatively, to grind it to bits.

By August, the county commissioners were gently suggesting that voters might want to use absentee ballots in November. Meanwhile, questions about the efficacy of Diebold touch-screen voting machines have slid from the realm of conspiracy theorists and into the mainstream press.

Still, the democratic process marches on, or at least hobbles forward. A lot of attention here in Ohio has focused on the governor's race, where the Democrat, the mild-mannered former minister Ted Strickland, is facing off against a love-him-or-loathe-him Republican, Ken Blackwell, our secretary of state.

Well-liked among religious conservatives, Mr. Blackwell has drawn criticism from Democrats for his dual role in the 2004 election as both the state's chief elections officer and the co-chairman of the Committee to Re-Elect George Bush in Ohio. More recently, he was challenged about his role in purchasing those Diebold touch-screen voting machines, particularly since it was discovered that he owned stock in Diebold at the time his office negotiated the deal. You have to admit, the man gives us a lot to talk about.

And so, it seems, there has been very little oxygen left in the room for the Senate race between Representative Sherrod Brown and the Republican incumbent, Mike DeWine. Though the race is tight, the campaign continues to move below the radar.

It was striking to me that everyone I talked to, from our kind-hearted Republican neighbors, Clyde and Dolly, to liberal college professors, to people waiting to catch a bus, had similar reactions. "I just don't hear people talking about it," said Jim Lentine, the proprietor of A Cut Above, a barbershop in University Heights. "People talk a lot about politics here, but that's not one of the subjects."

Mr. DeWine has been a senator for 12 years now, and Mr. Brown has been in Congress since 1993, but even with fewer than 60 days to go before the election, their names don't elicit a strong response. "To tell you the honest truth," says one well-dressed woman at Chuck's Diner in Cleveland Heights, "I don't know that much about them." However, a stern elderly man at the Sheetz gas station in North Ridgeville disagrees, telling me that the men are simply too familiar to Ohioans: "I can't imagine that anybody could be on the fence about either one of them."

The candidates haven't done much to raise their profiles. They apparently had a debate in early August, but the event wasn't open to the public — reporters only — and tapes of the encounter have not yet been released. So, down the stretch, Messrs. Brown and DeWine continue to politic in their modest fashions, touring around the state. Representative Brown speaks to workers at Denman Tire in Youngstown; Senator DeWine holds an ice cream social at his house in Cedarville. Mr. Brown addresses veterans at the Cincinnati Public Library; Mr. DeWine visits the Slovak Festival in Parma.

The candidates and their families go from town to town, smiling with babies, waving at crowds, sending out mass mailings and distributing bumper stickers. Still waiting, it seems, to make a distinct impression.

Pr. George's Voting Glitches Highlight Training Problems (WP)

By Eric Rich And Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Errors in Primary Reflect Challenges of Technology

The widely publicized failure in Prince George's County to electronically transmit results from many polls after the Sept. 12 primary was compounded by a host of other errors, including failure to swiftly collect the data cards on which some votes are recorded and to properly secure voting machines.

The last of the cards were not retrieved and counted until nine days after the balloting -- several from inside electronic voting machines from a Landover precinct where Robert J. McGinley, the county elections board's attorney, said security procedures were "just blatantly not followed."

In some instances, machines containing cards were found in storage cases that lacked a required security seal. In others, tamper tape was missing from a locked door on the machine. In still others, data cards were found in machines on which doors were not locked.

Despite the roiling debate over whether electronic voting machines might be hacked into and an election stolen, the experience of Prince George's suggests a more mundane and probably widespread challenge in voting's digital age: Armies of minimally trained, modestly paid election workers are increasingly confronted with an unfamiliar, complex business.

Although the voting process was less dramatically flawed in Prince George's than in neighboring Montgomery County, the nearly two weeks since have seethed with suspicion and recrimination.

The elections board disqualified none of the cards, but the lapses undercut assurances that officials offered after the primary. Robert J. Antonetti Sr., interim Prince George's election administrator, had said 47 uncounted cards would remain safe because of the multiple security measures.

Antonetti's predecessor, Robin Downs Colbert, who resigned in June because of frustration over the rapid changes in technology, said she and her colleagues in several other counties "knew this was where it was headed."

"We warned everyone," she said Friday. "We warned the county we didn't have enough resources. We warned the legislature that it was too much too fast. . . . People have to be trained to use technology, and we need enough time to do that."

Antonetti said that working the polls was once "a second job for tobacco farmers" but that today "we need more skilled people."

But skilled people can be hard to find when the pay for the day for even chief election judges is $200.

Other counties also tallied provisional and absentee ballots in the past week, but Prince George's was alone in having to find and upload so many data cards. Montgomery, for example, had collected the last of its data cards less than six hours after the polls closed, said Marjorie Roher, spokeswoman for that county's elections board.

"If we don't have a memory card from a precinct, then we utilize the Montgomery County police, and we go out and find that card," she said. "We don't close shop for the night until every memory card is in hand."

In Prince George's, questions swirled about the security of the missing cards. Hundreds of ballots -- perhaps more -- were not immediately counted because nearly two of every three precincts failed to transmit their results electronically the night of the primary.

Antonetti said the transmission problems may have stemmed from dialing errors or from using digital phone lines instead of the compatible analog lines -- mistakes he intends to address in training sessions before November.

DOJ_NMG_0068274

Gertrude Neff, 72, the chief judge at the C. Elizabeth Rieg Special Center in Bowie, said workers realized soon after the polls closed that their transmission cable was too short to reach a phone jack that she said was at least eight feet up a gymnasium wall. Oliver Smith, a chief election judge in a Cheverly precinct, said that after a frustrating day with the electronic equipment, he ordered the cards delivered to the office without trying to transmit data electronically.

If two attempts to transmit were unsuccessful, election workers were under orders to carry the data cards to Upper Marlboro, where they could be uploaded directly.

Yet some memory cards were not delivered until the next day; others were left in voting machines, where they remained until the machines were returned days later.

Donna Edwards, who trailed Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary, highlighted the data cards as a problem when she announced that she was contemplating legal action. Defeated county executive challenger Rushern L. Baker III (D) has requested an investigation.

The slow count magnified other problems -- some shared by other counties -- that hampered voting Sept. 12 and have fueled suspicion since.

At the troubled Landover precinct, in Matthew Henson Elementary School, voting machines that had been improperly connected to power sources went dark for nearly an hour once their batteries were drained. There and elsewhere, newly acquired electronic poll books, which were used to check in voters, crashed repeatedly. At least 15 precincts opened late because technicians failed to show up.

Some of those technicians had been assigned to ferry the electronic registries to voting locations, but judges at those precincts arrived on election morning to find them missing. That is what happened at Buck Lodge Middle School in Adelphi, where chief judge Bashir Khan said the electronic registries had not arrived when voting was to begin at 7 a.m.

"Obviously, we were panicked," said Khan, 67. "People were lining up."

The equipment was not delivered until nearly 11 a.m., he said.

To plug the gaps in the technical staff, several workers on a county government technology help desk were dispatched to polling locations, said Dale Young, 44, one such worker. They had received no training on the voting machines and had not been instructed in the elaborate security procedures, he said.

Between 2 and 3 a.m. after the vote, with data cards from one-third of the precincts uploaded, election officials stopped compiling results, saying they were too tired to continue. Roher said Montgomery officials stayed until nearly 5 a.m., working until all were uploaded.

In the days that followed, a beleaguered Antonetti provided conflicting accounts on key points such as the location of the data cards and the number that had not been counted. Although Antonetti and board members said they were doing their best to inform the public, the varying accounts deepened concerns.

Still, elections board President S. John di Stefano defended Antonetti in an interview Thursday, saying that his long experience in the field -- including 30 years in Prince George's -- made him indispensable.

Antonetti, 70, retired from Prince George's in 2000 and took a similar job in Howard County. He retired from that position before the Prince George's board brought him back to replace Colbert when she left.

Di Stefano said the board was in a bind when Colbert quit but said he was pleased Antonetti returned. The board, he said, retains confidence in Antonetti. Di Stefano, 79, said he was not troubled by the fact that Antonetti was once fined $7,500 for giving his wife and four children, including two ages 9 and 11, temporary jobs, because it was not relevant to Antonetti's professional expertise.

"I would not, under any condition, want to go into an election without Mr. Antonetti," di Stefano said.

Di Stefano and Antonetti said their office has been chronically understaffed and underfunded even as the state has increased requirements and allowed less time to complete them.

Antonetti said three employees have quit in the past two months, leaving Prince George's eight full-time staffers to handle the crunch in the state's second-largest jurisdiction. Montgomery, by contrast, employs 25.

Both counties pledged to hire and retrain technicians and judges before the general election Nov. 7 -- and to fire those who performed poorly Sept. 12.

DOJ_NMG_0068275

"Human error is going to be a factor in every election," said McGinley, the attorney for the Prince George's board. "Was this one we're proud of? No."

100 Years Later, A Painful Episode Is Observed At Last (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

ATLANTA, Sept. 23 — Two years ago, Saudia Muwwakkil, the director of communications for the Martin Luther King Jr. National Historic Site, invited community leaders to discuss how to mark the 100th anniversary of a 1906 race riot in which mobs of whites descended on the city's black residents.

The racial strife shut down Atlanta for four days and ended with the bodies of black men hanging from trees and streetlights. But of those Ms. Muwwakkil called, almost none had heard of it.

The riot, so contrary to Atlanta's conception of itself as the progressive, racially harmonious capital of the New South, had been erased from the city's consciousness, left out of timelines and textbooks.

Ms. Muwwakkil said she was not surprised by the response. "I'm an Atlanta native," she said, "and I had never learned anything about the riot. It wasn't taught."

But in the months leading up to the 100th anniversary this weekend, there has been a concerted effort to correct the city's amnesia, with walking tours, public art, memorial services, numerous articles and three new books. Genealogists have found a few descendants of those involved and located the marked tombstone of one victim. Next year, the riot will become part of the state's social studies curriculum.

The rioting began on Saturday, Sept. 22, 1906, with a surge of white hysteria fomented by segregationist politicians and, more immediately, wildly exaggerated newspaper articles of attacks on white women by black men. By the time the violence ended, at least two dozen blacks had been killed and scores more injured, some taken from their homes or pulled off streetcars.

Later accounts attributed the deaths of two whites to the rioting, one of them a pregnant woman who died of a heart attack when she saw two black men torn apart by bullets.

The violence made international headlines. But in Atlanta, newspapers played down the events, reassuring readers that the "Negroes" had been "disarmed and dispersed."

In recent years, the country has grappled with the racial episodes of its past in myriad ways, including front-page apologies by newspapers, truth commissions and criminal trials. If Atlanta is late in coming to the table, it is at least partly because of the way the city sees itself: as a place that has always offered an economic salve for racial tensions.

But the auditorium was full on Friday when Carole Merritt, a historian, stood and said, "The story of the riot has been too shameful to tell."

Ms. Merritt was participating in a symposium at Georgia State University, just blocks from the Five Points intersection downtown where the mob had first gathered. She has written a book about the Herndon family, whose patriarch, Alonzo Herndon, became Atlanta's first black millionaire. His Peachtree Street barber shop, elegantly appointed in mahogany and marble, was one of the rioters' first targets.

The city's self-image was under construction well before the riot. The black educator Booker T. Washington had offered his "Atlanta compromise," promising that blacks and whites could work together without social integration. The white newspaperman Henry W. Grady persuaded Northerners to invest in a tolerant, industrial New South.

But in 1906, the city teemed with uneasy change, full of new residents who fit into unfamiliar categories: successful black business owners, college-educated blacks, the first generation of young black men not born into slavery. During the riot, three black corpses were tossed at the base of a statue of Mr. Grady.

Though the episode is commonly called the Atlanta Race Riot, some say the name is itself a whitewash, because the word riot implies unrest by a minority group.

"It's not a riot," said June Dobbs Butts, 78. "No, it was a massacre." Ms. Butts's father, John Wesley Dobbs, a civil rights leader, referred to the episode as "the Horror."

DOJ_NMG_0068276

That first night, whites shot, beat or stabbed to death any black man they could catch. One victim was a lame bootblack, another a Western Union messenger. On Sunday, with most blacks huddled inside their homes, groups of whites went into black neighborhoods in search of more victims. Some blacks defended themselves with guns, driving away their attackers. On Monday, a white party entered Brownsville, a middle-class black neighborhood, and a shootout ensued, resulting in the death of a white county police officer named James Heard.

If the violence contradicted the city's self-image, the response was pure Atlanta. By Tuesday, white city officials had met with a hand-picked group of black leaders in an effort to restore order, beginning a tradition of interracial dialogue that became known as "the Atlanta way."

The process of forgetting began almost immediately. "Atlanta is herself again, business is restored, and the riot is forgotten," one newspaper headline declared two days later.

But the riot shaped the city in powerful ways. Scores of middle-class blacks left the city, and segregation grew more entrenched.

"Interracial cooperation was not equal," said Clarissa Myrick-Harris, a historian and member of the Coalition to Remember the 1906 Atlanta Race Riot, which planned this weekend's events. "It was another way of maintaining and asserting power over blacks."

"The white elite chose who they were going to meet with in the black community," Dr. Myrick-Harris said, and a class divide emerged. Whites blamed the lower classes, both black and white, for the violence, and some black leaders characterized blacks who fought back as threats.

The riot also weighed heavily against assimilationists like Booker T. Washington in favor of more radical black thinkers like W. E. B. DuBois, who thought federal intervention was needed to protect blacks.

"It disproved Washington's belief that if blacks worked hard, saved money and became respectable, then whites would recognize their interest in protecting them," said David Fort Godshalk, the author of a recent book about the riot.

The riot helped spur the formation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and was cited as a life-changing experience for people as diverse as Walter White, who became the head of that organization, and Margaret Mitchell, the author of "Gone With the Wind."

And its remembrance has brought a measure of pride to people like Pat Walker Bearden, who knew that her grandfather, Alexander Walker, had been in prison but only recently learned that it was because he had fired as Officer Heard approached his house. Mr. Walker had two small children and a pregnant wife. He was convicted in the officer's death.

Ms. Bearden said that while she was working on her family genealogy, she began to learn more about Mr. Walker from her father: "Dad would always start out saying, 'Papa didn't take no mess.' "

School Colors (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

When it comes to America's always-sensitive politics of race and ethnicity, something of a tectonic shift has taken place. In just a few years, immigration has replaced affirmative action as the hot-button issue. With this fall's midterm election approaching, it's hard to imagine that race-baiting politicians will play to the fears of angry white males as Jesse Helms did in 1990, when he ran an ad showing the hands of a white man crumpling up a rejection letter after learning that a job was given to a "minority because of a racial quota." Instead, in a sign of the times, Vernon Robinson, a North Carolina Republican who is running for Congress and calls himself a "black Jesse Helms," recently ran an ad showing the hands of a black woman crumpling up a rejection letter after a job was given to an "illegal alien so they could pay him under the table."

If affirmative action is no longer the divisive matter it once was, some of the credit must go to the Supreme Court. In an important decision written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court held in 2003 that affirmative action in public-university admissions was constitutional because of the educational and social benefits of diverse classrooms. Meanwhile, the politics of affirmative action has changed. On the left, some influential African-Americans have been losing faith in the integrationist ideal and are becoming more interested in educational results — and school vouchers — than in racial head-counting. Meanwhile, on the right, some conservatives are recognizing that not all departures from colorblindness cause tangible harms.

And yet the recent cease-fire and calm may be short-lived. In its new term, which begins on Oct. 2, the court has agreed to hear two major cases regarding the constitutionality of racial preferences in public elementary and high schools. Now that O'Connor has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, some liberals worry (and conservatives hope) that the end of affirmative action may once again be imminent.

The two Supreme Court cases arise out of Seattle and Jefferson County, Ky., where public elementary- and high-school students can choose, to different degrees, which school to attend. But to ensure that the schools reflect the racial balance of the school districts as a whole, administrators have used race to determine admission to the most popular schools. In both cases, parents sued when their children made an oversubscribed school their first choice and were turned down because of their race.

In its brief, the Bush administration urged the justices to draw an inflexible line: "race-conscious measures" designed to address "racial imbalance in communities or student bodies" are just as unconstitutional as the segregation struck down in Brown v. Board of Education. This extreme colorblind position, if the court adopted it, could affect as many as 1,000 districts in the country that have concluded that some racial balancing in admissions is the only way to maintain meaningful racial integration.

Although the Bush administration stops short of calling for the Supreme Court to overturn the 2003 decision allowing affirmative action in public universities, several other prominent conservatives — most notably the president's brother, Jeb Bush — have filed briefs begging the court to deliver the coup de grâce. In his brief, Governor Bush complains that the court's decision to recognize educational diversity as a constitutionally compelling goal has emboldened lower courts to uphold a host of racial-balancing programs. And especially at the K-12 level, Governor Bush and other conservatives argue, there is no clear evidence of a connection between racial diversity and educational achievement.

Not all Republicans see the harm of racial balancing in public schools in the same stark terms. Two highly respected Republican appellate judges, Alex Kozinski and Michael Boudin, voted to uphold racial-balancing plans in Seattle and Massachusetts. In separate opinions, Boudin and Kozinski claimed that unlike affirmative action in selective public universities, racial balancing in public schools doesn't seek to give one racial group an edge over another and doesn't stigmatize some students as less qualified than others. Moreover, as Kozinski suggested, there's something unseemly (and not very conservative) about unelected judges second-guessing locally elected officials on matters of educational policy.

Chief Justice John Roberts may be personally sympathetic to the Bush administration's colorblind argument: in a voting rights case last June, he tartly observed, "It's a sordid business, this divvying us up by race." Nevertheless, Roberts declared last spring that he would encourage his colleagues to decide cases on the narrowest possible grounds, in order to promote greater consensus on the court. If Roberts is serious about avoiding sweeping holdings, he might persuade his colleagues to converge around Kozinski's narrow position, which leaves open the possibility that racial balancing might be inappropriate in other contexts.

Of course, liberal and conservative activists who believe the court should resolve the most contested issues of American life would be disappointed by such a modest result. But the most politically effective Supreme Court decisions aim to calm partisan disagreements rather than inflame them. If Roberts succeeds in preventing the court from fracturing this term into antagonistic blocs, he will have achieved something truly impressive. And if he fails, the country as a whole may become even more polarized.

A Fight To Define Equality (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

DETROIT -- A feisty 29-year-old white woman and a pugnacious 67-year-old black man are performing two services this autumn for Michigan and the nation. Their Michigan Civil Rights Initiative (MCRI) is promoting colorblind government. And they are provoking remnants of the civil rights movement, which now is just a defender of a racial spoils system, to demonstrate its decadence, even thuggishness.

DOJ_NMG_0068278

In November Michiganders will vote on this ballot initiative: "A proposal to amend the state constitution to ban affirmative action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes." Almost identical measures were passed by referendums in California in 1996 and Washington state in 1998, in similar conditions to those here: They were opposed by both parties, all so-called civil rights organizations, most newspapers and many business leaders. What is different in Michigan is the involvement of a particularly nasty organization and an egregiously political judge.

At age 19, Jennifer Gratz, denied admission to the University of Michigan, fought the university all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. It endorsed her argument that it was an unconstitutional denial of equal protection of the law for the university to add 20 points to the scores of black, Hispanic and Native American applicants. (The maximum score was 150; a perfect 1600 SAT earned just 12 points.)

Ward Connerly is a California businessman and former member of the University of California Board of Regents. He propelled to victory the measures mandating colorblind government in California and Washington state.

With Gratz as its executive director and Connerly lending hard-earned expertise, MCRI collected 508,000 signatures, more than ever have been gathered for a Michigan initiative. In response, some opponents of MCRI have adopted four tactics, none of which involves arguing the merits of racial preferences and all of which attempt -- in the name of "civil rights," of course -- to prevent Michiganders from being allowed to vote on MCRI. The tactics have included:

Â· Pressuring signers of MCRI petitions to say they did not understand what they were signing. Some talk radio stations have broadcast the names of signers, and opponents of MCRI have gone to signers saying, "Did you know you signed a petition against equal opportunity?" Two who recanted their signatures, saying they had signed without reading the measure, are federal judges.

Â· Violently intimidating the state Board of Canvassers, which certifies that initiatives have qualified for the ballot. The Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action by Any Means Necessary (BAMN) disrupted the board's deliberations, shouting and overturning a table. Video of this can be seen at http://www.michigancivilrights.org .

Â· Asking a court to rule that MCRI committed "fraud" because many who signed the petition supposedly were confused -- the signers were presumably not competent to read and understand the initiative, the full text of which was printed at the top of each petition. A federal judge -- Arthur Tarnow, a Bill Clinton appointee -- sadly said he could not rule that way because, although he thinks MCRI is a fraud, whites as well as blacks were confused about it, and even if all signatures gathered in majority-black cities were invalidated, there still were enough signatures to qualify it for the ballot. So Tarnow contented himself with an extrajudicial smear of Gratz, charging that her "deception" had confused all Michigan voters, regardless of race.

Â· Michigan ballots are printed by counties, so BAMN says it is asking local officials to assert an extralegal "moral authority" to leave MCRI off the ballot.

Because the plain language of MCRI is appealing, some opponents argue that MCRI would have terrible "unintended consequences." It might, they say, eliminate single-sex public schools (Michigan has none; eight of 3,748 schools have a few voluntary single-sex classes) and breast-cancer screening or might stop a Department of Natural Resources program aimed at helping Michigan women become hunters (the initiative concerns only hiring, contracting and public schools).

Given the caliber of opposition arguments, it is no wonder a Detroit News poll published Sept. 15 shows MCRI with an 11-point lead. Gratz says that if her group is outspent "only" five to one -- Connerly was outspent that heavily while winning in Washington state -- MCRI will become Michigan law.

Anti-MCRI demonstrators chant, "They say Jim Crow, we say hell, no." So, the rancid residue of what once was the civil rights movement equates Jim Crow -- the system of enforced legal inferiority for blacks -- with opposition to treating blacks as wards of government, in need of infantilizing preferences, forever. To such Orwellian thinking, Gratz and Connerly -- and soon, perhaps, Michigan -- say: Hell, no.

So Small A Town, So Many Patent Suits (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

MARSHALL, TEX.

ON a crisp Monday morning earlier this month, about 20 lawyers from some of the country's top law firms shuffled their way into a brightly lit, wood-paneled federal courtroom in this small city in eastern Texas.

Wearing white shirts and dark suits, the lawyers congregated in small groups, leaning into one another with their arms crossed and speaking in hushed tones.

At precisely 8:30 a.m., a series of knocks on the right side of the courtroom signaled the entrance of Judge T. John Ward, a blur of black robe and white hair, who quickly took his seat and, with little preamble, began the proceedings.

Over the next few minutes, a 10-person jury listened raptly as lawyers for both sides laid out the case. Hyperion Solutions, a software company based in Santa Clara, Calif., accused the OutlookSoft Corporation of Stamford, Conn., of infringing two of its patents, causing $50 million in damages. A lawyer for OutlookSoft said the company did not steal any patented technology, adding that Hyperion's patents were not even valid.

What was remarkable about the trial was not the issue being tried or the arguments proffered by each side, but that these big companies — like dozens more from the East and West Coasts — wound up in the Federal District Court here in Marshall, the self-proclaimed Pottery Capital of the World and home to the annual Fire Ant Festival (sponsored by Terminix, the pest-control company).

More patent lawsuits will be filed here this year than in federal district courts in San Francisco, Chicago, New York and Washington. Only the Central District of California, in Los Angeles, will handle more patent infringement cases.

On the surface, there is little to recommend Marshall as a locus for global corporations looking to duke it out over who owns the rights to important technology patents. Some 150 miles east of Dallas, and just minutes from the Louisiana border, Marshall and its 25,000 residents are fairly typical of most small cities in Texas. Marshall is a place where friendships last a lifetime and rivalries even longer, where residents still talk about the Civil War, debate on street corners about decades-old high school football games, and conduct midday business meetings over plates of meatloaf, mashed potatoes and banana pudding.

What sets Marshall apart from its neighbors is a red-hot patent docket. Four years ago, 32 patent lawsuits were filed in the Federal Eastern District of Texas, which includes Tyler, Texarkana and Marshall. This year, an estimated 234 cases will be filed in the district, a majority of them in Marshall.

What's behind the rush to file patent lawsuits here? A combination of quick trials and plaintiff-friendly juries, many lawyers say. Patent cases are heard faster in Marshall than in many other courts. And while only a small number of cases make it to trial — roughly 5 percent — patent holders win 78 percent of the time, compared with an average of 59 percent nationwide, according to LegalMetric, a company that tracks patent litigation.

Those odds are daunting enough to encourage many corporate defendants to settle before setting foot in Marshall. Add to that the fact that jurors here have a history of handing out Texas-sized verdicts to winners. In April, for instance, a Marshall jury returned a $73 million verdict against Communications">EchoStar Communications for infringing the patents of TiVo.

MARSHALL was once one of the most prominent and wealthy cities in Texas, but much of the city's industry and many of its downtown shops disappeared in recent decades. Now, thanks to an influx of out-of-town lawyers and the increased investment in real estate by a handful of local leaders, Marshall is in the early stages of a revival.

The sounds of hammers and electric saws echo across the brick-paved streets that line its picturesque downtown square as buildings that stood empty for years are being transformed into office space for rent.

Restaurants that depended on tourists drawn to town by the Fire Ant Festival, the Stagecoach Days Festival and the winter Wonderland of Lights display now do a brisk business catering lunches and dinners for visiting lawyers. Some hotel chains along Interstate 20, south of downtown, are running at 95 percent occupancy rates during the week.

"During the TiVo-EchoStar trial, 90 percent of my revenue for one month came from one of the law firms in the case," said Phillip W. Gurganus, manager of the local 68-room Hampton Inn, where rates run $77 a night.

His mother, a former Texas tort reform lobbyist, helps to serve breakfast at the hotel. "I loved getting that check and taking it to the bank," he added.

How far the dollars from visiting lawyers trickle through Marshall's economy remains unclear and is the subject of discussion among local leaders.

For much of its history, Marshall has been a community divided by wealth and race. People whose grandparents or great-grandparents made fortunes from oil, natural gas or railroads live in gated mansions and rarely mix with those who frequent the local Wal-Mart or many downtown finance shops that make $300 loans. The median family income in Marshall is $30,000.

"The majority of Marshallites don't even know the patent docket exists," said Johnny B. Taylor, a native of Marshall who returned and started an office rental business after spending 31 years as a police officer in Arlington, Tex. "There's one way the docket affects them: they can't find parking."

Cranking up the air-conditioner of her father-in-law's 1990 red Cadillac DeVille with a matching red leather interior, Geraldine Mauthe, the city's bubbly and silver-haired convention-and-visitors director, begins the tour of town.

Turning away from the pale yellow century-old Harrison County Courthouse, which is being renovated and updated to handle Marshall's rapidly expanding patent docket, Ms. Mauthe often stops the Cadillac in the middle of the street — eliciting sharp honks from cars behind her — to point out local sights.

This much can be said about Marshall: It is not lacking in churches (50 Baptist, 35 of other Protestant denominations and 1 Roman Catholic), historic homes (many built in the 1850's) and, oddly, funeral homes. "We have seven. Four for blacks and three for whites," Ms. Mauthe said, matter-of-factly.

When she drove past a hair salon that offered haircuts, tanning and the services of a notary public, Ms. Mauthe rubbed her fingers together and said: "You got to make money somehow."

Oh yes, Ms. Mauthe added, Marshall and its robust legal community go back a long way. In the late 1800's, she said, Marshall was a bustling city, a transportation gateway to the North, linking local cotton farmers and the Texas and Pacific Railway.

As the railroad was built, personal-injury lawyers came to town to represent injured workers. In more recent decades, Scott Baldwin, Franklin Jones and other Marshall-based plaintiffs' lawyers generated tens of millions of dollars in fees — and grabbed the national spotlight — by pursuing class-action lawsuits against companies that used asbestos and silica, and against the pharmaceutical and tobacco industries.

By the late 1990's, though, it looked as if the good times were ending for Marshall's lawyers. Broad tort reform in the state had limited punitive damages and later capped damages on medical malpractice lawsuits, effectively limiting the fees that lawyers could make.

In Marshall, an oft-told joke is that the passage of tort reform was when many local lawyers made the trip from P.I. to I.P. — that is, they moved out of personal injury and into intellectual property.

That was the road traveled by Samuel F. Baxter, a former state district court judge who had become a personal-injury lawyer, after he received a call from a lawyer in Dallas in 1996, asking him to help out in a patent lawsuit in Marshall. "I told him, 'No, I don't know anything about patents,' " Mr. Baxter recalled as he reclined far back in his chair in his Marshall office, which included an autographed Cy Young baseball and aging maps of the United States depicting an outsized Republic of Texas.

Mr. Baxter was eventually persuaded to take the case and was the lead trial lawyer defending Samsung in a patent lawsuit filed by Texas Instruments, which eventually settled. Since then, Mr. Baxter, who is a principal at McKool Smith, a Dallas-based law firm with a full-time office in Marshall, has been involved in a number of patent cases; in one, he helped represent TiVo in its patent fight with EchoStar.

Charmingly loquacious about his two adopted sons and local Civil War history, Mr. Baxter turns economical with his words when asked why the federal court in Marshall handles more patent lawsuits than federal courts in much larger cities.

"One, speed kills," he said. "If you're the plaintiff, you can go fast and get a resolution faster here than you can a lot of other places.

"Second, there's a dearth of good lawsuits these days for lawyers to handle," he added. "You know lawyers: they go where the money is."

DOJ_NMG_0068281

THE testing of Marshall as a patent battleground began nearly two decades ago, when Texas Instruments, which has its headquarters in Dallas, embarked on an aggressive strategy to make rivals license its patents. If a company would not capitulate or at least negotiate, a Texas Instruments team of lawyers would drag it to court — increasingly, down the road to the uncluttered courtrooms of Marshall.

In September 1999, Mr. Ward, a malpractice and product-liability lawyer with a practice nearby, in Longview, was sworn in to the East Texas federal bench.

A no-nonsense judge who charms people with his folksy demeanor but who also has a reputation for a fiery temper in the courtroom, Judge Ward began hearing patent cases. As a private lawyer, he had argued a few such cases; as a judge, however, he quickly grew frustrated at the slow pace, paperwork, and delays and motions that were part of a patent docket.

That's when he adopted what he calls "the Rules." As any lawyer who has shown up in Judge Ward's courtroom will testify, the Rules put patent lawsuits on a strict timetable, laying out when key documents must be handed over and setting firm trial dates.

No 100-page motions or lawyer soliloquies are tolerated in Judge Ward's courtroom. He puts page limits on documents and uses a chess clock to time opening and closing arguments, brusquely interrupting lawyers when it is time for them to wind it up.

The changes turned Marshall's federal court into a "rocket docket" — a place where the time between filing and trying a lawsuit became significantly shorter than in other districts.

"I really shot myself in the foot when I adopted the Rules," Judge Ward said with a laugh, sitting in a leather chair in his quiet, wood-paneled chambers during a lunch recess in the Hyperion-OutlookSoft trial. The reason, he added, was that the district was soon deluged by patent suits filed by companies seeking a quick resolution to their conflicts. While judges in nearby cities also began to hear patent cases, most of them remain before Judge Ward.

The expedited process pleases clients, though it is sometimes hard on the lawyers who break the Rules.

"When he's mad, first his face gets red," said Michael C. Smith, a lawyer with the Roth Law Firm in Marshall. "Then his neck gets red and he starts tucking his chin down into his chest. If he tears off his glasses, I don't care what side you're on, you had better drop to the floor and get under that table fast."

Judge Ward said that he did not often lose his temper. "If I tell a lawyer to stop leading the witness and he continues, well, we're going to have a problem," he said.

SPEED is not the only feature bringing patent holders to Marshall. So, too, is the fact that they usually win. Three-fourths of the cases that come to trial in Marshall are decided in favor of the plaintiffs, compared with less than half in New York.

The success rate for patent holders in Marshall is a great incentive for defendants to settle matters quickly and privately. Since 1991, the Federal District Court in Marshall has held less than half the number of full patent trials as courts in Los Angeles, New York, Chicago and San Francisco.

"I would say that this is, historically anyway, a plaintiffs-oriented district," Judge Ward said, noting that he lost a large patent suit there himself when he was practicing. He was part of the team representing Hyundai Electronics in 1999 when it lost a $25.2 million verdict in a lawsuit filed by Texas Instruments.

Others point to a different reason why plaintiffs may win more often than defendants: plaintiffs, they say, typically hire local Marshall lawyers. Hiring local in Marshall means that you will get a lawyer who not only knows the jurors, but who also probably knows their friends and even personal details like how often they go to church, local lawyers say.

"We had a Fourth of July party and we circulated the jury lists to people there on the boat dock," said Joy Berry, a local lawyer who advises out-of-town law firms in jury selections. "By the time the party was over, we knew quite a bit about nearly everyone" on a list of potential jurors for coming trials, she said.

Mr. Smith of the Roth Law Firm said it could be difficult for outside lawyers to blend in and noted that some even tried to curry favor with jurors by taking on a drawl or wearing cowboy boots. "I call them T.B.L.'s, or 'tall building lawyers,' " he said. "They don't take their coats off no matter how hot it is down here."

Indeed, local lawyers love to swap stories about visiting colleagues and their clients from bigger cities or from abroad.

One of Mr. Baxter's favorites is about an out-of-town lawyer, a vegan, who wanted a late-night meal. "She walked over to Wendy's and tried to order a salad through the drive-in window," he recalled. "She was told she needed to be in a car to order through the drive-in window so she walked back over to the hotel, woke up one of the firm's partners and had him take her through the drive-in window." He laughed uproariously at the memory.

M. Craig Tyler, a lawyer in the Austin, Tex., office of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, the big Silicon Valley law firm, is fond of recounting how visitors react to Texas hospitality. "We've had many meals with clients from the Pacific Rim who take out their cellphones and send pictures back home when they see the portions of the meals in Marshall," he said. "They thought it was family style, that one plate would feed many people."

And then there are the tight-knit relationships that visiting lawyers encounter when they work in Marshall. In one patent case that eventually was settled, the plaintiffs hired an accountant whose clients included Judge Ward.

Patent litigation is a growing business across the country; Marshall is just the most visible example. Among the weightier issues behind the mushrooming of its patent docket is whether the elements that have made it expand — hungry plaintiffs' lawyers, speedy judges and plaintiff-friendly juries — are encouraging an excess of expensive litigation that is actually stifling innovation.

Some say yes. "A lot of the cases being filed in Marshall are by patent holding companies, or patent trolls, as they're called, whose primary and only assets are patents," Mr. Tyler said.

Companies spent 32 percent more on outside counsel for intellectual property litigation in 2003 than in the previous year, Chuck Fish, the chief patent counsel for Time Warner, told the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Courts, the Internet and Intellectual Property earlier this year. Spending for all other litigation rose a mere 1 percent during that time, Mr. Fish said.

Defending Marshall's role, many residents note that not only is it cheaper to hold a trial in Marshall, but that it is neutral territory for virtually all corporations that find themselves in court here.

"It's not as if you have a situation here where Microsoft is hated or Cisco is spit upon," Mr. Baxter said. "Whether it happens in Marshall, Tex., or Des Moines, Iowa, these lawsuits are going to happen. They might as well happen here."

And many in Marshall are looking for ways to profit from the patent gusher.

THE paint is peeling and the wallpaper in the bathroom is nothing short of hideous, but all Johnny Taylor sees as he walks through the former doctor's office he just bought in town is space for as many as 16 lawyers.

"Furnished office space is renting for $1 to $1.50 a square foot per week. So, a 2,000-square-foot office can get $2,000 per week," said Mr. Taylor, who has already wired the building for high-speed Internet access and created marshallofficespace.com to highlight offices for rent and offer advertising to local businesses.

One of the first challenges for visiting lawyers arriving in Marshall is cramped quarters. They often roll into town with semitrailer trucks that have traveled from San Francisco or New York containing everything that could be needed to try a case, including volumes of documents, copying machines, desks, video and audio equipment and even cappuccino machines.

Some people in Marshall are trying to save them the trouble by providing fully equipped office space on short-term leases.

"We're going to have a 6,000-square-foot space for a war room that we can rent out for $7,500 to $10,000 a week," said Leslie D. Ware, a patent lawyer in Dallas, who bought a former furniture building next door to the federal courthouse. "A firm could basically walk in, plug in their laptops, work and unplug and go home," he said.

Others are trying to lure patent dollars through different tacks. Fairfield Inn, which bought a subscription to Pacer, the electronic docket, routinely calls law firms to offer rooms for their lawyers with cases scheduled for trial.

"I'm thinking of coming up with a T-shirt for the lawyers," said Jennie A. Kelehan, a former financial adviser who moved here from Houston three years ago and is now the co-owner of a wine and specialty store called Under the Texas Sun. She estimated that lawyers in town for the patent docket were responsible for about a sixth of her sales.

"The patent lawyers were not in our plans at all," she said, "but they are definitely a huge asset for us and we will start using that as we start planning for the future."

Others, though, seem more skeptical about the long-term effect of the patent docket on Marshall's economy. They said they would like to bring in new industries and increase tourism.

DOJ_NMG_0068283

"For the most part, the rocket docket and the lawyers are 'today dollars,' " said Alan Grantham, a member of the Marshall Economic Development Corporation and a senior vice president at Bancorp South. "They spend the night at a hotel, rent cars and eat at restaurants." But, he added that the patent docket was not the only factor driving the local economy.

Others, like Jerry Cargill, who runs a wholesale beverage distributing company in Dallas and has a family farm outside Marshall, said they hoped that increased tourism would play a bigger role in Marshall's comeback.

In the last three years, Mr. Cargill has bought nine buildings downtown, as well as a $500,000 stake in the historic Hotel Marshall. The City of Marshall put in $1 million and others raised $527,000 to restore the building to its original Italian Renaissance design.

"I didn't even hear about the rocket docket until a year ago," Mr. Cargill said. "By then, we were well into the various projects."

This fall, a tourism marketing firm is coming to town to create a branding plan and to offer ideas to alter Marshall's infrastructure for tourism. "It's a unique community," Mr. Cargill said. "It just needs some marketing."

Marshall's patent docket may not be able to sustain its current pace of growth. Its reputation for speed is starting to attract so many cases that a certain sluggishness may be setting in. Four years ago, lawsuits took less than two years to go to trial. Now the average time between when a suit is filed and when it goes to court is more than 27 months.

There is legislative movement afoot as well. This spring, two senators, Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, introduced a patent reform bill. Among its many provisions is one to limit damages in patent lawsuits and another to require a more substantial connection between a business and the court where it brings a patent lawsuit.

WE think the bill will restore more balance in the patent system and remove incentives for plaintiffs to run to one jurisdiction and try to hit the jackpot," said Mark W. Isakowitz, a lobbyist with the Coalition for Patent Fairness, which advocates patent reform on behalf of corporations. Any reform would likely happen next year at the earliest, lawyers say.

But the biggest change in Marshall's status could come if plaintiffs start losing more cases.

A jury in Judge Ward's courtroom in July stunned observers when it returned a verdict that said WG Security Products had not infringed any of the patents of Sensormatic.

The jury in the Hyperion-OutlookSoft case went even further a little over a week ago. After a five-day trial, it deliberated for less than three hours before deciding that OutlookSoft had not infringed the Hyperion patents and that those patents were invalid.

After the verdict was read, OutlookSoft's legal team returned to the local law office it had been working out of and opened some Champagne, said the company's chief executive, W. Phillip Wilmington, who attended every day of the trial in Marshall.

"As we were going through our victory discussion, a big truck pulls up and there goes the copier and fax machines out the door," Mr. Wilmington said. "It disappeared just as quickly as it was set up. I'm sure the week following, there was someone coming in to do it all over again."

As Children Suffer, Parents Agonize Over Spinach (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 22 — The hardest moment came when Elaine and Dennis Krause's 9-year-son, who had stoically undergone kidney dialysis, blood transfusions and drug treatments that made him hallucinate that spiders were all around him, quietly asked his parents whether he was going to die.

"What do you say when your child asks you, am I going to die?" asked Elaine Krause, who has spent nearly all of this month beside her son's bed at a hospital here, watching his skinny, lanky body do battle with E. coli. "I told him, 'These people are trying to help you, and you are getting good care.' But the truth is, I couldn't answer him directly. We didn't know."

By this weekend, a national outbreak of E. coli linked to fresh spinach grown in California had sickened 170 people in 25 states and killed at least one here in Wisconsin, where more people have grown ill than in any other state. The authorities in

Idaho and Maryland were investigating the deaths of two others, including a toddler whose parents said they gave him a fruit smoothie with spinach days earlier, trying to determine whether their deaths, too, were linked to the outbreak.

But beyond the raw statistics were individual stories of a sudden, mysterious, life-threatening illness, one that struck most often in the homes of those who viewed themselves as more health conscious than many other Americans.

In many cases, it crept up with frightening force after what had seemed a harmless, even healthful meal — a spinach salad with walnuts, a sandwich layered with spinach or, as for the Krause family, a baked, boneless, skinless piece of chicken on a small bed of spinach. Then what had seemed a simple bout of diarrhea in the morning often led to a harrowing, bloody race to the emergency room by midnight.

And around the country, some families still wait by bedsides, wondering which foods they could ever again feel safe giving their children, what the government or the spinach industry could have done to protect them, and, most of all, whether their loved ones will ever fully recover.

"Here you think you're feeding your child a great, healthy meal," Dennis Krause said sadly. "But here I was, poisoning him."

Not all E. coli is harmful to humans, but certain strains produce toxins that kill cells in the gut and in the blood vessels, leading to abdominal cramps and watery to bloody diarrhea, said Dr. John Flaherty, associate chief of the division of infectious disease at the Feinberg School of Medicine at Northwestern University.

One area where the toxins can wreak particular havoc is in the kidneys; when it happens, Dr. Flaherty said, the inflamed cells lining the blood vessels get "roughed up," causing red blood cells to break open as they pass by and jam blood flow to the kidneys.

"In the course of one week, he went from this healthy, lively little boy to a boy in a hospital bed fighting for his life," said Anne Grintjes, of Brookfield, Wis., whose 7-year-old son developed a dangerous form of kidney failure linked to E. coli, called hemolytic uremic syndrome. "He turned yellow and gray, literally. It was shocking and terrifying and unbelievable to watch."

Of the 171 cases that have been confirmed as part of the spinach outbreak, more than half required hospitalization, and about 16 percent developed the dangerous hemolytic uremic syndrome.

Doctors say they cannot be certain what long-term effects the syndrome may have; it varies from person to person. Many patients recover entirely, they say, while others may suffer from chronic kidney problems and other health risks.

Although the youngest children and the oldest adults are considered most vulnerable to getting sick from the bacteria and to struggling to recover from its effects, more than 70 percent of those who grew ill in this outbreak were somewhere in between: older than 4 and younger than 65.

At 27, Gwyn Wellborn of Salem, Ore., described a sudden onslaught of slicing, stabbing abdominal pain and bloody diarrhea in late August, days after eating baby spinach at work, thinking she was being especially virtuous. At first, doctors sent her home, Ms. Wellborn said, with a painkiller and a diagnosis of food poisoning. Hours later, though, the pain became so excruciating and the bleeding so constant, she said, that her husband rushed her back to a hospital.

From there, she quickly deteriorated. Her kidneys began failing. "At one point, the doctors told my family there was nothing they could do, that that was it," she recalled. But after three transfusions and several weeks in a hospital, Ms. Wellborn went home.

Hers is one of at least four lawsuits filed in courts around the country by William D. Marler, a Seattle lawyer, in connection with the outbreak. Ms. Wellborn said she would not consider eating spinach anytime soon. "Not in a million years," she said.

Marion Graff, 77, a former bank clerk and widow from Manitowoc, Wis., is the nation's only confirmed fatality in the outbreak, but deaths in Maryland and Idaho are also considered "suspect" cases, federal authorities said on Friday.

Kyle Allgood, 2, of Chubbuck, Idaho, died at a Utah hospital from cardiac arrest after contracting hemolytic uremic syndrome, his family said, a case Idaho authorities said was "probably connected" to the tainted spinach, although laboratory tests have been inconclusive. Kyle's mother, Robyn Allgood, said she had mixed vegetables into blended fruit and juice smoothies, as a way to get Kyle and her two daughters to eat vegetables, and had given him such a drink on Sept. 12.

Three days later, she said, Kyle had flu-like symptoms, including severe diarrhea.

On Wednesday, despite specialized treatment at a hospital in Salt Lake City, Kyle died, hours after his father, Jeff, said he had urged the boy "to fight for me."

DOJ_NMG_0068285

Relatives tearfully recalled Kyle as generous and good-natured though mischievous — a boy known as the "stuntman" for his antics, which inspired fear and awe in adults.

He liked to twirl his hair into knots, dance wildly to the music of Jack Johnson and give lingering kisses to his aunts, the family said. He was also impish; at Primary Children's Medical Center in Salt Lake City, Kyle was pinching his nurses and ripping at his IV's until near his final moments, they said.

In Maryland, an elderly woman died of E. coli on Sept. 13 after eating fresh spinach, state health officials confirmed, but because of a lack of DNA specimens from the victim, officials have yet to determine whether it was the same strain of E. coli that infected others who ate spinach. Family members identified the woman as June E. Dunning, 86, of Hagerstown.

Warren Swartz, Ms. Dunning's son-in-law, said she had eaten steamed spinach from a package on Aug. 30 and Sept. 1 and baby spinach from a bag on Aug. 30. She had signs of E. coli, including rectal bleeding and bloody diarrhea, on Sept. 1 and went to the hospital the next day.

For the Krause family, of McFarland, Wis., the illness began a few days after a family dinner on Aug. 24. First, their 15-year-old daughter grew ill. Then their 9-year-old, who was healthy enough that he had a perfect attendance record last year in third grade, grew even more ill, and has suffered debilitating effects, including acute renal failure, fluid buildup near the heart, raised blood pressure, soaring blood sugar.

In a hospital cafeteria here, miles from their home, the Krauses at first could only bring themselves to eat peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. Everything else — lunch meats, salads, everything — scared them.

"For me, there's anger and paranoia and fear for others — for the safety of food we get that's supposed to be monitored," Ms. Krause, 47, said. "I don't know what to trust. Should we grow it all ourselves?"

On Friday, their strawberry-blond boy lay weakly in his hospital bed, surrounded by balloons and cards from the school where he says he fears falling behind his class. He had physical therapy, then occupational therapy to begin rebuilding his body. He told his father he only wanted to be well, to somehow rewind to the day before the spinach.

A few days ago, his body seemed to turn a corner and doctors removed him from the dialysis machine, a crucial step toward recovery. His parents have not asked when he might be well enough to go home; they said it was too early to look ahead.

"I keep thinking we will at some point go home and it'll all be like it was," said Mr. Krause, 52. "But we don't know yet what the long-term effects are. He will be monitored probably for the rest of his life. It'll never be the same."

E. Coli Alert's Timing Questioned (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Md. Family Suggests State Acted Only After Death Was Publicized

HAGERSTOWN, Md., Sept. 23 -- The family of an elderly Hagerstown woman who died nearly two weeks ago after eating bagged spinach questioned Saturday whether government health officials had done enough to alert Maryland residents to the threat of E. coli contamination that has been linked to at least three people in the state.

"The story broke in the local newspaper Friday morning. Suddenly the [state] health department had a press conference on Friday afternoon," said Warren Swartz, son-in-law of June E. Dunning, 86, who died of E. coli illness Sept. 13 at Washington County Hospital in Hagerstown.

Dunning might be the second person killed in a nationwide E. coli outbreak, but state officials have been unable to conclusively link her case to the national outbreak because of problems completing a genetic test on the bacterium that infected her.

Swartz and his wife, Corinne, spoke Saturday to more than a dozen journalists crammed into their living room. The Swartzes appeared uncomfortable with the attention as they spoke of Dunning, a native of Britain and bingo enthusiast who could work up to 21 cards at once.

Although Warren Swartz raised questions about when information had been disseminated, he stopped short of criticizing government officials directly.

DOJ_NMG_0068286

Also at issue are other cases in Maryland, including those of three children whose sickness was attributed to tainted spinach. The children are recovering, officials have said.

Dunning, who lived with the Swartzes and was an avid spinach eater, ate bagged spinach Aug. 28 and 30 and Sept. 1 -- steamed or as part of a salad -- becoming intensely sick shortly thereafter and being hospitalized. Her death occurred about the time news of the outbreak was spreading across the country. Swartz said he was able to retrieve some of the spinach from the family's refrigerator and give it to health investigators.

On Thursday, Swartz said, he contacted the Hagerstown Herald-Mail because he wanted residents to know about the possible threat. The newspaper's article was published Friday.

John Hammond, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, said the agency was not withholding any information. He said Friday's news conference addressed a wider number of E. coli cases that officials are investigating.

Hammond would not say when state investigators found links to the other cases. He said he was told about them Friday morning.

He also said state officials called the news conference Friday primarily to announce the link to spinach of three E. coli cases in Maryland. At the same time, he said, the news conference allowed officials to address a deluge of phone calls they were receiving from reporters after the news report in Hagerstown.

Hammond declined to answer specific questions about Dunning. "It is inappropriate for us to comment on a specific case," he said. "We can't, and we won't."

In a Friday news release, Michelle A. Gourdine, the health department's deputy secretary for public health services, said: "The discovery of these cases shows our surveillance protocols are working exactly as they should. The minute we learned about the issue, we began researching any possible links to cases in Maryland."

The outbreak of E. coli O157:H7, which has sickened at least 166 people in 25 states, has been traced to three counties in and around the Salinas Valley in California. On Saturday, Pacific Coast Fruit Co. of Portland, Ore., announced a recall of its salad products.

Maryland officials have talked about 10 cases. In three, children with E. coli illnesses had eaten spinach. Three other cases were not linked to the outbreak. At least four other cases in Maryland, including Dunning's, are under investigation.

In Hagerstown, the Washington County Health Department referred questions Friday to state officials. Washington County officials were unavailable to comment Saturday.

Dunning's daughter and son-in-law recalled her as a spunky 86-year-old who had not been in the hospital since she gave birth.

Dunning lived with the couple in her own section of their house and enjoyed spending time in a sunroom tending to plants.

In the hospital, Dunning fell into a coma. She woke briefly, smiled and blew a kiss to her daughter.

On Sept. 13, while at their house, Dunning's daughter and son-in-law noticed an azalea blooming, the only one on a bush outside their door.

In the hospital, Warren Swartz tried to tell his mother-in-law about the flower. "I saw the little note you sent us," he told her.

5 More E. Coli Cases Blamed On Spinach (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

The outbreak of E. coli linked to fresh spinach was blamed for another five cases of illness Saturday, raising the number of people sickened to 171, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported.

The number of states affected held steady at 25. So far, 92 people have been hospitalized, including a Wisconsin woman who died. Two other deaths have been reported in suspected cases — a child in Idaho and an elderly woman in Maryland — but those cases are still being investigated.

DOJ_NMG_0068287

For more than a week, the Food and Drug Administration has recommended people not eat fresh, raw spinach. State and federal investigators since have traced the contaminated spinach back to three counties in California's Salinas Valley, and already farm inspections there are turning up possible problems.

On Friday, officials said spinach grown anywhere outside that area is safe to eat — but industry needs to figure out how to let consumers know the origin of what they're buying before the green can return to sale, said Dr. David Acheson of the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Last week, Natural Selection Foods LLC of San Juan Bautista, Calif., recalled all its spinach and spinach-containing products. Many people reported eating the company's spinach, sold under multiple brands, before falling sick. And a package of Dole baby spinach, one of those brands, taken from a victim's refrigerator tested positive for E. coli.

Other companies that have recalled products because they may contain contaminated spinach include Pacific Coast Fruit Co. of Portland, Ore., S.T. Produce of Seattle, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., and RLB Food Distributors of West Caldwell, N.J.

Pacific Coast said its products were distributed in Alaska, Oregon, Washington and Idaho. S.T. Produce said its salads were distributed to stores and delis in Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana.

The states that have reported infections are Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Something's Rotten In Food Oversight (WP)

By Al Meyerhoff And William B. Schultz

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Federal agents are scurrying across the Salinas Valley -- the nation's "salad bowl" -- in search of the source of the E. coli contaminating the spinach supply. They won't find it without a mirror, because the real culprit in this case is the U.S. government. A half-dozen federal agencies administer a patchwork quilt of outdated standards, inadequate inspections and porous statutes that allow pollution in the fields, filth in the packing houses and contaminated food on the supermarket shelves. Millions of Americans are sickened by food each year; some 9,000 die.

Today American food is more manufactured than grown. Following a scorched-earth approach, workers wearing "spacesuits" inject nerve agents into the soil before planting, leaving nothing alive. Hogs grow enclosed in facilities several stories high. Tomatoes are picked green, gassed and then canned. Writing almost 70 years ago, journalist Carey McWilliams was prescient in his classic work: We now truly do have "factories in the fields." And factories, whether manufacturing steel or frozen peas, generate waste -- in agriculture some 1.4 billion tons per year, 10,000 pounds for each American.

Some of these wastes have a nasty habit of returning in our food. The E. coli in spinach most likely came from the Salinas River or its tributaries, a system of virtual sewers from agricultural runoff and flooding. Since 1995 there have been 20 other E. coli poisonings of spinach and lettuce, eight of them in the Salinas Valley, where nearly every waterway violates national clean-water requirements.

Pathogens, animal waste, agrichemicals and fertilizers routinely enter our food supply, either from environmental pollution, as with E. coli, or intentionally, as in the case of pesticides. Infected animals confined in feed lots are dosed with antibiotics; the lots themselves produce "lagoons" of runoff, contaminating the land, water and the food itself.

Three agencies within the Agriculture Department and two within the Department of Health and Human Services, plus the Environmental Protection Agency, have overlapping jurisdiction over the food supply. None has overarching authority or responsibility for the quality of food. The Government Accountability Office said recently that "it is at times difficult to determine which agency is even responsible for a particular food product," and "arbitrary jurisdictional lines can make the current system difficult to assess and, more importantly, unresponsive to the needs of the public."

Contaminants are not even subject to a single standard. Instead, from the field to the table, different rules apply, reflecting differing regulatory philosophies. Most are many decades old and showing their age. "Tolerances" for pesticides, some from the 1950s, were originally set to address immediate, "acute" health effects. Only now, following a 1996 amendment to the law, are the standards being slowly reassessed to address cancer and other long-term, chronic health effects.

Rules for other food contaminants are even less exacting. There are the "unavoidable environmental contaminants" that get into food indirectly from the soil, surface or irrigation water. These include everything from insect fragments and fly eggs to mercury and lead. They are typically subject only to "action levels": informal, discretionary limits that lack the clout of regulations and are set without sufficient scientific data.

In the late 1990s, in adopting a modest $43 million Food Safety Initiative, the Clinton administration accurately described the problem and made a plea for help. "Our understanding of many pathogens and how they contaminate food is limited," a White House statement said. "For some . . . we do not know how much must be present in food for there to be a risk of illness; for others, we do not have the ability to detect their presence in foods . . . . Resource constraints increasingly limit the ability of state and federal agencies to inspect food processing facilities."

With the federal food safety system so inadequate, it's particularly troubling that earlier this year the House of Representatives passed legislation to override state laws establishing food quality requirements that are more stringent than the federal standards.

Unlike prescription drugs, food does not go through an approval process. The integrity of the system depends heavily on the agency's inspection force in the food production system. Yet the Food and Drug Administration, with responsibility for all processed food products except meat and poultry, has 1,962 inspectors for more than 100,000 facilities -- a decrease of more than 250 inspectors since 2003. Today food processing plants are inspected on average once every 10 years. Imported food is almost never inspected. The USDA has about 6,000 employees who inspect meat and poultry plants, but use of the inspectors is "not based on the food safety risk of particular products," the GAO says.

As a public policy matter, all food safety functions (setting standards, inspection, risk assessment, research) should be consolidated under a single, independent agency (either the Food and Drug Administration or a new federal agency). This approach is supported by scientists and consumer advocates and has been included in legislation introduced by Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.). In the past, however, similar recommendations have been consistently blocked by agency turf wars and agribusiness clout. But don't despair. September is National Food Safety Education Month.

Al Meyerhoff, an environmental attorney, is a past director of the Natural Resources Defense Council public health program. William B. Schultz was an FDA deputy commissioner from 1994 to 1998.

E. Coli Effects Can Last A Lifetime (LAT)

By Mary Engel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

For some who survive infections such as the one recently linked to spinach, lingering ailments include kidney damage and diabetes.

When she was 10 years old, Brianne Kiner became the public face of one of the country's worst outbreaks of food poisoning.

Television cameras zoomed in as she left Seattle's Children's Hospital in June 1993, six months after eating an undercooked Jack-in-the-Box hamburger contaminated by E. coli. It was the same virulent strain that recently has been linked to California-grown spinach.

Doctors called her survival a miracle. What most people outside her family didn't know then — and may not realize now — was that her recovery was just beginning.

"She had to learn to walk again. Think again. Learn her colors," said her mother, Suzanne Kiner. "She had such total body atrophy that she could not chew."

Brianne suffered from hemolytic uremic syndrome, or HUS, the most dreaded consequence of E. coli O157:H7 infection and the most common cause of kidney failure in children under 18. Of the 171 cases identified so far in the current spinach-related outbreak, 27 have been diagnosed with HUS. One person has died. Two other deaths are under investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0068289

Not everyone who ingests this strain of E. coli falls ill, and not everyone who becomes ill develops the bloody diarrhea described by doctors and patients as worse than kidney stones, more painful than childbirth. But about 10% of those who do — the proportion is slightly higher for children and the elderly — come down with HUS.

As the Kiners' experience shows, the consequences can be devastating, lingering far longer than most people's memories of the original outbreak.

The death rate from HUS is 3% to 5%, doctors say. Ten percent of patients survive but have long-term kidney damage and may eventually require dialysis or a transplant. The vast majority recover complete kidney function, but experts say even they should be tested regularly for abnormalities that may not be obvious but could cause high blood pressure or diabetes.

Brianne's case was so severe that just about everyone expected her to die. She was the last to leave the hospital among those stricken in the Jack-in-the Box outbreak that sickened hundreds and killed four.

During the months she was laid up, the toxin produced by the bacteria attacked her brain, kidneys and liver, putting her in a coma for 40 days. She suffered strokes and seizures. Her infected pancreas lost the ability to produce insulin, and she developed diabetes. Doctors removed part of her inflamed intestine.

Brianne doesn't remember being rushed to the hospital. She does recall awakening in the intensive care unit and spending months in bed. She remembers all too well the rounds of doctor appointments after her release and the years of physical, occupational and speech therapy that extended into high school. She was left with damaged lungs and learning disabilities.

"I had to relearn how to read," she said. "And this is embarrassing, but I had to be potty trained all over again."

The $15.6-million settlement the Kiners won in 1995 from Jack-in-the-Box provides for Brianne's support. She now lives on her own and takes community college classes part time — routine milestones for a 23-year-old, but they represent hard-won autonomy for someone stricken as severely as she was. Every three months, she visits her endocrinologist to check her diabetes, but she pronounces her health — and life — "Good."

"I have a house and I'm loving it," she said.

But letting go leaves Suzanne Kiner with time she hasn't had in years. Time to watch the spinach outbreak unfold and to think, "Oh, no. Not again."

E. coli is commonly found in cow manure and passed to people though contaminated food. Most strains are ubiquitous and relatively harmless.

But somewhere along the way, E. coli O157:H7 evolved the ability to produce lethal toxins that can cross the intestinal wall and enter the bloodstream.

The toxins flock to receptors in the kidneys, where they kill small blood vessels and clog waste filters. They can also harm the pancreas, liver and heart. Death is often a result of toxins infecting the brain and causing strokes or swelling.

"I lost one child to heart disease," said Dr. Richard Siegler, professor emeritus of pediatrics and kidney disease at the University of Utah School of Medicine and a widely published expert in the E. coli-caused syndrome. "The autopsy found clots in the small blood vessels of the heart. One little girl came into the ER and couldn't breathe. She had damage in her lungs from the toxin. I had a child who developed blindness. The toxin attacked small blood vessels in the retina of the eyes."

Sometimes, the damage reveals itself years later.

Each kidney has about a million filters. On average, most people lose about 20% of these filters by the time they're 80, just through wear and tear.

"Any child that's had this disease has lost some of those filters," said Dr. Sharon P. Andreoli, a pediatric nephrologist at Indiana University. "If they have lost 20% of their filters, they have the kidneys of an 80-year-old when they're 5 years old. So their kidneys have to work harder. And when they have to work harder, they wear out faster."

What saves the vast majority of children who fall ill from HUS is the resilience of the human body. Virtually nothing can be done to fight the infection once it is underway. Treatment consists of supporting the patient — from something as simple as hydration, all the way to dialysis — while the body fights off the toxins.

"Kidneys have an amazing capacity to keep you going with very little left," said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer for the FDA's food safety division and an expert on the kidney syndrome. "Many folks can manage all their lives with just one."

DOJ_NMG_0068290

Dr. Phillip Tarr, another expert on HUS and a professor of pediatric gastroenterology at Washington University in St. Louis, agreed.

"It is an absolute horrible experience to go through during the acute stage," he said. "But many people, if not most, get through it and do fine in the future."

Michael Beverly may be one of the lucky ones.

He was just 2 1/2 years old when he fell ill in 1996 after drinking unpasteurized juice made by Odwalla Inc. In that well-publicized outbreak, one child was killed and 60 were sickened.

Michael's kidneys stopped functioning, and he went on dialysis for eight days.

Today, Michael, like most 12-year-olds, thinks he's immortal. He doesn't fret.

His mother does.

Kelley Beverly remembers that Michael was in so much pain that he couldn't bear to have the lights on in his room at Seattle's Children's Hospital.

Now he visits a clinic every other year to have his kidneys and other organs tested. So far, the results have been normal. But his mother knows that complications often accompany the growth spurt of the teenage years.

"Maybe when he's through adolescence, I can stop worrying," she said.

Amber Brister of Minneapolis is also 12. She is not quite a year from the first anniversary of the illness brought on by the 2005 Dole lettuce outbreak, one of nine E. coli outbreaks traced to lettuce or spinach grown in the greater Salinas Valley since 1995.

Amber entered the hospital Sept. 28 and was discharged on Halloween. Her kidneys failed, and she spent 18 of those 34 days hooked up to a dialysis machine. Her pancreas became infected. She couldn't eat for three weeks.

"No one knows what it's like until it happens to you, until you're the one sitting in the hospital, watching your child fight for her life," said her mother, Lori Olson. "What people don't understand about this is they think that you just get sick, and you get better, and that's it."

The single mom lost her job as a bartender to stay with her daughter in the hospital. Olson agonized over leaving a second daughter, then 15, home alone every night for a month. She too had been sickened in the outbreak but not as severely.

Now, almost a year later, there are the questions, the ones Olson has to ask and the ones she has to fret about.

"Every day you have to ask questions that, as a preteen, she's not very comfortable with, and she'd like to forget the whole thing," Olson said about Amber. "Every little thing you have to monitor. When she has a cold, you just worry and worry and worry."

Immediately after her discharge, Amber went to a clinic twice a week to check renal and blood levels. She missed day after day of school.

"We all remember our first year in junior high," Olson said. "If you can just imagine coming back three months after everybody else and being that kid who was in hospital."

Amber herself doesn't want to talk about her illness. She doesn't want the attention, her mother said. She just wants to live a normal life.

Brianne Kiner understands — and sympathizes with anyone who's suffering through the latest outbreak linked to California spinach.

"It's going to get better," she said. "It's tough right now, but it's going to get better."

Union Hits Board For Upholding Firing (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

The leader of the nation's largest independent union of federal workers says a decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board upholding the firing of U.S. Park Police Chief Teresa Chambers is "dangerous to the public safety" because it cut protections afforded to federal whistleblowers.

DOJ_NMG_0068291

President Colleen M. Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union said the board's 2-1 decision last week "serves the public poorly and undermines the congressional intent evident in the Whistleblower Protection Act, particularly with respect to matters impacting public health and safety."

The union filed a brief in support of Mrs. Chambers, who had asked the board to overturn her firing. Mrs. Chambers, who had served for six years as chief, was fired in July 2004 by the Interior Department after The Washington Post published an article in which she criticized inadequate funding and staffing levels for Park Police.

Republican board members Neil A.G. McPhie and Mary M. Rose ruled that an employee's disclosure that an agency policy raises risks to the public health and safety is protected by the whistleblower act "only if the legitimacy of a particular policy choice is not debatable among reasonable people."

However, Democrat Barbara Sapin said, "policy decisions underlie virtually all matters at issue in disclosures related to public safety dangers, and even the most extensive and thorough consideration cannot preclude any possibility of substantial and specific dangers to the public health and safety."

In her lengthy dissent, Mrs. Sapin echoed many of the arguments the union made in its amicus brief, adding that the additional requirement imposed by the majority would "discourage employees from making the disclosures Congress sought to encourage them to make."

The board's ruling allows Mrs. Chambers to take her legal challenge to federal court.

Richard Condit, general counsel for Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility (PEER), said the organization will "immediately and vigorously pursue" an appeal of what he called an "extremely questionable ruling."

Ms. Kelley argued that employees should not be required to prove that a policy will endanger the public safety before protecting their rights to speak out on those dangers.

The union represents about 150,000 employees in 30 agencies and departments.

Mrs. Chambers first raised warnings in December 2003 about inadequate funding and staffing. She was suspended and later fired for telling reporters the agency had neither enough officers nor resources to provide adequate security in a post-September 11 world.

PEER noted in a recent report that the National Park Service told Congress in April 2000 that Park Police needed 806 officers. At the time, the agency had 638 officers. Today it has 621.

A Boat Racing On Biodiesel, But Running Low On Money (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 23 — In early July, Pete Bethune, an amateur sailor from New Zealand and a recent convert to environmentalism, stepped aboard his new $2.4 million speedboat, filled up the tank with a fuel made from animal fat and headed east from Auckland.

His goal was simple: to complete the fastest circumnavigation of the globe in a motorboat while using nothing but biodiesel, renewable fuel that can be made with salvaged French fry grease, refined soybean oil and other organic and recycled oils. The record attempt is due to start in March, from Barbados, after a North American tour this fall meant to test and publicize the boat — called the Earthrace — and raise money.

“I thought I’d have a sponsor give me $4 million and bankroll the whole thing,” said Mr. Bethune, 41. “And I still believe that.”

But somewhere between Hawaii (where the boat refueled on biodiesel made from the drippings of cruise liners’ deep fryers) and Vancouver (where it loaded up with fuel made from tallow, drawn from the hard fat of sheep and cattle), the Earthrace almost ran out of gas — at least financially.

For the last month, Mr. Bethune, a former oil exploration engineer, has been bobbing up and down the California coast, asking for contributions, from $5 donations to tour the boat to $50,000 to plaster a corporate logo on the side.

“My wife sent an e-mail saying they’re going to turn the lights out” at home, said Mr. Bethune, who has two children. “When you’re stressing your partner out like this, it’s hard.”

DOJ_NMG_0068292

The project has only about $10,000 in the bank and is hundreds of thousands of dollars in debt. Mr. Bethune says he has put $650,000 of his own money into the boat and spent another $650,000 borrowed from banks, friends and family. He sold a business he founded, sold his part in a forest plantation and mortgaged his home — three times.

"I thought it would just fall into place," he said. "But we're just keeping our heads above water."

John Allen, the project's one-man ground crew, has also been trying to find money. "There's lots of irons in the fire but no one with a checkbook and pen poised," said Mr. Allen, who, like Mr. Bethune, is an affable New Zealander. "But with a negligible budget, it's been difficult to go full bore with this."

Hotel rooms and fuel have been donated along the way, but things like rental cars have become a luxury. "I've been wearing the same shorts for three months," Mr. Allen said. "It might be nice to get a new set."

While the lack of money has done little to dampen Mr. Bethune's ambitions, he says he understands why nautical sponsors can be hard to find. "The sight of a boat sinking with someone's name on the side can be disconcerting," he said.

Mr. Bethune said he first became interested in biodiesel several years ago while writing a paper on renewable fuels during studies for a master's degree in Australia. He had had a passing knowledge of biodiesel while working on oil rigs in the North Sea and Libya, but as he learned more, he said, he "became a real convert."

Around the same time, Mr. Bethune also happened across a little-known fact: the world record for circumnavigation of the globe by a powerboat is 75 days, set in 1998 by a British boat called the Cable & Wireless Adventurer. Mr. Bethune figured he could do it faster and, at the same time, raise awareness for his newfound cause.

His passion won over some early sponsors, including Cummins MerCruiser Diesel, which donated the engines; ZF Marine, which donated the boat's gearboxes, propellers and engine controls; and Biodiesel Oils NZ, which gave Earthrace 15,000 gallons of fuel (about five tanks' worth) and $30,000. Panasonic donated $150,000 worth of video equipment, and Caliber Boats built the boat at cost, fusing it together using Kevlar and carbon.

The Earthrace project has also relied heavily on the kindness of strangers, including a rotating, all-volunteer crew. Because Mr. Bethune had never taken a boat out of the sight of land, the Earthrace has two experienced sailors helping with the open-ocean sailing, where waves the size of houses can challenge the most able mariner.

With three hulls and a pair of state-of-the-art engines, the Earthrace, which looks a bit like a large metallic swan, is designed to cut through waves up to 50 feet high without slowing and can reach speeds of 40 knots, which boating experts say could help in its record attempt.

"The fact that it's a wave cutter and a tri-hull, you're talking about high speeds here," said Stuart Reininger, a writer for Motor Boating magazine and an expert on power boats. "I'm sure they could do it."

But running on biodiesel, which is harder to find, would complicate things, Mr. Reininger said. "You're talking about a fuel that doesn't have supply stations everywhere," he said.

The Earthrace is 78 feet long, but the living space is cramped, just a closet-size room with four bunks. The galley is similarly basic, with only a kettle, a microwave and a toaster. There is no shower, a fact that Mr. Bethune said added a certain musk to the journey.

"You kind of lose your sense of smell," he said. "But then when you get off, people are like, 'Oy, mate, this boat stinks.' "

Then there are the curious smells that follow biodiesel vehicles in general, often reflecting the fuel's origins. "You may smell doughnuts, you may smell French fries," said Josh Tickell, of the advocacy group Biodiesel America. "People say they smell fried catfish, but that might be a stretch."

Biodiesel gives off fewer emissions than regular oil-based diesel. It is also nontoxic and biodegradable, making it an ideal fuel for boats, Mr. Tickell said. "It biodegrades in water as fast as sugar," he said.

"That is the weirdest thing I've ever seen," said Bruce McClymont, 48, of San Jose. But when told the Earthrace's mission, Mr. McClymont chuckled.

"It's a boat going around the world? So what?" he said. "People have been doing that for 500 years."

DOJ_NMG_0068293

Mr. Bethune remains optimistic and says he sees positive signs everywhere. The project's Web site, www.earthrace.net, has been getting about 20,000 hits a day, he said, compared with about 2,000 a day before the boat left New Zealand. And on a good day, the Earthrace has reaped up to $4,000 from curious onlookers.

Mr. Bethune estimates he needs $500,000 to achieve his circumnavigation, a goal he says he intends to meet.

"We're getting there, mate," he said. "It's been a long, hard journey, and it continues to be a long, hard journey. But we're making it happen the best we can."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Charged In Internet Drug Case (SPP)

By Matthew Moriarty, STAFF WRITER

South Pines (NC) Pilot, September 24, 2006

Two Pinehurst men are among 11 people recently indicted and charged with selling prescription drugs over the Internet.

The U.S. Department of Justice also named an Atlanta-based company in the indictment. The company allegedly sold generic versions of prescription steroids, drugs such as Valium and Xanax and sexual performance drugs such as Viagra and Cialis.

The local men indicted are David Dalton Johnson, 37, and David Alan Brady, 40.

Story continues belowadvertisement

They are accused of selling unregulated drugs manufactured in Belize and marketed through "spam" e-mails as low-price Canadian drugs. The e-mails would direct customers to one of several Web sites where they could order the drugs and they would be shipped from Belize.

Moore County sheriff's deputies went with federal investigators to the homes of the two Pinehurst men on Sept. 14.

"The indictment's allegations are disturbing," U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said in a press release, "because customers thought they were getting legitimate and safe prescription drugs over the Internet from Canada at cheaper prices, when in reality they received adulterated fakes that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize."

All the defendants stand to lose numerous properties and automobiles and will have to forfeit the money in several bank accounts. The Justice Department is seeking a judgment of no less than $19.8 million.

The government is calling for Brady to forfeit his home on Laurel Road in Pinehurst. It's also seeking three lots off Doubs Chapel Road.

The lead defendant is Jared Robert Wheat, 34, of Alpharetta, Ga., the owner of Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, the company that was indicted. The indictment claims that on March 21, 2002, Wheat sent an e-mail "stating that he was making fake Viagra in Belize."

Others charged are Stephen Douglas Smith, 38, of Duluth, Ga.; Thomas Holda, 43, of Duluth, Ga.; Sergio Ronaldo Oliveira, 46, of Hoschton, Ga.; Brad Neal Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala.; David Watkins, 40, of Norcross, Ga.; Steven Blinder, 42, of Aberdeen, S.D.; Michelle Young, 38, of Belize; and Guillermo Pech, 28, of Belize.

All the defendants face charg-es of conspiring to import controlled substances into the United States and conspiring to violate the wire and mail fraud statute and to introduce into interstate commerce adulterated and misbranded prescription drugs.

Johnson and Brady also face other charges including mail fraud, distribution of controlled substances and introducing adulterated and misbranded new drugs.

According to the indictment, they were employed by Hi-Tech. Their tasks included marketing, sales and distribution of drugs and controlled substances, the indictment claims.

The indictment claims that Johnson sent several e-mails in October 2003 to other defendants, teaching them how to encrypt documents prior to exchanging them.

The indictment says that in November 2003, Brady told customer service employees to send an e-mail to customers using a fictitious.

Wheat faces the additional charge of engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise.

DOJ_NMG_0068294

The Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) conducted the investigation along with help from several other agencies.

According to the Justice Department release, the defendants helped Wheat open a drug manufacturing facility in Belize in 2002. The release said the defendants are accused of using funds from Hi-Tech and Wheat's personal money to cover the costs and would fly to Belize to manufacture the drugs.

They are accused of making 24 different generic versions of drugs including steroids Oxymethelone and Stanazolol, versions of behavior-regulating drugs Ambien, Valium and Xanax, versions of sexual performance-enhancing drugs Viagra and Cialis, a version of the cholesterol pill Lipitor and the arthritis treatment Vioxx.

The Justice Department believes that the defendants ordered enough ingredients to produce millions of pills.

Internet prescription drug fraud has been an area of concentration for the DEA.

"One of the fastest-growing drug abuse concerns is prescription drugs," DEA Special Agent Sherri Strange said. "The selling and purchasing of drugs have been facilitated by the wide use of the Internet, the anonymity it provides and the ease and relative secrecy of the mail and private delivery companies.

"As our children sit down at the family computer to do their schoolwork, research projects and converse with friends, criminal organizations like the one alleged today, slither into their lives. Every one of us has received spam e-mails directing us to visit Web sites to order supposed generic prescription drugs and controlled substances. Buyers beware."

FDA Special Agent David Bourne of the criminal investigations department said that these types of drugs pose a health risk to the public. "We are committed to investigating and preventing those who use trickery and deceit to illegally and unscrupulously sell medications over the Internet at the expense of the public health," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Work Force Fights Corruption (AP-Y)

By Pauline Arrillaga, Ap National Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Under the glare of the port lights, federal agents watched as the GMC Yukon approached the immigration booth. Two years of legwork — interviewing sources, listening to wiretaps and watching just as they were watching now — had led to this. Aurora Torres, the suspected smuggler, was behind the wheel.

Weeks earlier, agents had heard her on the telephone with her contact.

"Are you going to invite me to the movies tonight?" she asked. "It's going to be four tickets."

"Right at 12," a man responded. "If I can't make it, I'll send you a 9-1-1."

He hadn't made it on that particular day, but tonight everything was going as planned.

Just after 4 a.m., the Yukon eased to a stop at inspection Lane 8 at the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, a byway for travelers heading from Mexico into California. An immigration officer approached. After a brief exchange, the Yukon was admitted into the United States.

Nothing unusual — but for the 11 illegal immigrants sitting inside in plain view.

Torres was arrested. Then agents moved in to take their final suspect into custody.

"Tickets," investigators had concluded, was code for vehicles loaded with undocumented migrants. "Right at 12" was a reference to a work schedule, the midnight to 8 a.m. shift. The clues, they believed, pointed to the secret of Torres' success.

The inspector from Lane 8 was on break when a half-dozen agents approached. "Are you Mike Gilliland?"

He was an ex-Marine with 16 years under his belt at U.S. Customs, but Torres allegedly knew him as something else. Her contact. The one she referred to as "una cosa segura." Translation: A sure thing.

A dilemma confronts the nation's immigration work force, one that goes far beyond sealing borders to would-be terrorists, drug smugglers and undocumented migrants, one that is particularly unsettling in a post-Sept. 11 world.

DOJ_NMG_0068295

How do you secure the homeland if some of those guarding the gates are dishonest?

Consider: On the California border, at least nine immigration officers have been arrested or sentenced on corruption-related charges in the past 12 months. One of those convicted of smuggling in illegal immigrants turned out to be an illegal immigrant himself, who had used a fake birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol.

On the Texas border, at least 10 officers have been charged or sentenced in corruption schemes over the past year, including four Border Patrol agents — all assigned to the same highway checkpoint — who admitted taking money to let both drugs and migrants pass.

The numbers are a snapshot, but the picture is clear. There's no shortage of "sure things" among U.S. immigration workers.

More than 600 criminal probes have been launched this fiscal year of immigration employees nationwide, according to internal affairs investigators at the Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Complaints range from smuggling, bribery, extortion and fraud to sexual misconduct, assault and theft of government property. The accused, past and present, manned border crossings, highway checkpoints, airports. Others sat behind desks in places like Orange County, Calif., and Fairfax, Va., charged with taking bribes to provide naturalization papers or work permits to ineligible applicants.

Though the cases involve only a fraction of the overall immigration work force, some question whether the government is doing enough to root out corruption in the ranks.

"After the next attack, when they find out that an employee was bribed by a terrorist or bribed by a spy, it's going to be too late," said Michael Maxwell, an ex-police chief who headed internal affairs at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), the agency that adjudicates visa, naturalization and asylum applications. "In fact, I think it is too late."

In February, Maxwell resigned as director of the USCIS Office of Security and Investigations and sought whistleblower protection after he began complaining to Congress about what he describes as rampant corruption that's going unprobed.

After Maxwell's office was established in 2004, he asked the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement to forward pending inquiries involving USCIS workers.

He wound up with a backlog of 2,771 complaints. One-fifth were criminal allegations, he said, including more than 100 accusations of bribery.

"It's outrageous, absolutely outrageous, how little attention is being focused on this issue when you look at the ramifications on national security," said Maxwell, who informed Congress that complaints included some allegations of employees providing material support to known terrorists or being influenced by foreign intelligence services. While declining to publicly provide details, he cites as one example the case of an Iraqi-born U.S. citizen whose background indicated he'd been trained by "multiple foreign intelligence agencies" but nevertheless was hired by USCIS to review asylum applications. The employee has since resigned.

"Remember, one officer can grant citizenship at the time of his choosing at the place of his choosing to the person of his choosing — with impunity. So if he wants to give Osama bin Laden U.S. citizenship, he can," Maxwell said. "I can't tell you how many times I heard senior management say ... `Every allegation will be investigated.' Well, guess what, it's not being investigated."

Although the agency disputes that claim, some cases suggest laxness.

Take the case of Robert Schofield, a USCIS district office supervisor in Fairfax, Va., and a federal immigration officer for 30 years. Schofield was arrested in June, accused of illegally granting residency and issuing naturalization certificates to more than 100 unqualified immigrants. A Chinese citizen also was charged for allegedly brokering deals between Schofield and Asian immigrants.

However, over the last 10 years, "numerous" allegations of bribery involving Schofield and immigration applicants have been reported, an agent with the inspector general's office said in a court affidavit. The agent didn't provide specifics, but said Schofield was once demoted for "conduct unbecoming a government employee" and also accused of making $36,000 in unauthorized purchases on his government-issued credit card.

Schofield has been placed on indefinite suspension without pay, said USCIS spokesman Chris Bentley, who declined further comment on Schofield's employment history because of the pending criminal case. Schofield's lawyer did not return Associated Press messages seeking comment.

Then there's Lizandro Martinez, a Customs officer who admitted that for 2 1/2 years he took bribes to allow vehicles crammed with marijuana through his inspection lane at the Progreso International Bridge in Texas. Martinez, who owned a half-million-dollar home outfitted with a movie theater, was paid $10,000 per vehicle. He faces up to life in prison at his scheduled October sentencing.

Martinez had a host of disciplinary problems during his 14-year career, including threatening to retaliate against a police officer who stopped him for speeding, an official with the Office of Professional Responsibility testified during the case. In 1998, inspectors found 1,300 pounds of cocaine in a truck that crossed through Martinez's lane; the driver stated he had been told to use that particular lane.

Investigations brought disciplinary actions: counseling, an oral reprimand, a 14-day suspension. At one point, according to testimony, Martinez was fired but then reinstated after the union stepped in on his behalf. Still another proposed removal was mitigated to a 30-day suspension.

Jim Tomsheck, newly appointed as assistant commissioner for internal affairs at Customs and Border Protection, declined to discuss the Martinez case, although he said legal battles can hinder the dismissal of problem employees who, for whatever reason, were not charged criminally.

He added that managers are examining ways to ensure that those officers are dealt with administratively, and "are removed from the front line ... and can't continue to contaminate the work force."

Part of the problem is a lack of resources.

The Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement share responsibility for investigating criminal misconduct among a total of 72,000 immigration employees — with 309 investigators.

"Their plates are constantly full," DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner said of his agents, adding that an average of 15,000 allegations against government employees and contractors pour into the office each year. "No, it is not enough people. ... We have cases that we opened three years ago that we're still pursuing."

Others question whether the investigative structure makes sense. It's not clear, for example, whether Customs and Border Protection has the authority to conduct criminal probes of its own employees, who include Border Patrol agents and front-line Customs officers. The majority of criminal investigations of immigration employees involve CBP workers.

Tomsheck said his agency was in the process of building a small corps of investigators "so that we can stay actively involved in policing our own work force." However, Traci Lembke, acting director of the Office of Professional Responsibility, said those investigators are authorized only to handle administrative — not criminal — issues.

In response, CBP issued the following statement: "We are working with ICE on all of these issues. We all agree how critical this is to the mission of DHS."

It's noon. A muggy day at the Otay Mesa port of entry just outside of San Diego. Eleven lanes are clogged as far as the eye can see with cars, motorcycles, SUVs and vans ferrying folks from Tijuana to schools, jobs and stores in California.

Weaving in and out of the smog jam is a Customs officer, holding a shepherd mix by the leash to sniff out contraband. As cars creep toward the inspection booths, automated scanners register license plates in a computer. Then other Customs officers ask for identification, pop trunks, inspect spare-tire compartments, peer down air vents. If anything seems out of place, vehicles are sent to secondary inspection for a more thorough examination.

This is what port director James Hynes calls "layered screening," every step intended to catch smugglers but also make it more difficult for a corrupt officer to operate under the radar. Other measures include bans on personal cell phones and pagers, which have been used to alert smugglers what inspection lane an officer is working, and unscheduled lane rotations.

"We want lots of eyes and ears out here to layer our capability and be random, flexible and unpredictable. That's our success in the war on drugs. That's our success in alien apprehensions. And that's also our success in maintaining integrity," Hynes said, standing not far from Lane 8, the one Mike Gilliland was working the morning he was arrested.

Hynes and other immigration brass insist corruption is a priority — but combating it is a challenge, because smugglers are aggressive about targeting and luring in officers. They'll post lookouts just across the border and, using binoculars, zero in on inspectors with perceived vulnerabilities.

Are they tired? Lazy? Flirtatious with women?

Greed is an obvious motivator. Migrants paid upward of $4,000 each to pass through Gilliland's lane at Otay Mesa, investigators said, adding that smugglers use the guarantee of a "sure thing" to demand higher rates. Gilliland's cut was alleged to be $1,500 a head.

"That adds up. Really, really quickly," said FBI agent Andrew Black, who heads the San Diego Border Corruption Task Force.

In Gilliland's case, with as many as four vehicles coming through a night, each one sometimes packed with 10 people or more, it could have added up to a $60,000 profit in a single shift — about the equivalent of an entire year's salary as an inspector with Customs and Border Protection.

There are other, more complex, reasons seemingly good agents go bad. In some past cases, corrupt agents conspired with friends or family members. Others cite growing discontent with the job, and the relative ease with which a dirty employee can operate.

"We don't do anything, just clear the way, and we get 300 (dollars) per head," ex-Border Patrol agent Eric Balderas said in a wiretapped phone call last year. He's awaiting sentencing in a California corruption case.

Balderas admitted conspiring with fellow agent Oscar Ortiz to allow illegal immigrants into the country. Ortiz was sentenced in July to five years in prison for smuggling at least 100 immigrants, at times transporting them in his Border Patrol truck.

A Mexican citizen, Ortiz used a fake U.S. birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol, prompting the agency to re-examine its employees' backgrounds. His attorney, Stephen White, said Ortiz was disenchanted with a job akin to "putting a Band-Aid on an open wound."

"A lot of times there's nothing that they can do," White said. "People just come and they can't stop it."

At sentencing, Ortiz told the judge: "I was blind."

Port director Hynes finds such explanations difficult to swallow. What separates a good agent from a bad one is "what integrity you carry when you get up in the morning," he said. "A guy like Gilliland or others? They sold their integrity, and over time we'll get them."

Most border agents "are honest, hardworking and do a fine job," added FBI agent Black. "However, the ones that are corrupt are really in a position to do this country a lot of harm. They don't know who's going through, and they don't know what's going through. That's the danger."

A convicted felon was among those smuggled through Gilliland's lane the day he was arrested, court documents said.

With the case pending, FBI agents and prosecutors declined to go on record with theories of why Gilliland supposedly turned. Court records allege he worked with Torres and one other female smuggler.

Gilliland, meanwhile, maintains his innocence.

"I've got nothing to hide," he told The Associated Press from his home in Chula Vista as his wife, also a Customs and Border Protection employee, stood by his side.

For now, Gilliland is under house arrest, an electronic monitor clasped to his ankle. The government uniform and badge are gone, and what ultimately becomes of his career and reputation will be decided in a courtroom.

Judges Fumble Asylum Cases (CHIT)

By Noreen S. Ahmed-ullah And Jon Yates, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, September 24, 2006

Refugee was sent back to Sudan to face jail, beatings

DOJ_NMG_0068298

Denied asylum and ordered out of the U.S., Nourain Niam spent three years running for his life in Africa. He was arrested and beaten, he said, uncertain whether he would ever find sanctuary.

But in an extraordinary turn of events, Niam returned to Chicago this month, living evidence of a widespread breakdown in America's immigration court system.

Niam, a member of a persecuted Sudanese opposition party, is the first in a wave of political refugees who are getting a second chance at asylum, after federal appeals courts found grievous errors in the way their cases were handled.

In one year alone, the Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded 40 percent of the 136 immigration cases it heard--rejecting rulings of the administrative judges in stern and often scathing language.

U.S. Appeals Judge Richard Posner, who led the charge, called the immigration judge's analysis in Niam's case "so inadequate as to raise questions of adjudicative competence."

Still, it was only with repeated interventions by the the appeals court--and a little luck--that Niam ended up on a plane headed to O'Hare International Airport, his eyes filled with tears as he caught sight of Chicago's skyline.

"I thought of the last three years in Africa," the father of two quietly recalled, his deep and steady voice giving little indication of his emotions. "I felt my life was in danger. I could be killed or arrested at any time."

In fact, he said, men he believes to be Sudanese agents operating in Chad did seize him in 2005. He said he was pistol-whipped and kicked, then left unconscious for three days in a worm-infested jail. He was eventually released through the efforts of a friend.

That, he said, puts his struggle here in perspective.

"The United States, whatever it is, you will not see a better place in terms of freedom, in terms of human rights," he said.

His troubles are not over, though. His wife, son and a gravely ill U.S.-born daughter were not allowed to return with him. They remain in Africa while Niam fights for asylum and a reunion.

"My dream is to see my daughter, my wife and my son beside me," he said.

In the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the U.S. government created new immigration guidelines that officials said would help secure the country's borders.

Among them was a measure by former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft designed to clear a stockpile of cases clogging immigration courts, an arm of the Justice Department. Ashcroft's idea was to overhaul the system's primary review panel, the Board of Immigration Appeals.

In doing so, he greatly expanded the types and number of immigration appeals that could be reviewed by a single judge, instead of a three-judge panel, and could be decided with a one-sentence opinion. He called the directives "streamlining." Critics called it rubber-stamping.

The effect was almost immediate. Immigrants, feeling their claims were not properly reviewed, flooded the federal appeals courts with their cases.

Federal judges reacted too.

Posner wrote some of the harshest opinions, questioning whether asylum seekers were being denied fundamental rights. In one ruling, Posner asked whether immigration judges were properly trained. In another, he called an immigration judge's opinion "hopelessly incomplete" and part of a "systemic failure."

"The 7th Circuit [of federal appeals court] took the lead," said Crystal Williams, deputy director of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "But other circuits like the 3rd and the 1st began to weigh in."

The Washington D.C.-based organization estimated there have been more than 100 remands across the country since Posner and the federal courts began to identify a pattern of errors.

Denise Slavin, president of the National Association of Immigration Judges, said immigration judges are short-staffed, overworked and under pressure to resolve cases quickly. She said the system needs changes that will relieve immigration judges and give them more time and help to review cases.

The government, to an extent, agreed. Last month, after a Department of Justice review, Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced periodic evaluations of immigration court judges and plans to beef up staffing.

DOJ_NMG_0068299

Immigration experts applauded the changes. Many, however, such as Eleanor Acer, refugee program director for New York City-based Human Rights First, were disappointed in the government's decision to keep the "streamlining" single-judge reviews.

Niam's odyssey through U.S. immigration courts began in 1998, but his story began decades before, in the provincial capital of El Fasher in the Darfur region of Sudan.

According to his 2001 testimony, Niam was a student when he joined the Umma Party. After a coalition government was elected in 1986, he became a mid-level government official in El Fasher.

But after a 1989 coup by Omar al-Bashir, Sudan's current ruler, Umma fell from favor and Niam lost his job. At one point, Niam testified, he was taken into custody and jailed for 3 1/2 weeks. During that time, he said, he was threatened and beaten.

Niam believes he was targeted not just for his political views, but because he is a member of the Zaghawa tribe, an ethnic group persecuted by government-backed militias in the Darfur region, where hundreds of thousands of people have been killed. President Bush and other U.S. officials have called those attacks genocide.

Niam said he eventually escaped to Chad and then to Nigeria. He believes Sudanese authorities were never far behind.

Came to U.S. in 1996

In 1996, he came to the U.S. on a student visa and settled in Ft. Wayne, Ind. He lived in a community with 10 other Sudanese and Chadian families.

Though he has no documents to prove it, he claims he filed for asylum twice in his first year here. It wasn't until an attorney filed a third application, however, that immigration officials responded, he said.

In a 2001 hearing, Immigration Judge James Fujimoto ruled Niam had missed the one-year deadline to apply for asylum. Fujimoto said there was no record of his first two applications.

The judge also ruled him ineligible for "withholding of removal"--essentially a stay of deportation--saying there was no evidence Niam would be tortured if returned to Sudan.

"Despite Sudan's apparently poor human rights record, a lack of respect for human rights does not signify that members of the disrespected group face a probability of torture," Fujimoto said in his decision.

In another passage, Fujimoto misidentified the government in power when Niam was last arrested, and he concluded from that there was no clear evidence Niam remained in danger.

Niam's attorneys appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals. In a two-paragraph decision, the board acknowledged the immigration judge had "incorrectly identified the regime in power during [Niam's] 1990 arrest" but declared the error "harmless."

The immigration board then affirmed Fujimoto's decision denying both asylum and withholding.

Ordered back to Sudan

In March 2003, almost two years after Fujimoto denied asylum, Niam opened his mail to find a letter from the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services. The letter said Niam had exhausted all possibilities for administrative relief.

"Arrangements have been made for your departure to Sudan on Tuesday, April 8, 2003," the letter read.

In an interview this month, Niam said going back to Sudan as the immigration court had ordered would have been a death sentence. Sudanese authorities knew his younger brother was a high-ranking member of a key opposition group, he said.

"I thought for sure they would kill me," Niam said. "Or I would disappear."

To avoid deportation, Niam fled. He and his family boarded a flight for Chad on April 7, 2003.

Unlike many asylum seekers, Niam was lucky in that he had legal representation, Acer, of Human Rights First, said. Refugees without an attorney often don't know they can appeal to the federal courts. Some can't afford that, but Niam's attorneys worked for free.

His lawyers already had appealed his case to the federal appeals court, but it was not until after Niam left the country--unbeknownst to his lawyers--that U.S. Appeals Judges Posner, Kenneth Ripple and Ann Claire Williams ruled in Niam's favor, in January 2004.

Among other criticisms, Posner focused on the error that the Board of Immigration Appeals had found harmless: the mistake about who was in power when Niam was arrested.

Niam's attorneys mailed the opinion to Niam's old address in Ft. Wayne. It came back, unopened.

"A case like Niam's is disheartening," said Godfrey Muwonge, one of Niam's attorneys. "You've won but lost."

DOJ_NMG_0068300

His other attorney, Larry Hagen, eventually connected with Niam by e-mail, while he was in Chad.

Niam was surprised at the news but remained despondent. In an e-mail to Hagen, Niam wrote: "Since my arrival, up to date, I never had a home to live, moving from house to house, from [one] village to another.

"I have been arrested several times and scared to death, but paid money to escape and cross the border into Cameroon or Nigeria."

'04 bid for visa denied

In July 2004, Niam tried to get a visa from the U.S. Embassy in Chad to return to Chicago for his immigration hearing. Records show he was denied. He said embassy officials told him he didn't need to be present at the hearing because his attorneys could represent him.

A hemisphere away, the immigration judge disagreed. Because Niam did not show up, the judge rejected his case again.

While his attorneys kept fighting, Niam's situation in Chad grew more dangerous.

Men he believed to be Sudanese secret agents arrested him last year while they were looking for his brother, Niam said. They took him to a high-walled building, then beat him with the butt of a pistol, cutting his chin and opening a gash on his forehead, he said.

Others hit and kicked him until he fell unconscious and was thrown in a dank, bug-ridden cell, he said.

"I never imagined I could be alive again," Niam said. "In Africa, it's easy to get killed, and nobody will ask why you have been killed or who killed you, particularly if the government is a part of it."

Niam said he was in the jail for three days until a friend in the Chadian government secured his release. He left his wife and daughter and fled Chad.

He traveled west across the continent, crossing through Cameroon, Nigeria, Benin and Burkina Faso before stopping in Mali. He figured Mali was far enough from Sudan to be safe.

He wrote to Hagen that he was depressed and "psychologically damaged" about leaving his family.

Encouraging words

Still, encouraging words from his attorney brought him hope.

"I have no word to express my feeling towards your efforts and always when I reach to the point that my soul [is] about to separate [from] my body, you bring me hope of life again," Niam wrote.

Hagen and Muwonge filed another motion to reopen Niam's case. The motion made it back to the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. In January, the court ruled Niam had the right to appear in person at his immigration hearings.

Even as the political situation deteriorated in Sudan and Chad, the U.S. government resisted Niam's return. Muwonge told officials if they did not act soon, he would go back to the appeals court again. The government relented, giving Niam special permission to return.

He arrived at O'Hare on Sept. 12, looking gaunt and tired. Muwonge greeted him in a low-key reunion, and Niam thanked him repeatedly. Later, he sobbed as he embraced Muwonge again.

His next immigration hearing is in April. In the meantime, his attorneys hope to seek humanitarian parole to bring his wife and children to the U.S.

Niam's son is 8 months old, but it is his 3-year-old daughter, ill with an undiagnosed disease, who worries him most. He dreams of a reunion with her in America, where he can raise her in freedom and without fear.

"She is my life itself," he said. "She is my heart."

When A Foreigner Turns American (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

When an immigration judge granted asylum last week to an orphaned Pakistani youth who grew up in Queens, one argument she considered was that he was so Americanized, "he would stick out like a sore thumb" in his native land.

Can you be too Americanized to be deported?

In the end, the judge used other grounds to halt the deportation of the young man, Mohammad Sarfaraz Hussain, 21, and to recognize him as a refugee from persecution. But the question is part of a growing debate over how to treat the Americanized children of foreign parents.

It makes sense that the concept has now turned up in an asylum hearing, said Stephen Knight, deputy director of the Center for Gender and Refugee Studies at Hastings College of Law in San Francisco. At a time of simmering conflict between the United States and Muslims in other countries, Americanized young people may very well become targets of persecution overseas.

At the same time, he added, no one is suggesting asylum as an answer for more than a handful. Among Pakistanis of all ages, for example, fewer than 2,000 cases of asylum were granted nationwide in a decade, and in New York, only 77 Pakistanis received asylum in 2004.

"It's a very difficult, strenuous avenue to pursue, to try to gain asylum in the United States," Mr. Knight said. "Judges are skeptical, the standard of proof is high, Congress is making it harder to apply and easier to deny."

A broader answer is a measure known as the Dream Act, included in immigration bills now stalled in the Senate. It offers a path to citizenship to young people of good character who have lived in the United States for five years, been accepted to college, or earned a high school diploma.

Opponents say the measure will encourage illegal immigration and subsidize immigrants' education at the expense of American children and their taxpaying parents. Supporters contend it is unfair to punish young people for parental decisions, and unwise to leave a generation of strivers in a dead end — let alone to deport them to lands where anger at America is boiling over.

"Like many first generation immigrants, they're very loyal to the country that took them in," said Cris Toffolo, director of the Justice and Peace Studies program at St. Thomas University in St. Paul, who testified as an expert in Mr. Hussain's asylum hearing. "But then if we deport them or deny them citizenship, they're like a jilted lover. Why should they be loyal?"

TAX:

Major Error Is Reported In Tax Paid By Mrs. Astor On Sale Of Painting (NYT)

By Serge F. Kovaleski

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Legal papers filed by J. P. Morgan Chase, the temporary guardian of Brooke Astor's assets, state that her son recently told the bank that he now realizes he made an error in his mother's 2002 tax return by overstating the original price of a Childe Hassam painting she had sold, resulting in a large underpayment of taxes three years ago.

As it turns out, the discrepancy was a matter not just of thousands of dollars, but of millions.

The so-called cost basis for the work of art, "Flags, Fifth Avenue," was listed in Mrs. Astor's federal income tax filing as $7.425 million, a copy of the document shows. But she paid $172,010 for the painting when she bought it in March 1970, according to the bill of sale.

Because of the inflated figure, Mrs. Astor apparently ended up paying far less in taxes than required on the capital gains she realized from the February 2002 sale of the painting by Hassam, a renowned American Impressionist. Mrs. Astor's son, Anthony D. Marshall, 82, who managed her finances at the time, sold the painting to an art gallery for $10 million and collected a $2 million fee from his mother for handling the transaction.

The tax issue concerning the painting, also known as "Up the Avenue From Thirty-Fourth Street, May 1917," has arisen as a compelling side issue from the review of mounds of financial documents in the legal battle over the care and fortune of Mrs. Astor, the 104-year-old philanthropist and socialite.

In July, Mr. Marshall's son, Philip Marshall, filed a court petition claiming that his father had been grossly neglecting Mrs. Astor's well-being while enriching himself with her wealth.

Philip Marshall has asked the court to appoint permanent guardians for his grandmother; the bank is temporarily in control of her assets.

The case against Anthony Marshall has hinged on a string of changes to Mrs. Astor's will that took place in late 2003 and early 2004, after she had experienced a marked decline in her health. The changes redirect millions of dollars to her son upon her death.

Mr. Marshall has vigorously denied accusations that he neglected his mother, insisting that he has been an honest and loving steward of her personal affairs for more than 25 years. His lawyers have cast him as an astute and attentive financial manager for Mrs. Astor, and they contend that her investments have flourished as a result of his keen involvement.

One of Anthony Marshall's lawyers has asked J. P. Morgan Chase to file amended tax returns on behalf of Mrs. Astor that reflect the true capital gains stemming from the sale of the painting.

J. P. Morgan Chase says it is reviewing the documents as part of its fiduciary responsibilities. But in a court filing, the bank describes the request as "ironic," noting that Mr. Marshall has also objected to its efforts to learn more about the deal.

"The 'error' evidently relates to a substantial overstatement of the cost basis of the Hassam painting (and a resultant significant underpayment of the tax)," Les Fagen, a lawyer for J. P. Morgan Chase, wrote. He added, "This is the same painting transaction which he contends in his opposition papers is not now worthy of further inquiry, as the bank has requested."

Sanford J. Schlesinger, a tax lawyer and founding partner at Schlesinger Gannon & Lazetera in New York, who is not involved in the case, said that the $2 million commission would be deducted from the total gain on the sale of the painting, bringing the figure to just over $7.8 million, which was subject to a 28 percent federal tax rate in 2002, as well as additional state and city taxes. Mrs. Astor could also face sizable penalties and interest for underpaying the tax, he said.

As her return stands now, she would have been taxed only on capital gains of $2.575 million relating to the work of art.

"It looks like it is $5 million in unreported income. That's a considerable difference in gain that was not taxed," Mr. Schlesinger said. He noted that it was difficult to determine precisely what Mrs. Astor would owe because of variables like the alternative minimum tax and offsetting capital losses that could affect such calculations.

Mr. Marshall's lawyers provided few details about how the capital gains from the sale of the Hassam painting came to be substantially under-reported in Mrs. Astor's 2002 tax return. One of his lawyers, Kenneth E. Warner, would only briefly address the matter via e-mail.

Mr. Warner said that Mr. Marshall "does not know how the mistake got made." Mr. Warner said that as part of the court case concerning Mrs. Astor, Mr. Marshall saw the document for the first time since it had been submitted to the Internal Revenue Service in 2003.

As soon as Mr. Marshall noticed it, "he immediately gave us instructions to notify Chase so that it could be corrected without delay."

Mr. Warner would not say whether Mr. Marshall, who was granted power of attorney by his mother in November 1978 and held that authority in 2003, had signed the tax return.

Mr. Fagen, the lawyer for J. P. Morgan Chase, would say only that the bank was reviewing Mrs. Astor's financial records and that "one goal is to assure that she is in compliance with her legal obligations."

Alan M. Pollack, a lawyer for the Long Island accounting firm that prepared the return, Samuel Cohen & Company, which he noted had done work for Mrs. Astor for about 25 years, said the firm had not committed any errors when it filled out the schedule concerning the sale of the painting.

"Samuel Cohen & Company fulfilled its professional obligations to its client, did not make unilateral decisions about Mrs. Astor's taxes and was provided the information about the painting by one of Mrs. Astor's representatives," Mr. Pollack said.

He added that he did not feel it was appropriate to identify that person because of the continuing court proceedings in the Astor case.

Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the I.R.S., said federal law prevented him from answering any specific questions about Mrs. Astor's tax return. But asked about how the agency decides to pursue a case for prosecution, he said that as a general rule, a referral is made to the Department of Justice when the I.R.S. has evidence that an omission from a tax return was "willful."

DOJ_NMG_0068303

"A financial analysis or investigation often determines whether the omission is unintended or a willful attempt to evade payment of taxes," Mr. Marvin said.

In court papers filed last week by Mr. Marshall's lawyers, new details were provided about the sale of Mrs. Astor's Hassam piece to the Gerald Peters Gallery. Mr. Marshall said that in the fall of 2001, he and his mother had the painting shown at the Adelson Galleries Inc. on the Upper East Side. During that time, Mr. Marshall and his mother talked about selling the painting if it generated any interest, according to the filing.

"Not long after the Adelson exhibition ended, a potential buyer approached me about purchasing the painting," Mr. Marshall said in the filing. "When I told my mother how much was being offered, she decided to sell it, and to share some of the profit with me by paying me a 'commission' for arranging the purchase."

Those who know Mrs. Astor have questioned whether she would have wanted to sell the Hassam painting.

Although her 1993 will stipulated that the work of art was to be sold after her death, two of her wills after that, in 1997 and 2001, stated that the painting was to be bequeathed to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, provided the museum displayed the piece as part of its permanent collection. Otherwise, the painting was to go to a New York City institution that would agree to permanently display it.

Mrs. Astor's most recent will, dated Jan. 30, 2002, shortly before Mr. Marshall sold the painting, does not mention it by name.

But one of Mr. Marshall's lawyers said the 2002 will says that any works of art that are not specifically bequeathed are to be sold.

The IRS Works In Mysterious Ways (LAT)

Steve Lopez Points West

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Pastor William Turner Jr. is a robust man with an unshakable set of beliefs, and he's never been shy about sharing them with the congregation of his New Revelation Missionary Baptist Church in Pasadena.

He has preached against same-sex marriage, stem cell research and abortion. And he has proudly boasted to President Bush about converting 80% of his congregation from Democrat to Republican.

"I salute and support you President Bush and will work untiringly for your reelection," Turner wrote to the president in February 2004, telling him he had done the same for former California Gov. Pete Wilson. Turner also wrote to fellow African American clergymen in support of Bush in 2004, saying that "any gay, homosexual, lesbian and/or immoral act is an abomination against God."

Roughly two miles away from Turner's church is All Saints Episcopal Church, which has a radically different political bent. The same year Turner took up Bush's cause, the Rev. George Regas delivered a guest sermon at All Saints involving a mock debate between Bush, John Kerry and Jesus. In the debate, Jesus said that Bush's preemptive strike on Iraq "has led to disaster."

So which of these two churches is under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for taking sides in political contests?

The latter. Your precious tax dollars are paying for an inquisition of All Saints by the Internal Revenue Service, which has demanded church records and ordered rector Ed Bacon to testify at a hearing next month.

Look, All Saints' politics are pretty clear, and it's not hard to guess which presidential candidate Regas might have been more sympathetic to. But it's hard to believe that the IRS wouldn't have better things to do and bigger fish to fry. The tale of these two churches proves just how arbitrary, fickle and goofy the federal agency's actions can be.

"This is completely ridiculous, what the IRS is doing" to All Saints, says USC Law School Dean Ed McCaffery, a specialist in tax law. He said the IRS has every right to make sure nonprofits abide by the rules, but he doesn't believe the sermon in question comes anywhere near the legal definition of picking sides.

So is this investigation politically motivated?

The IRS makes it impossible to find out. Conservative and liberal churches have both been targeted, but the tax agency won't say which churches it's investigating or why.

The only reason we know All Saints is being investigated is that the church went public.

DOJ_NMG_0068304

After a portion of the 2004 sermon was quoted in The Times, the IRS sent All Saints a letter describing Regas' words as a "searing indictment of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq." The letter also raised an issue with the reverend's calling tax cuts for the wealthy "inimical to the values of Jesus."

It's possible that All Saints' politics got the attention of someone up the ladder in the IRS, said McCaffery. He said he wouldn't be surprised if senior officials in the U.S. Treasury Department or the White House had given the green light to continue pressing the case against All Saints.

All Saints, which could not possibly have bought better publicity, pondered its next move last week while supporters rallied to its cause. On Thursday, Bacon announced to cheers that the church would defy the IRS.

He cited an obligation to Episcopal faith, which "calls us to speak to the issues of war and poverty, bigotry, torture and all forms of terrorism … always stopping short of supporting or opposing political parties or candidates for political office." It was imperative, he said, to "defend the freedom of pulpits in faith communities throughout the land."

Given the church's liberal politics, Bacon has an unlikely ally.

"I don't know why the IRS is singling them out," said Pastor Turner, who told me he was praying for his brothers at All Saints.

He said he thought the use of Jesus in a mock debate bordered on mockery, but he said he doesn't have a problem beyond that.

If the IRS is going after All Saints, I told Turner, shouldn't they be knocking down his door?

Turner said he's never promoted a candidate directly from the pulpit, and he thought the distinction put him in the clear. It's a notion that McCaffery later discounted outright, saying the law recognizes no such distinction between what is said from the pulpit versus the desk of the pastor.

I told Turner that I believe he ought to have a right to tell his flock whatever he wants to, and I feel the same way about Regas and Bacon. I'm just not sure I want to pay for them to have that privilege, but that's essentially what we're all doing given their tax-exempt status.

That's a fair question for debate, McCaffery said, but it presents a problem: If religious institutions didn't enjoy tax-exempt status, people would get no deduction for their charitable contributions. It could mean that some religious institutions would go under, and we'd lose all the social services they provide.

As an agnostic, I'm happy to have the debate. Especially since religious fervor cuts both ways and has done a world of harm as well as a world of good.

I'd also like to have someone explain why a church can support a ballot initiative but not a candidate, and why the federal government thinks it's OK for one minister to call homosexuality an abomination but unacceptable for another to ask if Jesus would be pro-war.

Turner argued that on social issues, he speaks not for any political cause, but for Jesus and the Bible.

Wasn't Regas doing the same?

McCaffery guessed that if the IRS dropped in on 10 churches, it would find nine that are politicking one way or another. What Congress ought to do, he said, is revisit the subject and clarify exactly what tax-exempt institutions can and can't say or do.

Until then, the IRS' finest should forget about the Prince of Peace sermon, roll up their sleeves and go after tax dodgers, deadbeats and cheats.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Legal Aid Program Tried To Oust Auditor (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Directors of the government's legal aid program for the poor secretly debated how to fire the auditor who exposed their expensive meals, use of limousine services and headquarters move to a ritzy neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0068305

Meeting transcripts obtained by The Associated Press show that Legal Services Corp. board members in 2005 and 2006 disparaged Inspector General Kirt West, whose job is to find fraud, waste and abuse.

In private, the board derided West as abusive, a character assassin, a shoddy investigator with a delusional staff and someone with a "fetish" for independence — even though independence is an inspector general's hallmark.

Board members warned themselves to be careful in their actions toward the internal watchdog, fearful that retaliation would anger Congress and jeopardize their federal dollars.

While board members complained among themselves about how much time they spent discussing their watchdog, the corporation said in a public report that the program for free legal help turned away half the applicants for lack of resources.

Some board members expressed their fears of angering Congress, the source of their funding, by leaving the perception they were retaliating against the inspector general who investigated their actions.

Those fears proved accurate when the board was ready to discuss West's status at a meeting in St. Louis last April. Two senators and a House member, who learned the directors had secretly debated firing West in secret meetings, were convinced that the board would take action in the April session.

Just as the directors were ready to convene after lunch, a congressional aide hand-delivered a letter to the board chairman, Atlanta lawyer Frank Strickland.

Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Michael Enzi, R-Wyo., and Rep. Christopher Cannon, R-Utah, warned Strickland that any attempt to fire West "would be an egregious action in light of the fact that Mr. West is investigating you, the LSC board, as well as your president."

West still has his job.

He conducted an expansive review of spending by board members, who are part-time, and top full-time program executives. According to an Associated Press account in August, some of the questionable spending that West brought to light included:

_$14 "death-by-chocolate" desserts.

_$400 for a car and driver to take Strickland and other officials to attend meetings and functions within cab distance of the Legal Services headquarters.

_$200 taxi rides in Ireland by the Legal Services president, Helaine Barnett, who was attending a conference.

West also reported the corporation was overpaying by as much as $1.8 million on its 10-year lease in its new headquarters in the upscale Georgetown section of Washington. He also found that the corporation could be overpaying by $7 million for unneeded space.

The board's vice chairman, University of Virginia law professor Lillian BeVier, headed the committee that was evaluating the inspector general. According to a transcript of the board's January 2006 meeting, BeVier summed up comments by a board colleague, Baltimore attorney Herbert Garten:

"I mean I understood Herb to say we should basically say 'You're fired,'" said BeVier.

"Yes, that's my opinion," replied Garten, a Baltimore lawyer. But Garten said he agreed with the board chairman on the need for a formal review to establish a record of the watchdog's performance.

BeVier also addressed board member Thomas Meites, a Chicago lawyer.

"You're just willing to ... take the steps to get him removed, as opposed to a probationary period or you've got six months or something," she said. Meites said he, too, agreed with the chairman that "basic fairness" required a formal review that would give the watchdog a chance to defend himself.

BeVier said, "He should know that he's got ... to shape up or we will ship him out." Then Meites said, "I can't tell you how little I want to spend any time with this guy."

West declined comment on the board discussions, as did Strickland, the board chairman. Both are scheduled to testify Tuesday before a House Judiciary subcommittee led by Rep. Cannon.

Garten declined comment. Messages left with Meites were not returned.

BeVier said in an interview the board had not decided whether to fire West and would not have done so at the April meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0068306

"What we were trying to do was find a way to make a decision and find out whether impressions some members had were correct" about West's performance, she said.

Cannon has introduced a bill that would require votes of nine of the 11 Legal Services board members to fire the inspector general; a majority is required now.

The Utah Republican said in an interview that any attempt to fire the inspector general was "unseemly," and "the effect will be much harsher scrutiny by Congress on their activities."

"Instead of scapegoating this guy they should be looking at themselves and solving problems," Cannon said.

Added Sen. Grassley: "It looks like the Legal Services Corporation is busy looking for ways to shoot the messenger."

The nonprofit corporation is financed with a $330.8 million congressional appropriation. Most of the money is distributed to 138 nonprofit legal aid organizations across the country that provide free lawyers in certain types of civil cases — including housing, domestic abuse, worker exploitation, divorce, and Social Security benefits.

Is The Chief Justice Really A Judicial Activist? (LAT)

By David G. Savage, David G. Savage Covers The Supreme Court For The Times.

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

John Roberts, who likened his role to a passive 'umpire,' may want to do more than just enforce the rules.

ONE YEAR AGO, John G. Roberts Jr., at the time President Bush's nominee to be the chief justice of the United States, told senators that he aspired to be like an umpire, enforcing the rules of the game, not making them.

"My job is to call the balls and strikes, and not to pitch or bat," he said. "It is a limited role…. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

Roberts suggested that modesty, humility and stability in the law were the goals of his umpire credo. Not to make law, like the activist judges he disdained, but merely to interpret existing laws fairly, mindful of legislative intent and the requirements of the Constitution. And during much of his first year, he did just that.

But in several cases, he behaved differently, joining Justice Antonin Scalia in dissents that would have rolled back a major environmental law and undercut states' traditional authority over the practice of medicine. Neither would have qualified as a modest act.

On the eve of the court's new term in October, the question that was hanging in the air during his confirmation hearing remains: Will the new chief justice seek the right result, or the right's result?

In a surprising number of cases, Roberts brought together his liberal and conservative colleagues for unanimous decisions last term. In two important cases, he won the entire court's agreement for rulings that upheld laws passed by state lawmakers or by Congress, an act consistent with his judge-as-umpire philosophy.

In Ayotte vs. Planned Parenthood, the New Hampshire Legislature had passed a law requiring doctors to notify parents of girls under 18 who were seeking an abortion. Doctors were to wait 48 hours before proceeding. The only exception was to save the life of the mother.

The American Civil Liberties Union and Planned Parenthood sued on behalf of several doctors, contending that the law was unconstitutional because it did not include a "health" exception. In the past, the high court had said states may not regulate abortion in a way that jeopardizes the health of women. A federal judge and the U.S. Court of Appeals struck down the entire law for that reason.

New Hampshire appealed, arguing that the law allowed girls to go before a judge and seek a waiver in special situations. The ACLU lawyers said that was insufficient. If a girl is facing a medical emergency, she should go to a hospital, not a court, they said.

Roberts led the way in fashioning a compromise. There is nothing wrong with the law in principle, he said. States can require doctors to inform parents before performing surgery on a minor. Parental-notice laws had been upheld. And most young girls seeking abortions do not face a health emergency.

But the chief justice also said the doctors could seek a court order that would make an exception for true medical emergencies. On this basis, the Supreme Court revived the state law but sent the case back to New Hampshire so a judge or lawmakers could craft a narrow exception for medical emergencies.

Roberts also spoke for a unanimous court in upholding a congressional law, known as the Solomon Amendment, in Rumsfeld vs. FAIR. Several law schools and professors, citing the free-speech clause of the Ist Amendment, had challenged the amendment, which required colleges and universities receiving federal funds to welcome military recruiters on the same basis as other employers.

But in two other high-profile cases, the chief justice seemed to do more than simply call balls and strikes.

In 1994 and again in 1997, Oregon's voters approved the Death with Dignity Act, which allowed terminally ill people to obtain a dose of lethal medication from a doctor to hasten death. Two physicians had to certify that a person's illness was incurable and that they had, at most, several months to live.

The Supreme Court in 1997 rejected the claim of a constitutional "right to die." Justices unanimously said that "end-of-life" issues should be debated and decided by the states, not federal judges. That year, Oregon became the first and only state to authorize a limited but legal right to die.

In Washington, several conservatives in Congress, among them then-Missouri Sen. John Ashcroft, asked Atty. Gen. Janet Reno to intervene. They contended that the Oregon law violated federal drug laws because medications were being used to end a life. She refused, saying the Controlled Substances Act of 1970, which gives the federal government control over dangerous drugs and narcotics, did not take away the states' traditional authority over the practice of medicine and the licensing of doctors.

But when Bush made Ashcroft his attorney general in 2001, Ashcroft issued an order saying that doctors in Oregon could lose their licenses to prescribe medication if they gave dying patients lethal drugs. Oregon's governor, doctors and some patients sued, and a federal judge and the U.S. Court of Appeals blocked Ashcroft's order.

The case of Gonzales vs. Oregon came before the Supreme Court in Roberts' first month as chief justice, and a 6-3 majority ruled for Oregon in January. But Roberts joined Scalia's dissent, as did Justice Clarence Thomas. The three said the use of legal drugs for ending a life was not a "legitimate medical purpose" and could be banned by the attorney general.

If Roberts' side had been in the majority, it would have voided the voice of Oregon's voters, taken away the state's traditional power to regulate the practice of medicine and upheld a single federal officer's new interpretation of a long-standing federal statute that had not been endorsed by Congress.

In the other case, Roberts supported a sharp pullback in the Clean Water Act of 1972, which makes it illegal to discharge pollutants into the "navigable waters of the United States" without a permit. Because water flows downhill, the Environmental Protection Agency since the 1970s has said it has authority over all rivers, streams, channels, marshes and wetlands that may send water — and pollutants — to major lakes, rivers and bays.

But in Rapanos vs. U.S., Roberts joined Scalia, Thomas and Samuel Alito in calling for a new, sharp limit on the EPA's authority. Federal authority, they said, only applied to permanent and "continuous flowing" bodies of water, such as rivers and their main tributaries. This would have eliminated federal protection for most streams and wetlands in the interior of the nation and nearly all those in the West and Southwest because their stream beds are dry for part of the year.

For more than three decades, these federal regulations on wetlands and streams had stood, through Republican and Democratic administrations and through GOP- and Democratic-controlled Congresses. Yet, with one extra vote, the Roberts court would have rewritten the scope of the Clean Water Act in its first term — not the act of a modest Supreme Court.

In this term, which opens Oct. 2, the court will take up at least two cases that will test Roberts' umpire approach to judging. One involves the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which makes it a crime for doctors to remove a fetus largely intact during a second-trimester abortion. Six years ago, in a 5-4 ruling, the court struck down a nearly identical state law and ruled that there was "substantial medical authority" to say this method was sometimes the safest and best method of performing a legal abortion.

But Congress held hearings and said this procedure was "never medically indicated." Most lawyers who follow the court expect the new law will be upheld on a 5-4 decision, thanks to the addition of Alito, who replaced retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Such an outcome would, after all, uphold an act of Congress.

The most intriguing test may come in the area of school integration. Most conservatives, Roberts among them, say the government has no business treating people in a different way because of their race. But many school districts use racial guidelines to limit enrollment in some schools. This is the only way to maintain racial integration in cities where housing tends to be segregated, school officials say.

The justices agreed to hear challenges from white parents who say these guidelines amount to unconstitutional racial discrimination. If the high court agrees with them, it would be a big win for the principle of "colorblind" government, and it could change the rules for school systems across the nation. But it may not signal the dawn of a newly modest Supreme Court.

Half A Reform For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

During his confirmation hearings a year ago, Chief Justice John Roberts pledged to study the serious ethics problem posed by the well-attended "judicial education" programs staged at luxury resorts and financed by private interests hoping to influence judicial decision-making. Chief Justice Roberts followed through, but his chosen antidote is far too timid.

Rather than requiring judges to forgo the privately financed education-vacations, the new rules just put in place with the chief justice's backing by the policy-setting Judicial Conference of the United States mandate only expanded disclosure: the sponsor must file a public disclosure statement setting forth the content of the program and its financing. Judges will need to report their attendance within 30 days, and that information, along with the seminars' reports, will be posted on judicial Web sites. Another overdue change will require judges below the Supreme Court level to install "conflict checking" software on their computers to avoid participating in cases in which they have a financial interest.

The improved transparency is a positive step. But Chief Justice Roberts should have at least insisted that improved disclosure of judicial junkets be accompanied by other steps to cut back on the size of the travel gifts, like limiting reimbursement to judges to the cost of coach fare to get to the resort, and requiring judges to pay for their own room and board.

Rumsfeld Also Plays Hardball On Squash Courts (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — For the last six years, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has slipped down to the Pentagon basement many afternoons, changed into a T-shirt, sweat pants and headband, and spent a heart-thumping hour playing squash.

There, no matter how the war in Iraq was going or how many Democrats were calling for his head, Mr. Rumsfeld could uncork his deadly drop shot, leaving his foe helpless and himself triumphant, at least for a moment.

In some ways, squash offers a window into Mr. Rumsfeld's complicated psyche, revealing much about his stubborn competitiveness and seemingly limitless stamina. Pentagon officials and employees say Mr. Rumsfeld's play closely resembles the way he has run the Defense Department, where he has spent six years trying to break the accepted modes of operating.

"He hits the ball well, but he doesn't play by the rules," says Chris Zimmerman, a devoted squash player who works in the Pentagon's office of program analysis and evaluation and is sometimes in the Pentagon athletic complex when Mr. Rumsfeld is on the court.

Mr. Zimmerman has never actually played his boss. But he says he has noticed that Mr. Rumsfeld, 74, often wins points because, after hitting a shot, he does not get out of the way so his opponent has a chance to return the ball, a practice known in squash as "clearing."

The almost-daily matches, Mr. Rumsfeld, a former Princeton wrestler, acknowledged last year, have helped preserve his "sanity'' in a period in which he and the administration have come under increasing political attack.

Yet even the squash court is no longer the refuge it once was. This summer, two of the aides he played with most left his office for other jobs. Last month, Mr. Rumsfeld started to break in a new partner, Lt. Gen. Victor E. Renuart Jr. of the Air Force, a tennis player who agreed to take up squash after not playing for 30 years so the boss would have a partner.

Mr. Rumsfeld packed his squash racket for an August trip to Alaska but never played a game, even though aides reserved courts at two stops. On the last day of the trip, he delivered his most cantankerous speech in months, likening criticism of the Iraq war to appeasement of the Nazis before World War II.

This month, Mr. Rumsfeld had surgery on his left shoulder, repairing a longstanding injury unrelated to squash. He has not played since, though aides say he is eager to get back on the court after he heals.

Mr. Rumsfeld took up squash more than 20 years ago when he was a business executive. Rather than tricky bank shots off the walls, a move that better-skilled players favor, Mr. Rumsfeld plays with power, hitting the ball hard and ending points quickly. And he relentlessly attacks his opponent's confidence.

"When you try a shot and miss, he'll say, 'You don't have that shot,' " said Lawrence Di Rita, a close aide who played against Mr. Rumsfeld regularly until leaving his job at the Pentagon this summer.

Mr. Di Rita is a former Naval Academy varsity player more than 25 years younger than Mr. Rumsfeld. He says he lost his share of games and never went easy on his boss. By tradition, the loser posted the score on Mr. Rumsfeld's office door, so his staff would know when he had beaten Mr. Di Rita or his other main partner, his military assistant, Vice Adm. James G. Stavridis, who was also on the academy squash team. Mr. Di Rita concedes that Mr. Rumsfeld rarely offers or asks for "lets," a replay point when one player feels aggrieved.

On the court, "he is very aggressive and he is very intense,'' Mr. Di Rita said. "He is very good at getting inside your head. He's everything you would expect Donald Rumsfeld to be."

Mr. Rumsfeld has declined invitations to play against reporters, as well as to describe his game for this article.

Mr. Rumsfeld himself has suggested that his ideas about transforming the military into a smaller, more agile force, like the one he pushed for in invading Iraq, were influenced by his squash playing.

In an interview with the military writer Thomas P. M. Barnett last year, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "I play squash with him," gesturing at Mr. Di Rita. "When I pass him in a shot and it's a well-played hard shot, I saw speed kills. And it does. If you can do something very fast you can get your job done and save a lot of lives."

Many politicians have relaxed by competing, and Mr. Rumsfeld is not the first to have earned a reputation for zeal. As governor of New York, Mario M. Cuomo was known for his sharp elbows and tongue on the basketball court; as president, Bill Clinton exasperated his golf partners by taking mulligans, or do-overs, after bad shots.

In squash, Mr. Rumsfeld's main advantage over more capable and fitter players is that he refuses to play anything but "hardball," a variation of the game that was once common in the United States but has largely died out over the last decade. Most competitors now play the international game, which uses a softer ball and a wider court, requiring more running and allowing more creative shot-making. The harder ball favored by Mr. Rumsfeld tends to come back to the center of the court, so players do not have to move as much to return it.

The Pentagon gym had eight hardball courts when it was built in the 1940's. When a new facility was built in 2002, one hardball court was kept for Mr. Rumsfeld and the handful of other Pentagon employees who still play that version of the game.

But some who know him say Mr. Rumsfeld refuses to concede that the game may have passed him by.

"One time I saw Rumsfeld and I referred to hardball as an old man's game, and he just stared at me," says David Bass, a public relations executive who sometimes plays on the Pentagon courts. "It's become a running joke with us."

Nor does Mr. Rumsfeld lack for bravado. Mohamed Awad, a former champion player who was once ranked as high as ninth in the world, spent a half hour hitting with him last February at a racquet club in Munich, where Mr. Rumsfeld was attending a military conference.

Mr. Rumsfeld plays well for a man his age, Mr. Awad said. Afterward, he said, Mr. Rumsfeld suggested that he could outplay another septuagenarian politician still known for his prowess in squash, the 78-year-old Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak.

DOJ_NMG_0068310

"I told him, 'That can't be right because I have played with Mubarak, and he is much better than you are,' " said Mr. Awad, an Egyptian who now lives in Germany.

Mr. Rumsfeld, he said, just laughed. Pentagon aides say that they do not recall Mr. Rumsfeld boasting about being better than Mr. Mubarak.

NASA Chief Heads To China To Discuss Space Cooperation (NYT)

By Warren Leary

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — The leader of NASA arrives in China on Sunday for a tour of space agency sites, making him the most senior American space official to go to China to discuss possible cooperation between the countries' programs.

Michael D. Griffin, the administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, has repeatedly cautioned that the tour, which will include Beijing, Shanghai and a desert launching site in Gansu Province, will be an exploratory visit that will not result in any bilateral space agreements or formal partnerships.

"This is a get-acquainted visit that has no preconditions to it," he said recently. "We are going to see things and meet people, and see where that takes us."

China is the third country, after the United States and Russia, to have sent humans into space. It has been seeking more international cooperation in aerospace projects, but the United States has been reluctant. Much of China's program is run by the military, raising concerns about possible technology transfers or other national security issues for any such cooperation.

Working with China in space has also been hampered by other issues under discussion by the two nations, like weapons proliferation, trade agreements, patent and trademark enforcement, and human rights, said a senior adviser at NASA, who spoke on condition that he not be identified.

Recently, though, the American position has begun to shift. When Chinese space officials invited the previous NASA administrator, Sean O'Keefe, to visit their operations two years ago, nothing came of the overture. However, when President Hu Jintao of China visited the United States in April and made the same request of Mr. Griffin, President Bush accepted the invitation.

"There has been a policy decision by the Bush White House to do this," said John Logsdon, the director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University. "It's part of an effort to engage China, to open a dialogue that may influence their policies in other areas. But it's starting slowly and deliberately."

Accompanying Mr. Griffin on the trip is William Gerstenmaier, the associate administrator for space operations, Michael F. O'Brien, the assistant administrator for external relations, and Shannon Lucid, a veteran astronaut. Ms. Lucid, who is the daughter of Baptist missionaries, was born in Shanghai and is returning to China for the first time since her childhood.

The group will meet Sun Laiyan, the administrator of the China National Space Administration in Beijing and tour aerospace operations and science centers there before going to Shanghai to visit space manufacturing plants there.

Also scheduled on the five-day trip is a visit to the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center, an extensive rocket-launching complex from which the Chinese prepare and fly their manned spacecraft.

The Chinese launched their first manned spacecraft, Shenzhou, in October 2003, sending one astronaut into orbit for a day. In 2005, a Shenzhou with a two-person crew spent five days in orbit. Chinese authorities said their third mission, set for fall 2007, will send up three astronauts and will include spacewalks.

This year, Chinese officials visiting the United States outlined their plans for an extensive program of manned and unmanned programs, including orbiting a small, staffed space station by 2015 and establishing a moon program that includes sending a robotic orbiter next year, a lunar rover in 2012 and a lander that would return a moon sample to Earth in 2017. While there are no immediate plans to do so, Chinese officials also have expressed interest in sending humans to the moon.

Vincent G. Sabathier, a senior fellow on space issues at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that in the past, the United States had tried to contain Chinese ambitions in space but that this was no longer possible. China has major space agreements with Russia, Europe and most other nations with space programs, and is clearly striving to have a major role in the area, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068311

"The Chinese are going their way and have a strategy in place," Mr. Sabathier said. "They want to work with the United States and be accepted as a major player, and the U.S. is obviously now seeing some potential in working with them, which explains Mr. Griffin's trip."

Mr. Sabathier and other experts said the composition of Mr. Griffin's team, including the head of NASA's human space flight program and Ms. Lucid, whose five trips to space included a long stay aboard the Russian Mir space station, suggests that some type of cooperation in space may be under consideration.

Forget The Right Stuff. Can He Handle A Monkey Wrench? (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

DURING the just-completed mission of the shuttle Atlantis to the International Space Station, viewers of NASA TV were treated to the sight of two highly educated spacewalkers straining against a balky bolt with a wrench and a cheater pipe. They worked with the grunts and wheezes — but not the curses — familiar to anyone who has ever had to change a tire or hook up a bathroom sink.

Then, after Atlantis headed back toward Earth, astronauts on the station had to take emergency measures when a finicky machine, the Elektron oxygen generator, overheated and melted a rubber seal, sending a stench and small amount of smoke into the closed environment of the station.

Ad astra per aspera, sure, but bolts and plumbing? The venerable Latin epigram, which means "to the stars, with difficulty," probably wasn't supposed to be about such mundane matters.

From now until the scheduled end of the shuttle program in 2010, however, every mission currently planned will focus on station construction, and astronauts will continue to wrestle with the occasional frozen bolt, malfunctioning gizmo or other glitch. So why does NASA send brainiacs — the two Atlantis spacewalkers had advanced degrees in physics and aeronautics — when the missions might profit from a couple of shade-tree mechanics and seasoned construction workers?

"It's obviously a legitimate question," said Robert Mirelson, a spokesman at NASA headquarters. "Do you need to be a rocket scientist to be an astronaut?"

"With all the space tourists," he joked, "there are probably some plumbers out there who could afford to go to the space station."

Mr. Mirelson argued that because they go to space in small teams, astronauts must have a broad range of skills. But they can't know everything, he said, so NASA's mission controllers have experts on call at all hours to advise them, especially when something goes wrong.

Mike Mullane, an astronaut who came to space by way of the Air Force, said he was the "Forrest Gump of astronauts" because he felt underpowered in the brains department compared with some of his credentials-heavy colleagues. He said he knew the importance of mechanical ingenuity: on a family trip, his father once nursed an overheated car across the deserted mountains of southern New Mexico by having the Mullane boys urinate into the radiator.

But, he said, that outside-of-the-box thinking might not be the best approach in orbit, where a mistake could bring on disaster. "You're never going to say, 'Oh, something's broken — I'm going to get the toolbox and rip into this,' " he said.

So astronauts work under the close supervision of mission control, an arrangement that hardly calls for mechanical genius, Mr. Mullane said. The work can be done by "anybody with a basic understanding of a screwdriver and a wrench," he said, "and even most Ph.D.'s have that."

Tom Jones, a former astronaut who has a doctorate in planetary science, said NASA's rigorous training instilled the ability to handle every task. "By the time you get up there, you're not bad as a person who can follow directions and deal with this equipment," he said. "We get by."

These days, Mr. Jones added, he feels confident tackling home and automotive repair work that he never did before his astronaut training. "What a wonderful gift from the taxpayer," he said.

Some astronauts are accomplished handymen. Don Pettit has stripped and rebuilt a jet engine in his home workshop. During his stay aboard the station in 2002-03, he cobbled together a camera mount that, with a power drill as its driver, could precisely track the relative motion of the Earth and station to produce spectacular long-exposure photographs. And, he said, he is far from unique. "You've got a lot of tinkerers" among the astronaut corps, he said.

Historically, Mr. Pettit said, NASA engineers on the ground have resisted the idea of astronauts fixing things in space, and have tried to make systems redundant so repairs won't be necessary. When he was on the space station, he recalled, he overcame engineers' doubts by repairing his wristwatch. "All of a sudden, they let me fix things" that were not originally intended to be repaired in space, like a broken freezer that was used for science experiments, he said.

Dr. Jeffrey A. Hoffman, a former astronaut who has a doctorate in astrophysics and teaches aerospace engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was in on the selection of several astronaut classes before leaving the space agency in 1997. As the science component of missions grew, they brought in more Ph.D.'s; later, as station construction loomed large, they selected more engineers and people with operational experience.

Any construction worker hired to go into orbit would be hard pressed to meet the other demands of the job and the complexity of the equipment, he said. "You can't just give somebody a space suit and tell him, 'Go build a space station,' " he said.

In any case, he said, it's too late for that. With the shuttle program set to be wound down by 2010 and the next generation of space vehicles years away, he said, "I think it will be a while before we select any new astronauts."

Governor's Race Tight (BSUN)

By Andrew A. Green, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 24, 2006

Poll shows O'Malley holding a slight lead over Ehrlich

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is maintaining his lead over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. in the race for Maryland governor, a new poll for The Sun shows, having countered a barrage of critical commercials expected to intensify over the six weeks until Election Day.

Still, Ehrlich, a Republican seeking re-election, remains a popular figure in a state where Democrats outnumber the GOP by about 2-to-1. Voters give Ehrlich and O'Malley - both 40-something telegenic politicians - about equal marks on leadership and ability to move the state forward, suggesting that the contest could wind up very close.

O'Malley, a Democrat, has a 6-percentage-point lead among likely voters, 50 percent to 44 percent, about the same margin he held over the Republican incumbent in July. But it is a much smaller advantage than the double-digit leads he held last year before Ehrlich began campaigning in earnest.

"This campaign should be neck-and-neck in November," said Keith Haller, the president of Potomac Inc., which conducted the Sun poll.

The statewide survey of 815 likely voters was conducted Sept. 15 through Sept. 18, and has a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points. The survey reveals underlying trends and perceptions that offer signs of encouragement for both campaigns.

Four years ago, Democrats lost the governorship for the first time in 36 years, when Ehrlich defeated former Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. But voters say they have more confidence in Democrats to handle state problems than they did when Ehrlich took office - a positive sign for O'Malley.

In a Sun survey in January 2003, state voters said Republicans were better able than Democrat to handle state issues by 41 percent to 39 percent. But since then, support for Ehrlich's party has steadily slipped, and support for O'Malley's has steadily gained.

Now 49 percent of voters think Democrats are well-equipped to handle problems, compared with 35 percent for Republicans, a 16-point swing in four years.

Richard Crane, a 57-year-old O'Malley supporter from Essex, said he sees the mayor trying to tackle the problems important to the middle class, and calls Ehrlich fixated about legalizing slot machines.

DOJ_NMG_0068313

"Yeah, there are some retirees who take their quarters once a month and go to Dover Downs, but how much money is going out of state because people are moving because of high taxes, crime and poor schools?" said Crane, who voted for Townsend in 2002. "Those are the problems that Ehrlich should be addressing, and he's not, and those are the problems that I see O'Malley addressing."

But despite the surge for Democrats, the poll shows that Ehrlich remains largely untouched by the problems his party faces.

The Bush effect Although President Bush has seen some improvement in his standing nationally, he remains profoundly unpopular in Maryland, with 34 percent of voters approving of his performance and 59 percent disapproving.

That hasn't rubbed off on Ehrlich, despite O'Malley's nearly constant attempts to link the governor with the president.

Ehrlich's job approval rating isn't as good as it was early in his term, and it has slipped by 6 points since July, largely because of an erosion of support among Democrats. But now, as throughout his entire term, a majority of voters - 51 percent - think Ehrlich is doing a good job. The poll found that 38 percent disapprove.

Allan Hess, a 58-year-old Democrat from Cockeysville, said he disapproves of Bush because of the Iraq war but said that has nothing to do with Ehrlich.

Hess, who works at the Johns Hopkins medical campus in East Baltimore, said he's not impressed with O'Malley's performance in the city, especially on crime and schools, and thinks Ehrlich is a more solid leader.

"He's a really good speaker, and he's addressed some of the issues, maybe not to my full liking, but at least there's a plan there that's solid," said Hess, who voted for Ehrlich in 2002. "Martin O'Malley has a plan to do this and this, but how are you going to pay for it? It reminds me of the Richard Nixon-era 'I have a plan to get out of Vietnam' but no specifics."

O'Malley has the solid support of his party's base. Liberals back him overwhelmingly - 81 percent to 11 percent - and Democrats back him by a 70 percent to 19 percent margin.

Moderate support But he also retains a 15 percentage point lead among moderate voters, the sort who abandoned the Democratic Party to support Ehrlich in 2002.

Another positive sign for the mayor is that he holds a 17 percentage point lead among frequent voters, the ones most likely to come to the polls if turnout is low, as it was in this month's primary.

Lester Sussman, 80, a poll respondent from Mount Washington, said he voted for Ehrlich in 2002 but plans to vote for O'Malley this year.

"He had an unenviable task in the city," Sussman said. "I don't think anyone could overcome something like that."

"It's more that I dislike Ehrlich. ... I don't like the way he stuffed the [Public Service Commission,]" Sussman said, referring to discontent over how the governor's appointees handled this year's BGE rate increase.

Ehrlich has solid support from his base, too. Even after pitching himself as a centrist and emphasizing in his campaign moderate- and liberal-friendly policies such as support for stem cell research and tighter air pollution rules, the governor retains the strong support of Republicans and conservatives. Likely voters who identify themselves as conservatives back Ehrlich 73 percent to 19 percent, and Republicans support him by an 81 percent to 12 percent spread.

Timothy Lang, 49, a construction company owner from Glen Burnie, rates Ehrlich's job performance as "not perfect, but not bad." The conservative Republican said deciding to vote for the governor is a no-brainer.

"He's a Republican, a conservative," Lang said, whereas O'Malley "toots a horn that don't deserve to be tooted."

The gubernatorial match-up results stand in contrast to the increasing confidence Ehrlich and his aides have displayed in recent days. They have repeatedly insisted that the governor is now leading in his internal polls and have even claimed that O'Malley's private surveys show the same thing. The mayor's campaign has said that's not true.

Echoes of 2002 On the campaign trail, Ehrlich has sought to frame this election as a repeat of the 2002 contest. Although he's the incumbent, he pitches himself as an insurgent campaigner, a change agent to break up the "Democratic monopoly" in Annapolis. On the stump, he tells supporters that the race is breaking for him, just as the 2002 campaign did.

"What you feel is actually happening," Ehrlich told the crowd that surrounded him at the Frederick County Fair last week. "We have the opportunity to win this race not close. We have the opportunity to have this race called at 8:01 p.m. on election night. That's where all the trend lines are going."

DOJ_NMG_0068314

But the Sun poll shows signs that this race is not unfolding for Ehrlich as the last one did. In 2002, Ehrlich was a relatively unknown congressman whose candidacy caught fire as doubts about Townsend began to take root. Within a few months, Ehrlich had erased a 27-percentage point deficit and brought the race to a dead heat by this point in the election cycle.

In part, that's because his base in the Baltimore suburbs, the crucial swing area in the 2002 race, isn't as strong as it was then. His approval ratings show he remains popular in the suburbs, but so far that isn't translating into the kind of advantage over O'Malley he enjoyed over Townsend.

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger, the former Baltimore County executive and a strong O'Malley supporter, said before the poll was taken that the one key indicator of this race is how the candidates are doing in Baltimore County, Ehrlich's home jurisdiction, where he won almost his entire margin of victory in 2002.

Last time, Ruppersberger said, Ehrlich won the county by more than 20 percentage points. If he wins by only 10 this time, Ruppersberger said, he will lose the race.

Ehrlich said at a recent campaign stop that his goal for the county is 60 percent - "The first lady says 65," he joked. But the Sun poll shows he's now leading there by just 5 percentage points, 46 percent to 41 percent. At this point in 2002, the Sun poll found he was leading in the county 58 percent to 31 percent.

The new poll shows Ehrlich and O'Malley are in a statistical tie in the Baltimore region, which includes Baltimore, Anne Arundel, Howard, Carroll and Harford counties - as well as the city. Apart from Baltimore City, Ehrlich carried each of those jurisdictions by wide margins in 2002.

Voters gave a strong indication of how close the election could be when presented with a series of head-to-head comparisons about the skills and ideas Ehrlich and O'Malley bring to the race. On every one, the two were within a few points of each other or in a tie.

Leadership Ehrlich got a narrow edge on which candidate is a leader, 44 percent to 41 percent, and he tied O'Malley - 40 percent to 40 percent - on a question of who would best be able to improve public schools.

Voters usually give Democrats higher marks on education, but this figure suggests that questions about the city school system, which have been a centerpiece of the Ehrlich campaign, give the Republican an unusual opening on the issue. However, the numbers also show that the governor's focus on city schools in speeches and television ads in the last two months has done little to sway voters' perceptions; in July, O'Malley led in this measure by 5 points.

The mayor has a slight lead on the question of which candidate is more innovative or has better ideas, 44 percent to 39 percent, and on which candidate shares the voter's values, 43 percent to 39 percent.

On the question of which one is better able to move the state forward - which both campaigns have spent their time trying to answer for voters - they are essentially tied: O'Malley 44, Ehrlich 43.

James Elliot, 84, a retiree from Lutherville who voted for Ehrlich in 2002, said his decision this year is going to be a tough call.

"I think he's a good man," Elliot said of O'Malley.

And what about Ehrlich?

"I think he's a pretty good man, too," Elliot said.

Crist Has Slim Edge Over Davis In Poll (FLSUNSEN)

By Mark Hollis, Tallahassee Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 24, 2006

TALLAHASSEE · Republican Charlie Crist leads Democrat Jim Davis by 6 points in the latest South Florida Sun-Sentinel poll on the governor's race, but undecided voters who favor Davis on key issues could drive the contest even closer.

With roughly six weeks remaining until the Nov. 7 election, only 7 percent of Florida's likely voters are undecided. Crist and running mate, Jeff Kottkamp, would get votes from 49 percent of those polled. Davis and his running mate, Daryl Jones, are favored by 43 percent, while other candidates in the race collectively get approval from 1 percent of those sampled.

Davis, a Tampa congressman, could make up ground on Crist, the state's attorney general, by stressing education themes to appeal to undecided "independents," blacks and women, the poll shows. Many of those voters are leaning toward Davis' stance on public school policies.

And many black voters, the poll reveals, are energized by Davis' selection of a lieutenant governor running mate who is black.

"There's no question that this race can tighten, and it probably will tighten," said pollster Del Ali. "The real silver lining for Davis" is that voters still don't know much about him. Davis' name recognition is low, with 59 percent of voters overall saying they don't even have an opinion about him.

"Davis has a lot more room to grow for people to view him favorably," Ali said. "Once they view him favorably, they can turn into his votes."

Those potential votes could come from people like poll respondent Marcia Suarez, 44, a Boca Raton Republican who is undecided. "I like Crist. I tend to vote Republican, because they are usually tougher. But I'd consider a Democrat."

The statewide telephone survey of 600 likely voters was conducted Sept. 18-20 for the Sun-Sentinel and Florida Times Union by Maryland-based Research 2000. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent.

Crist is favored heavily by Republicans and slightly by independents, who will be key in the final weeks of the race. Independents comprise one-fifth of the likely turnout, and 10 percent of them are undecided. The rest favor Crist by 6 points.

Black voters, who traditionally align with Democratic candidates, comprise about 12 percent of the electorate. Twenty-two percent of blacks surveyed are undecided in the governor's race. And women are favoring Davis by 3 percentage points, with 8 percent of them still unsure.

The poll confirms that Davis has already helped himself draw support from blacks by selecting Jones as his running mate. Jones would become the first black lieutenant governor in state history.

Most voters say the running mate selection doesn't make a difference as to whom they'll pick for governor. But for blacks this year, it seems to matter. Without being told by pollsters that Jones is black, 56 percent of blacks surveyed said they are more likely to back Davis for having selected Jones. By comparison, 63 percent of all voters say the running mate selection doesn't affect their decision.

Even more important for Davis, independents, blacks and women all are indicating they are more compatible with Democrats when it comes to education policies, which voters overwhelmingly say is their top concern for the state.

More than a third of the independents agree with Davis in saying that Florida isn't spending enough on public schools. And by a 2-to-1 margin, they reject the state's FCAT, the importance of which Davis says he would downgrade. Crist says he would continue to depend on the Florida Comprehensive Assessment Test for grading schools, and student and teacher performance.

"[Davis] has an easier time [appealing] to independents based on where the candidates stand on the issues, such as education, more so than Crist," said Ali.

Anti-incumbency sentiments and opposition to President Bush are high nationwide and could pose a challenge for Crist, Ali said, if voters begin to link him too closely to national Republican leadership. But so far, Ali said, the poll shows Florida voters largely approve of the president's younger brother, Republican Gov. Jeb Bush, giving Crist insulation from this year's anti-incumbent, anti-George Bush surge.

Three other state offices -- attorney general, chief financial officer and agriculture commissioner -- are too close to call at this stage. The possibility remains, though, according to the poll, that the Florida Cabinet this year could switch from all-Republican to all-Democratic, which could have enormous implications for various state policies dealing with matters ranging from insurance regulation to environmental land purchases.

The attorney general's race featuring Democrat Walter "Skip" Campbell, a state senator from Broward County, and Republican Bill McCollum, a former congressman from Orlando, shows signs of being very tight on election night. Nineteen percent of voters are undecided in that race, with McCollum holding a 42-39 percent lead.

The chief financial officer battle includes a woman, Democrat Alex Sink of Tampa, against Republican Tom Lee, the current president of the Florida Senate. Lee is leading by a 10-point margin over Sink, with 16 percent of the voters undecided. So far, the poll doesn't indicate a gender gap, the pollster said, with Lee leading likely because of his better name recognition.

Incumbent Republican Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson hadn't been expected to face much of a challenge. But in the poll, he leads Democrat Eric Copeland by only a slight margin, with a fifth of the voters undecided.

Swann Has Trouble Catching On (PPG)

By Tracie Mauriello, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 24, 2006

CAMPAIGN 2006 / Governor's Race

HARRISBURG -- You already know him as a football star and sportscaster.

Now there's another role Lynn Swann wants to play: governor.

It's a job subject to more Monday-morning quarterbacking, less celebrity and lower pay than Mr. Swann had in the NFL, but he's willing to take it on just the same.

Mr. Swann is a football Hall of Famer whose name appears on eight Trivial Pursuit game cards. And he commands more than $30,000 an event for his work as a motivational speaker.

The quest to take over the governor's office isn't about fame or money, he says. It's about reforming a state where, Mr. Swann says, taxes are too high, access to decision-makers is too limited and public money is spent too freely.

Mr. Swann says his interest in running for office was sparked by the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"Sept. 11 created in me more of a drive to find ways to serve at a new level," Mr. Swann said. His interest was reinforced a year later when he became chairman of the President's Council of Physical Fitness and Sports and in 2004 when he served as a campaign volunteer for President Bush's re-election campaign.

"Add to that a strong feeling that our state is moving in the wrong direction," Mr. Swann said. "That's what made me think about whether I wanted to seek the office of the governor of Pennsylvania."

He began discussing his ambitions with high-ranking Republicans such as Senate President Pro Tempore Robert Jubelirer, R-Altoona, who helped him secure the party nomination at a time when the GOP needed a visible, credible candidate to face a popular incumbent.

Polls show that defeating Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell, an experienced politician with wide support, will be an uphill battle, steeper than the GOP anticipated during nominating season last winter.

Six weeks before the election, Mr. Rendell has a double-digit lead, according to separate polls released Thursday.

The Keystone Poll by Franklin & Marshall College puts Mr. Rendell's support at 54 percent to Mr. Swann's 34 percent. The IssuesPA/Pew poll put Mr. Rendell farther ahead, 58 percent to 30 percent.

"In the early part of the year, the party saw the potential for Swann to really energize voters with his celebrity and his personable characteristics, and that he would be someone much more competitive at this point," said Christopher Borick, professor of political science at Muhlenberg College

Matthew Woessner, assistant professor of public policy at Penn State Harrisburg, agreed.

"Frankly, I thought Swann was going to be a formidable candidate and I'm very surprised that he hasn't caught on. My best sense is that there is no substitute for an experienced, thoughtful, seasoned politician like Rendell," he said. "As charismatic and intelligent and substantive as Swann is, he is going up against a master politician."

Mr. Swann says he isn't discouraged. A series of television commercials launched this month, relatively late in the campaign season, ought to help, he said.

He's counting on a decline in Mr. Rendell's poll numbers, spurred by renewed voter anger over the now-repealed pay-raise law, which the governor supported. The issue came back into the spotlight recently after the state Supreme Court ruled that the pay-raise repeal did not apply to judges.

With six weeks before Election Day, Mr. Swann needs whatever help he can get, whether by spikes in his own popularity or declines in Mr. Rendell's.

Win or lose Nov. 7, Mr. Swann's candidacy alone helps the GOP, Dr. Woesser and Dr. Borick said.

DOJ_NMG_0068317

"I'm sure there are people in the party that do not have real optimism that he's going to be able to unseat Rendell, and they're not looking at him in terms of what effect he's going to have on the rest of the ticket," Dr. Borick said. "If he can energize the Republican base, who are more likely to vote straight ticket, other candidates might get a little bit of a push from that."

Celebrity's two sides

Mr. Swann has the kind of name recognition that no amount of campaign dollars can buy, yet he is hampered by the difficulty some have in seeing him as anything other than a jock.

Even people who idolize Mr. Swann for his athletic prowess aren't necessarily aware of his political ambition.

Longtime fan Jeff Kaliner, of Wilkes-Barre, for example, walked past four or five Swann campaign signs at La Festa, Scranton's Labor Day weekend Italian festival, and still didn't realize that the "Swann" written on the signs referred to the football giant.

"I kept seeing these signs, but I didn't even think about it. I didn't realize they meant him," said Mr. Kaliner, who felt faint after shaking Mr. Swann's hand at the festival.

"Somebody hold me up. I'm in shock. This is the best thing ever," he said.

Observers say Mr. Swann's celebrity is both an asset and a hindrance as he runs his campaign.

"A lot of people see him as their football hero," Dr. Borick said. "It draws people to him and gets him attention, but it also creates a wall he has to get over to say, 'Thank you for remembering me as a football star but, in the end, I'm running on my ability to lead as a political figure.' "

That's tough for fans to grasp, even when Mr. Swann is accompanied by an entourage carrying campaign signs.

For a moment at La Festa, it looked as if Mr. Swann had gained ground when a worker at Kay's Pizza booth wished him luck.

"I'm hoping to turn it in a different direction now," Mr. Swann said.

"Yeah, I know," the pizza maker replied. "I'm hoping it'll be against the Cowboys this year."

Mr. Swann nodded and kept walking. As campaign season has progressed, Mr. Swann has limited his time with sports fans to give it more freely to people who stop him to ask about his politics.

"His celebrity got him into the race and helped clear the field for him, but it isn't enough," Dr. Borick said.

That's fine with Mr. Swann's supporters, who say he's got plenty more than football fame going for him.

"Everyone focuses on his celebrity. What they don't focus on is what it took to achieve that," former Lt. Gov. Bill Scranton said.

"He started from very humble beginnings. You don't achieve what he has without a lot of grit and determination," said Mr. Scranton, who sought the Republican gubernatorial nomination last year but backed out after Mr. Swann emerged in February as the party favorite.

"It wasn't a personal contest. It was about who could best deliver the message, and he won that contest. I completely support Lynn Swann," Mr. Scranton said. "He and I want the same things."

Pushing tax reductions

Those things include fiscally responsible government, lower taxes, fewer government regulations on farmers and an end to the state's tax on inherited property.

One major part of the platform is a plan to create a system of taxing property by tying payments to a home's purchase price instead of its assessed value. He also wants to prohibit tax increases exceeding the rate of inflation.

"We want a system that's fair and equitable, where you can predict your taxes 10 years from now," Mr. Swann said. "The predictability is as much a sense of relief as anything."

Tax reductions would be offset by budget surpluses, gambling revenue and savings from requiring school employees to enroll in a consolidated statewide benefits program. If that isn't enough to cover, Mr. Swann would dip into the general fund.

Critics from the Rendell camp say the plan is unworkable.

There isn't enough money to cover the reductions promised by Mr. Swann, at least $150 per homeowner in the first year, said Mr. Rendell's campaign spokesman, Dan Fee.

DOJ_NMG_0068318

"Where is the money coming from if there isn't a surplus? There's not a big percentage of the budget you can whack because a lot of it is linked to federal mandates," Mr. Fee said. "Their plan doesn't work."

Someone with no political experience, Mr. Fee said, is not a good choice for governor of a large state with a $26 billion budget.

"He's simply unqualified," he said. "Being governor isn't just about making speeches. It's about making progress."

Even some of Mr. Swann's former teammates lack confidence in his abilities to govern.

"He's very bright, he's very articulate and he is hardworking ... but he is a novice to the political government arena," said former Steeler Dwight White, a lifelong Democrat who supports Mr. Rendell.

"There are some things you can only learn through experience and time. There are exceptions to that rule, but I don't know if I'm willing to toss the dice," Mr. White said. "It's not a personal thing. I like Lynn Swann."

Mr. Swann's supporters say his lack of political experience is an asset because he is not beholden to legislators and lobbyists.

"He's not politically connected and he has no agenda. His freshness and newness are huge assets," said longtime friend Gary Brown, a Mt. Lebanon businessman.

"It's not like he's totally unaware of what would happen when he arrives in Harrisburg. He knows the issues and his fresh approach would be welcomed," said Mr. Brown, who met Mr. Swann shortly after the Steelers drafted the wide receiver in 1974.

Since then, Mr. Swann has gotten married, played on four Super Bowl-winning teams, had two children, been a spokesman for a company that makes fibers for sleeping bags, hosted the game show "To Tell the Truth," danced on stage with Gene Kelly and, to the amusement of friends like Mr. Brown, who know of his aversion to cold weather, covered the Iditarod Dog Sled Race in Alaska.

"Just because you're a success at one career doesn't mean you can't transfer those skills and do something else. Being an athlete and having a career in sports doesn't disqualify you from having success in other fields," Mr. Swann said. "I'm not just an athlete."

True.

He also is a TV actor, appearing on episodes of "Family Matters" and "The Paper Chase;" a motivational speaker; a businessman; a former national spokesman for Big Brothers Big Sisters of America; and a board member for H.J. Heinz Co. and Hershey Entertainment and Resorts.

Mr. Swann said his work and volunteer experience helped him hone skills that will transfer easily to the governor's office.

During about 25 years volunteering as national spokesman of Philadelphia-based Big Brothers Big Sisters, he learned about the plight of poor children in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, said Judy Vredenburgh, the organization's chief operating officer.

"With that insight and with his understanding of what people's needs and motivations are, his policies will make a huge difference for kids," Ms. Vredenburgh said.

Early life lessons

At age 12, young Lynn defied his mother, Mildred, who did not want her youngest boy to play a rough-and-tumble sport like football. He sneaked out, anyway, and joined his older brother at tryouts for Pop Warner football. Both made the team.

"My mother let me play, but she said, 'If you're going to play, you can't quit,' " Mr. Swann said. "Now, we had a Marine-drill-sergeant type coach who made us do pushups with weighted vests and run laps."

There were times, he said, that he thought about quitting, but that wasn't an option in the Swann family.

"My mom felt that if I was going to be doing something, I needed to be out there doing it fully. My mom always said, 'Don't give up,' " he said.

He didn't give up then, and he won't now, despite being down in the polls and in fund raising, he says.

"I'm trying to get the job done and I will push as hard as I can," said Swann, who has crisscrossed the state, making campaign appearances at a seemingly exhausting pace.

"I don't think about whether it's hard or easy. I just do what has to be done," he said.

Angelides Puts Iraq On Table (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The gubernatorial candidate says he would immediately seek the Guard's withdrawal.

In a move to bolster his appeal among Democrats, state Treasurer Phil Angelides said Saturday night that on his first day as governor, he would call on President Bush to withdraw California's National Guard troops from the war in Iraq.

The Democratic nominee for governor said in a telephone interview that he would take court action against Bush if necessary to extract the state's National Guard members from Iraq. He said he would also urge other governors and members of Congress to join his effort.

"I will do everything in my power as governor of the state of California to bring our National Guard troops home," Angelides said.

At a Democratic primary debate in May, Angelides said governors lack the power to force the Pentagon to send a state's National Guard troops home from the war. But in the interview Saturday night, he said there might be some legal leeway on the matter.

Angelides said roughly 1,700 California National Guard troops are stationed in Iraq, but the number could not be verified on Saturday night. He also said he would not call for the withdrawal of several hundred California National Guard troops deployed in Afghanistan.

Earlier this year, Angelides opposed Bush's request to put other National Guard troops on the border with Mexico. Schwarzenegger agreed to send 1,300 Guard members there but refused a later Bush administration request for more border troops. The governor has maintained control over troops requested for border missions but not those sent to Iraq.

The treasurer, who is trailing Schwarzenegger in the polls with little more than six weeks left before the election, plans to lay out his views on California's National Guard deployment in Iraq in speeches in San Francisco and Burbank on Tuesday and then in Sacramento on Thursday, aides said. The Angelides offensive on Iraq is part of his effort to remind voters of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Republican roots and his support for Bush's reelection.

"Schwarzenegger has let our troops down by not speaking out against the war," Angelides said in the interview.

On NBC's "Meet the Press" in February, Schwarzenegger defended Bush's decision to invade Iraq.

"I think that we had to go in," he said. "There was a threat of terrorism. I think that it was the right thing to do."

The United States, he added, needed "to get out as quickly as possible, but also in a sensible way."

As for the state's National Guard troops, Schwarzenegger said he was not concerned that the Iraq deployment would leave California with too few to deal with an earthquake, flood or other natural disaster.

In response to Angelides' remarks on Saturday, Schwarzenegger campaign spokesman Matt David suggested voters would see the move as a campaign ploy. "California voters know the difference between a governor and a president," David said. "If Angelides wants to run for president, he should be spending more time at the Iowa state fair and less time in California union halls."

The move comes at a time of major difficulties for Angelides. He has trailed Schwarzenegger in raising money, and his main benefactor, organized labor, has yet to spend heavily on his campaign. Schwarzenegger, meanwhile, has made inroads among Democrats and independents.

Angelides faces a tough challenge in making the war in Iraq a decisive topic in the gubernatorial campaign. Public opinion surveys have found that California voters rate education, immigration and other matters as more important issues for the state to address.

But the war is a central focus of the national battle for control of Congress in the Nov. 7 midterm election. It is also one of the main reasons that the national political climate has soured for Republicans. With low turnout widely projected in the California election, Angelides is counting on that national environment to drive more Democrats to the polls, along with the independents who often side with them.

Angelides is also banking on a low turnout among Schwarzenegger's political base of conservatives, some of whom have been irked by his deals with Democratic lawmakers on vast public works bonds and other matters.

"It's going to be who has the most energized base at the end of the day, and that's where we're going to concentrate our efforts," Angelides media strategist Bill Carrick said in an interview last week.

In July, a Field Poll survey found 58% of Californians want the U.S. to withdraw all or some of its troops from Iraq. The poll also found that 67% disapprove of Bush's handling of the war and 61% disapprove of his overall job performance.

The most recent wave of Angelides television advertising is a Democratic Party spot that shows Schwarzenegger campaigning for Bush in Ohio, a crucial 2004 swing state, and mentions the troops in Iraq.

Akaka Takes Early Lead In Hawaii Primary (AP-Y)

By Mark Niesse, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Liberal incumbent Sen. Daniel Akaka held an early lead Saturday night over upstart challenger Rep. Ed Case in the Democratic primary after absentee ballots and early votes were released.

Akaka was leading 56.4 percent to 43.6 percent after 84,088 votes were counted. The figures do not include any votes cast Saturday.

Akaka had 47,446 votes compared to Case's 36,642.

Akaka, 82, has served in Congress for 30 years and drew on his experience to boost his candidacy.

Case, 53, tried to convince voters that Hawaii needs to elect a younger, more moderate senator.

Democrats Set To Air Ads In Bid To Derail Steele (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's assertive campaign for U.S. Senate since the Sept. 12 primary has prompted national Democrats to start running attack ads sooner than they had planned.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee originally bought $1 million worth of TV time for the two weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 general election, then decided to start running ads Tuesday, according to the Steele campaign.

"This is a clear indication of the national Democratic Party bosses' scramble to maintain control over Maryland," said Michael Leavitt, campaign manager for Mr. Steele, a Republican.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic committee did not return phone calls, but has said he will not comment on strategic decisions in the campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who defeated Kweisi Mfume in the Democratic primary.

Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, says the Democrats' strategy against him was revealed as early as last spring when an internal party memo was leaked to the press.

The memo called Mr. Steele, 47, a "unique threat" to black voters' loyalty to Democrats and advised Maryland Democrats to begin a "persuasion campaign ... as soon as possible to discredit Steele as a viable candidate for the community."

"Connecting Steele to national Republicans ... can turn Steele into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African American candidate," the memo stated.

Mr. Steele also points to the illegal theft of his credit report by a Democratic committee staffer a year ago, before he had declared his candidacy. The staffer pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor in federal court and was sentenced to community service.

"The fact that they had to steal it speaks to the fear that they have of my campaign," Mr. Steele said recently. "Quite frankly, the only way they think they can beat me is to, as they said in their own memo, denigrate and demonize me."

Mr. Cardin, 62, rarely attacked Mr. Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, whom he defeated by three percentage points.

But the congressman from Baltimore has been following the Democratic memo's advice by attacking Mr. Steele for supporting President Bush's policies.

"We can't allow this seat just to be another vote for President Bush," Mr. Cardin said in a speech in Catonsville last week.

The state Democratic Party has set up a Web site called "The Real Steele" that has multiple pictures of Mr. Steele on stage with Mr. Bush at a fundraiser last year.

DOJ_NMG_0068321

The latest Steele TV ad, in which Mr. Steele warns voters that critics will go as far as accusing him of not liking puppies is intended to blunt the effect of such criticisms and images.

"Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd -- grainy pictures and spooky music saying 'Steele hates puppies' and worse," Mr. Steele says in the ad. He then pauses and says playfully, "For the record, I love puppies."

The ad was created by Brad Todd at On Message Inc., in Alexandria, after a conversation with Mr. Steele, who came up with the puppy idea. Mr. Todd is partners with Alex Castellanos, a longtime media consultant to the Republican Party.

Mr. Steele also has held several campaign events aimed at cutting into Mr. Cardin's built-in support among black voters in Baltimore.

The day after the primary, Mr. Steele stopped for a haircut in the primarily black section of Baltimore's Park Heights neighborhood.

Mr. Cardin, who is white and Jewish, has represented the neighborhood, which includes a section to the north that is heavily Jewish, for 20 years.

Mr. Steele told the crowd outside the barbershop, "When I go to the United States Senate, I will represent both sides of Park Heights. You're going with me to Washington."

Mr. Mfume's son, Christopher, attended a rally in Baltimore last week for Mr. Steele, and endorsed his candidacy.

The Steele campaign has also criticized Mr. Cardin after a staffer was discovered Sept. 15 to have posted racist and anti-Semitic comments on an online blog. The unidentified staffer has since been fired.

Sen. Burns, Tester Debate In Montana (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns accused his Democratic challenger Saturday of wanting to raise taxes and weaken the U.S. Patriot Act, but brushed off allegations of ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Jon Tester, locked in a tight race with the three-term incumbent, blasted Burns during their debate for running up the federal deficit and claimed he has lost touch with Montana.

Burns didn't answer a question asking for details on his staff's relationship with Abramoff, saying the allegations are being trumped up by Democrats for political gain.

"There we go again — baseless allegations drummed up in a negative campaign that started almost a year and a half ago. We have answered those questions," Burns said. "What does that do for jobs in Butte, Montana? What does it do for jobs in any part of the state of Montana?"

Tester has made ethics a campaign centerpiece, and invoked Abramoff's name several times during the debate.

"You have to have honest leadership, someone who will go to Washington and fight for you," Tester said. "I won't sell Montana down the road by cutting deals with lobbyists like Jack Abramoff."

They also disagreed sharply on the U.S. Patriot Act. Burns said it is needed to intercept calls placed to known terrorist phone numbers and gives law enforcement the same tools they use to fight organized crime.

"I don't think Mr. Tester understands this enemy," Burns said. "We cannot afford another 9/11. I can tell you that right now. He wants to weaken the Patriot Act."

Tester said the Patriot Act is eroding the very freedoms the terrorists are trying to take from Americans.

"Let me be clear. I don't want to weaken the Patriot Act. I want to get rid of it," Tester said.

During a Sept. 10 debate, a raucous crowd heckled and jeered Burns, forcing him to cut short his statements. This time ushers at Butte's Mother Lode Theater were on hand to keep the crowd under control and applause was banned until the end.

Fueling The Fire (NYT)

By Deirdre Mcnamer

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Missoula, Mont.

DOJ_NMG_0068322

THIS state, in recent years, has gained a new season, and it's not one we like very much. High summer and early autumn as Montanans used to know them — bright, clean-edged and wild-yonder-blue — have given way to the sooty skies, red moons and general unease of fire season.

Runaway fire makes anyone edgy, even when you're not in its path or even very near by. And if you're in a neck-and-neck race for the United States Senate, you're not the soul of serenity to begin with.

Witness the Republican incumbent, Conrad Burns, toward the beginning of fire season in late July, when he gave an impromptu tongue-lashing to a team of firefighters at the Billings airport who were on their way back home to Virginia after a week on a 92,000-acre fire in southern Montana. Senator Burns told them they had done a rotten job and later said that the crew "didn't do a goddamned thing" and that they just "sit around."

Not the most politic remarks he could have made as he began to defend himself in earnest against a stiff challenge for his seat from a Democrat, Jon Tester, whose mantra is that Mr. Burns has lost touch with "Montana values," like defending the ordinary guy who's doing a hard, hot job.

Senator Burns apologized for his maladroit remarks and said he should have gone to higher-ups with any beefs he or some of his rancher constituency had with the way the fire had been managed. And he later sponsored an amendment to a military spending bill that bolstered federal firefighting dollars.

But the race heated up, and the incendiary remarks continued to fly. Mr. Burns lost the Montana cab-driver vote when he remarked that the country is up against a "faceless" enemy, terrorists who "drive taxicabs in the daytime and kill at night."

Nor has Mr. Tester kept foot out of mouth; in telling a reporter about the faith he has in his staff, he said, "Nobody has done anything to make me think they're trying to tomahawk me," a verb that delighted the state Republican Party spokesman, who said it denigrated American Indians, the state's largest minority group.

By the time the candidates convened for their second debate two weeks ago, even the audience seemed atypically fired-up for a Montana crowd that wasn't watching a sporting event in the strict sense of the term. The debate was held in Hamilton, in the Bitterroot Valley near the Idaho border, where forest fires had periodically been sending smoke hither and yon. As the candidates jousted, the crowd booed Mr. Burns and someone shouted "psycho" at him, and then a Burns supporter chastised the booers for rudeness.

Mr. Burns, who received more money from the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff than any other member of Congress, accused Mr. Tester of being an unaccountable "lawbreaker" in his fund-raising practices. (He mentioned a $7,000 "slush fund" that Mr. Tester used for gas and meals on the campaign trail, and which the state's political practices' commissioner has said is legal.) The senator also accused Mr. Tester of failing to "report" a trade-mission trip he took to Taiwan as president of the State Senate.

In turn, Mr. Tester reeled off a longish list of Senator Burns's trips, including 10 to Las Vegas, as well as the names of the multinational corporations from which the senator has taken money. And so on, and so forth.

A good time was sort of had by some.

After the debate Mr. Tester drove up to Missoula for a block party I also attended. The suggested donation was $35, which didn't do a lot to erase Mr. Tester's financial disadvantage. (Senator Burns had raised $7 million to the Tester campaign's $1.5 million as of June 30.) It's a margin that's going to play out on the airwaves. "You're going to hear a lot of things that aren't true," he said with a weary grin. "Of course, all our ads will be the truth."

The crowd cheered. Smoke had cleared from the skies the day before, and September looked the way it was supposed to look if it wasn't fire season. But it still was. And everyone in both camps knew it was going to get a lot hotter, and a lot smokier, before it was over.

Fla. GOP Activists Show Harris Some Love (AP-Y)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Days after President Bush flew into the state and complimented U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, the congresswoman got some more love — this time from GOP activists at a rally Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0068323

It was one of the bright spots for Harris, whom party leaders had previously tried to force out of the U.S. Senate race before she won the GOP primary. She will face Democrat incumbent Bill Nelson in the November election.

State party Chair Carole Jean Jordan called Harris a hero, a term many Republicans used after Harris, as secretary of state in 2000, oversaw Bush's disputed 537-vote victory.

"Katherine has overcome tough times. She's a gutsy lady and we love her," said Jordan, who tried to get Harris out of the race before the primary.

The women hugged before Harris spoke.

"You have honored me. This race is not about me, it's about you," Harris said. "It's about each and every one of you and the citizens of Florida who deserve far more representation than what Bill Nelson has done. He's squandered these last six years in the United States Senate."

Nelson campaign spokesman Bryan Gulley said Harris was making "unfounded and wild charges."

"The fact is Bill Nelson is one of the most accomplished and successful freshman senators — with some 40 pieces of legislation to his credit," he said. "And he's been instrumental in keeping the oil companies away from the state's coast."

Before Harris won the primary with less than half the vote in a four-way race, Republican leaders in Tallahassee and Washington tried to find a candidate who could defeat her. Gov. Jeb Bush openly said she couldn't win the November general election, and Jordan wrote to her saying the same.

Harris is trailing Nelson by more than 30 points in the polls and by millions of dollars in campaign contributions. She has been tied to a corrupt defense contractor, given embarrassing television interviews and seen top members of her staff quit in frustration.

Also at the rally, Charlie Crist, Florida's Attorney General, took a couple of light shots at his opponent in the closely watched governor's race. Crist drew laughs as he poked fun at Democrat Rep. Jim Davis for having the second-to-worst attendance record for votes in the House while running for governor.

"I'm going to work as hard as I can. I love to work, unlike my opponent," Crist said. "I love to show up for work."

Davis spokesman Josh Earnest said Davis "will work to make things better for Florida families."

"Who's he been working for? He hasn't worked to lower property taxes," he said of Crist. "He hasn't worked to improve schools. He hasn't worked to address the property insurance crisis."

Battle Lines Sharply Drawn Over Iraq War (KCS)

By David Goldstein

The Kansas City Star, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON | Stay the course, or gradually start to pull back in Iraq?

Republican Sen. Jim Talent favors the former. “Complete the mission,” he says.

Missouri Auditor Claire McCaskill, who hopes to unseat Talent on Nov. 7, says American troops should be withdrawn but not “precipitously,” over two years, more or less. She says the American presence is a “crutch” keeping Iraq from making decisions about its future, even as Afghanistan heats up and the region grows more dangerous.

The war and what to do about it mark a deep divide between the candidates. Since fighting began in March 2003, nearly 2,700 U.S. troops have been killed, including nearly 50 from Missouri. Yet the violence has increased in much of Iraq, and earlier hopes that many troops could start to return home have faded.

Voters think the war is the country’s biggest problem, according to recent polls. It has hurt President Bush’s popularity and become a factor in many House and Senate races.

The Kansas City Star spoke to Talent and McCaskill separately about Iraq. | Excerpts from the interviews, A21

My Return To Balance (NYT)

By Robert Hicks

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Franklin, Tenn.

DOJ_NMG_0068324

I LEFT home — and my front-row seat for observing Representative Harold Ford's apparently quixotic effort to take the Senate seat being vacated by Bill Frist — two weeks ago to spend six days crossing the Atlantic by boat and a week using Jefferson's notes to retrace his tour of villages, gardens and great houses of southern England. What a difference a couple of weeks can make.

I returned the other day to polls showing Mr. Ford in a statistical tie with his Republican opponent, Bob Corker. While anywhere else this might not seem like a big deal at this point, Tennessee isn't anywhere else.

When I left, most folks I know, both old-time Southern Democrats and my new Republican neighbors in their McMansions, wouldn't have given the young black liberal from a family that seems always ready to stretch the bounds of propriety much of a chance in a statewide race. Particularly not against Mr. Corker, a very agreeable and successful former mayor of Chattanooga who easily K.O.'ed his more conservative Republican opponents in the primary.

In talking with my neighbors, however, I get the picture that several things are keeping the Ford campaign alive and thriving. Interestingly, most of them are to Mr. Ford's credit, and not the result of missteps by Mr. Corker. Truth is, Mr. Corker is working hard to bring political moderation to his campaign, and is doing a good job.

That said, Harold Ford may just be doing what folks down here thought he could never do. He is emerging as an electable Senate candidate in a state that has been moving deeper and deeper into the Republican ranks. In this, he seems to be emerging as part of that new class of sensible Southern Democrats, along with our Democratic governor, Phil Bredesen, who is coasting to re-election.

The governor has built his base as a fiscal conservative who believes in smaller government. That plays well with both old-line Southern Democrats and new-money Republicans in the Volunteer State. Similarly, Mr. Ford votes a bit like a card-carrying conservative on a few issues. He supported President Bush's No Child Left Behind reforms and optional school prayer. He has also voted to limit the amounts that trial lawyers can walk away with in class-action lawsuits. He is against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions.

On other issues, he has found a way to balance liberal and conservative ideas. On national security, he favors federalizing rules on drivers' licenses as a check on terrorists, although he opposed unwarranted wiretaps. And while in the past he supported most gun-control bills brought before him, Mr. Ford, like most of his fellow Tennesseans, is now a calling himself a "fan of the Second Amendment." All this smacks of balance and reason to a lot of folks. As Rick Warwick, my neighbor down the road and our county historian, told me recently, "You know, Harold Ford is looking more and more like one of us."

After the primaries, everyone assumed that at this point, Mr. Corker would be way ahead in the polls, with the race maybe tightening toward the end. Yet, if Harold Ford can continue to present himself as a "Bredesen Democrat" who believes that less government is often the best government, maybe, just maybe, we will have a real horse race of an election come November.

A Campaign In Crisis Mode (NYT)

By Charles Baxter

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Minneapolis

WHILE my assignment was to write about Minnesota's important Senate race, I think there's more to be learned right now from the far closer contest in Minnesota's Sixth Congressional District, which borders Minneapolis-St. Paul to the east, north and west. The race, between Michele Bachmann, the Republican, and Patty Wetterling, the Democrat, has revealed a Bush-era national trend now visible locally.

That is, we are facing a choice between a "conservative" who wants to institute radical reforms and a "progressive" who wishes largely to maintain the status quo. In Minnesota's Sixth District, liberalism is the new conservatism.

Ms. Bachmann, who was born and raised in Anoka, Garrison Keillor's hometown, is technically a daughter of Lake Wobegon, but there the resemblance ends. She holds a law degree from Oral Roberts University. As a Minnesota state legislator, she spoke out against the minimum wage, arguing that eliminating it would result in universal employment. She became well known for her tireless attempts to add a gay-marriage ban to the state Constitution. She has stated that evolution has a "cult" following. Concerning Iran, she has said, "We should not remove the nuclear response ... from the table." Her favorite topics are not local, but national, global and cosmic.

Somewhat predictably, she draws her support largely from evangelicals. The centrist Republicans I know — those few who are still around — tend to regard her as superficial. President Bush visited Wayzata, Minneapolis's most affluent suburb (though not in the Sixth District) to speak on her behalf. The two are quite in sync.

Having allied herself firmly with the president's policies on Iraq and privatizing Social Security, she also advocates eliminating the estate tax. For supporting these radical reforms she is called an "archconservative," though what she is trying to conserve, other than large family fortunes, is never scrupulously clear.

Compared to Ms. Bachmann, a suburban radical of an increasingly familiar sort, Patty Wetterling seems rather tame and pleasant and sensible — conservative, that is. In the view of Ms. Wetterling (who came into local prominence when her son was abducted at gunpoint and disappeared in 1989) we are not in the end times but in a stable world shaped by well-financed public education, Social Security, benefits for veterans, a decent respect for the opinions of others, a reluctance to engage in foreign adventures, and balanced budgets.

As a former public-school math teacher, Ms. Wetterling has an aura of kindliness and good sense, as if she believed in a general social welfare that depends upon all citizens "joining hands," as a former Republican governor of Minnesota, Elmer L. Andersen, once put it.

But citizens don't join hands much anymore in Minnesota, nor are they encouraged to. The problem faced by politicians who wish to preserve the social programs enacted by their grandparents is that President Bush has been wildly successful at creating an air of constant crisis, both foreign and domestic. Crisis rhetoric, which is inherently radical rather than conservative, dissolves social stability.

In this sense, terrorism has infected every subject and every discussion, even locally. Alarmism has become so ubiquitous in discussions of Iraq, the decline of the family and financing for Social Security and education that polarization is assured. Extremity, after all, is more newsworthy than good sense.

This outlook has the effect of trivializing most local issues — who cares about farm-price supports when radical Muslims want to make Stillwater part of the caliphate? And it ensures that the volume will always be turned up to 11 — at least until everybody begins to suffer crisis fatigue and tries to calm down.

In House Race, Focus Shifts To Security (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

For much of this year, Representative Nancy L. Johnson, a moderate Republican from Connecticut, has run the kind of campaign she has run many times before in this swing district, focusing on domestic issues like health care and taxes, even as she distanced herself from her party's conservative leaders in Congress.

But in recent days, Mrs. Johnson has taken her campaign down a sharply different path, shifting the battle with her Democratic opponent, Christopher S. Murphy, to a new front, national security.

The day after the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Mrs. Johnson began showing a television commercial assailing Mr. Murphy, a state senator, as weak on defense because he has criticized the Bush administration's program of warrantless surveillance.

Then, on Monday, Mrs. Johnson stood alongside Senator John McCain, a prisoner of war in Vietnam and a strong supporter of the war in Iraq, during an appearance in Danbury, Conn., before military veterans.

"The security of our people is my No. 1 priority," she told reporters before the event with Mr. McCain, a Republican of Arizona.

Her campaign has also begun referring to Mr. Murphy as a "Ned Lamont liberal," a pointed reference to the antiwar candidate who defeated Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a vocal supporter of the Iraq war, in the Democratic primary last month. Mr. Lamont won her district with 52 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0068326

It has not always been this way for Mrs. Johnson, who in her 12 terms in Congress — the longest tenure in the state's history — has earned a reputation as a serious policy thinker on health care and social programs.

Democrats say her tactical shift shows that the race has tightened and that she is mounting a negative campaign out of desperation.

But Mrs. Johnson's new focus on terrorism also shows that Republicans believe that national security is still a winning issue for them, even in a state where opposition to the war in Iraq is high, support for President Bush is low and their candidate is far better known for domestic policy.

Polls show that voters, despite qualms about the president and the war, still give Republicans an edge in dealing with terrorism.

Mrs. Johnson's moves coincide with an effort by Mr. Bush to make the case that tough defense policies have made America safer since the 9/11 attacks, but that the threats against the nation remain.

Though Mrs. Johnson has kept her distance from Mr. Bush on other issues, she has begun to echo that message with gusto.

Her district is one of about 40 around the country that are deemed to be in play as the Democrats try to reclaim control of the House this fall.

Underscoring the importance of the race, the National Republican Congressional Committee plans to spend $1.2 million on television advertisements supporting Mrs. Johnson during the final weeks of the race, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to spend $1.8 million to try to defeat her.

The new thrust of the Johnson campaign follows a bruising summer in which Mr. Murphy and at least one prominent liberal group, MoveOn.org Political Action, spent thousands of dollars seeking to portray her as an entrenched member of a Congress with ties to special interest lobbyists.

The Johnson campaign asserts that she has often defied her party's leadership, on issues including drilling for oil in the Alaska National Wildlife Reserve and stem cell research.

It also cites endorsements from organizations like the League of Conservation Voters as evidence of her independence.

Now, though, Republicans say that Mr. Murphy's criticism of the surveillance program has provided a golden opportunity to make the election a choice between two candidates with distinct views on national security and on other issues, instead of a referendum on the currently unpopular Republican-controlled Congress.

There is, of course, some risk for Mrs. Johnson in aligning herself more closely with the president, who in a poll last month by Quinnipiac University received an approval rating below 30 percent in Connecticut. The poll was conducted before the president began his public push on national security.

In an interview, Mrs. Johnson would not discuss the politics driving her decision to put national security at the forefront of her campaign. But again and again, in simple and stark language, she argued that her opponent failed to grasp the gravity of the threat.

"He doesn't understand the need for a tough policy," she said. "I want my constituents to know that the threat is real."

Under the surveillance program, the government, without warrants, has monitored the international communications of people in the United States.

The Johnson campaign has asserted that Mr. Murphy would force the government to go through the time-consuming process of getting a court order before wiretapping communications involving suspected terrorists.

Mr. Murphy has responded that the Johnson campaign is trying to distort his position, which he said would not cause delays in monitoring suspected terrorists. The Bush administration, he said, was violating the law by circumventing existing procedures, which allow the attorney general to authorize the emergency use of electronic surveillance provided that he subsequently seeks court authorization within 72 hours.

The campaign debate is so fierce that only an hour after Mrs. Johnson's event with Mr. McCain, Mr. Murphy accused her of "playing politics" with national security.

"I think it's pretty disgusting that Nancy Johnson has decided to politicize the 9/11 attacks," Mr. Murphy told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0068327

So far, Mrs. Johnson has pumped much more money into the race than Mr. Murphy, spending about $1 million compared with roughly $181,000 by him, according to their latest campaign finance reports. Both campaigns have large reserves of cash as they approach the final weeks of the race: $2.6 million for Mrs. Johnson and about $1 million for Mr. Murphy.

The Iraq war has not played as central a role in the contest as it has elsewhere in the state, where antiwar activists have put Mr. Lieberman and another strong supporter of the war, Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican, on the defensive.

The Murphy campaign has raised the issue, criticizing Mrs. Johnson for voting to authorize the military invasion of Iraq.

But while Mr. Lieberman and Mr. Shays have been outspoken in their support of the war, Mrs. Johnson has not talked all that much about her position, which is to support the president.

Beyond that, Mrs. Johnson's views about what to do in Iraq do not appear to differ significantly from Mr. Murphy's. Both are against an open-ended American military presence in that country, and both argue that Iraqis need to play a greater role in their own defense so that the United States can begin reducing the number of troops there.

Mrs. Johnson is opposed to a timetable for withdrawing troops. Mr. Murphy says that Washington should advance a schedule for withdrawing troops, to prod the Iraqis into taking greater control of their own security, but that the specifics of removing troops should be left to American military leaders.

Mrs. Johnson stuck to her strategy through the week, talking about national security again on Friday during an appearance in Waterbury to accept an endorsement from a political action committee representing veterans.

In the meantime, the Murphy campaign says it still intends to make Mrs. Johnson an emblem of the excesses of one-party control in Washington and what it describes as a Republican penchant for bestowing favors on big campaign contributors.

In particular, the campaign has cited the acceptance by Mrs. Johnson, one of the top fund-raisers in Congress, of tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the insurance and pharmaceutical industries in 2003, around the time she helped write legislation adding prescription drug benefits to Medicare. Democrats have complained that the new drug program would enrich insurance and drug companies at the expense of the elderly.

But Mrs. Johnson has been aggressively promoting the prescription program and her work on it.

In an interview, Mr. Murphy said that Mrs. Johnson's attacks concerning national security would not resonate with voters because the Republicans have failed to address other security issues, including ports, and because the war in Iraq has made the nation less safe.

"It's familiar ground for them," he said of the Republicans' attempts to portray him and other Democrats as weak on national security. "But it's much more dangerous."

Basketball Legend's Campaign Gets An Assist From His Fame (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

But Sports Rivalry Could Rebound GOP Incumbent

MADISON, Ind., Sept. 23 -- From beauty shops to bars, Baron Hill says, he is besieged by people wanting to talk basketball.

Hill is not a coach. He is a Democratic candidate for Congress.

But that is not how he is known best in these parts, where a basketball goal stands in nearly every driveway. Hill is still the guy who was an all-star guard for Seymour High School -- 35 years ago.

Trying to unseat Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R), he does not hesitate to invoke his basketball credentials to prove his down-home bona fides. Hill still holds the school record for most points scored (1,419) and was inducted into the Indiana Basketball Hall of Fame in 2000 alongside a "hick from French Lick" named Larry Bird.

Hill, who still exudes an athletic air, sat for an interview in a coffee shop in Madison (population 12,000), whose Main Street could have been the set for "Pleasantville." Of basketball, he said, "When it comes up, I take advantage of it."

But Hill's heroics on the court have not always rebounded in his favor politically. In earlier races, he said, sports rivalries often cost him votes -- in precincts where fans with long memories could not bring themselves to support a Seymour star.

The Indiana 9th is a vivid reminder that control of the House will not turn solely on national debates over interrogation rules or the future of Iraq. Often, elections turn on voters' intuitive reactions about who better represents the values of a district.

Hill learned that lesson the hard way. After serving three terms in Congress, he lost to Sodrel by 1,400 votes in 2004 -- a defeat he is "still trying to figure out." One reason for the loss, he says, is that national Republicans were able to portray him as a liberal whose views were out of step with average voters.

Hill said he got the message: "I have to sharpen my image as it relates to values, even though I have my basketball credentials."

Those credentials are gold in a state whose basketball-as-civic-religion tradition was immortalized in the 1986 film "Hoosiers." (The movie is said to have been based on a 1950s high school in the 9th District.)

On Friday, Hill said, 20 people in Floyd County stopped him to chat about the latest Indiana basketball news.

In a district that includes Bloomington and its famed Indiana Hoosiers basketball team, it is no surprise that Hill is regularly recognized as the lithe point guard who carved up opposing defenses.

Hill recalls people packed cheek to jowl at every home game -- no small feat given that Seymour's gym holds more than 8,000 people and the town's population is about 18,000. "Back in those days, basketball was everything," said Hill, who graduated in 1971 and is 53 years old.

Although hoops is not so all-encompassing these days, Hill is hoping his athletic rÃ©sumÃ© establishes him as a credible messenger on the values so important to the district.

Hill's first two television commercials of the race are called "Values" and "Minister." The first focuses on his "Hoosier values," and the second attacks Sodrel for breaking a vow to a minister to run a clean campaign.

Not surprisingly, Sodrel is doing his darnedest to shatter that image. An ad paid for by his campaign alleges that Hill "just doesn't share our values."

Sodrel said basketball was a political asset for Hill -- before the Democrat went to Congress for six years. Sodrel said his opponent's votes against bans on same-sex marriage and flag burning are far more important to voters. "Basketball can't overcome that," he said. "He is out of sync with voters." Still, Sodrel said polls showing him slightly behind at this point are probably accurate.

A recent survey conducted for a news station in Indianapolis shows the Democrat with a 46 percent to 40 percent edge, and Hill confidently proclaims: "I am up. There's no question."

At this time in 2004, Sodrel trailed badly in surveys. But his popularity surged -- and voters in the state resoundingly supported President Bush and Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. (R). Sodrel is on his own this time; neither Bush nor Daniels is popular in the district or the state -- as evidenced by the fact that three of the Democrats' best chances of defeating incumbents are here in the Hoosier State.

Observers on both sides believe this race will once again be decided by the narrowest of margins, meaning that a few hundred voters who remember Hill -- fondly or otherwise -- from his playing days could make a crucial difference.

Danny Brown, who played for Jefferson County High -- Seymour's rival -- still remembers Hill as a "very quick and very fast guard." Brown, a Republican, says he is leaning against supporting Hill but warns reporters not to underestimate the emotional tug basketball exerts on voters in this area.

Bill Harmon, a district resident who played against Hill as a freshman in 1971, has moved on -- sort of. He said losing to Seymour hurt bad -- but not bad enough to affect his vote. "That was 30 years ago, and you have got to let stuff like that go."

Unofficial Results Give Victory To Wynn In 4th (BSUN)

By Kelly Brewington, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 24, 2006

Veteran Rep. Albert R. Wynn appeared to have prevailed over challenger Donna Edwards in a fiercely contested 4th Congressional District Democratic primary after the last ballots were counted yesterday.

Seven-term incumbent Wynn edged Edwards by more than 2,000 votes, according to unofficial results.

Montgomery County elections officials were the last to record their tally of provisional ballots yesterday, 11 days after a primary election fraught with glitches.

DOJ_NMG_0068329

Those results showed Edwards winning in Montgomery County, with 15,851 votes to Wynn's 9,129. But along with Prince George's County's results from a day earlier, Wynn was the unofficial winner with a total of 40,766 votes, compared with 38,091 for Edwards.

Neither candidate returned calls for comment yesterday.

The results will not be verified until tomorrow, after State Board of Elections officials confer with Montgomery County's elections board.

Edwards, a civic activist and former foundation executive, has threatened to sue over alleged voting irregularities in Prince George's County, where Wynn lives.

Incumbent Seen Winning Md. House Primary (AP-Y)

AP, September 24, 2006

A six-term incumbent congressman emerged Saturday as the apparent winner of a hotly contested primary after officials finished counting more than 11,000 provisional ballots.

The unofficial tally for the 4th District race gave Rep. Albert Wynn 39,482 votes, or 49 percent, and Donna Edwards 37,174 votes, or 47 percent. George McDermott was a distant third with 3,113 votes, or 4 percent.

The winner faces Republican Michael Starkman in November.

Edwards ran strongly in Montgomery County, where the provisional votes were counted, but could not overcome the incumbent's advantage in neighboring Prince George's County.

It was the toughest challenge Wynn had faced after taking at least 80 percent of the vote in Democratic primaries and general elections in six previous campaigns.

Edwards, a Prince George's County community activist, had attacked Wynn on the Iraq war, taxes and bankruptcy.

Wynn said he was campaigning on his record of delivering services and federal money for his district and called Edwards a "professional critic from the sidelines."

Neither candidate had an immediate comment on the results announced Saturday.

In Montgomery County, voters had to use provisional ballots when cards needed for electronic voting machines weren't delivered to polling places.

In the confusion that followed, many precincts ran out of provisional ballots. In some cases, voters made their choices on photocopied ballots or scraps of paper.

Edwards has threatened to file a lawsuit over alleged voting irregularities in Prince George's County, where voters were listed with the wrong party at polling places, polls opened late and there were problems transmitting data from precincts to the county election board.

Engel Calls For Funding Of Veterans' Health Care And Benefits (MIDHUD)

Mid-Hudson News, September 24, 2006

Washington – Congressman Eliot Engel of Westchester and Rockland counties has joined Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Members of Congress to ask President Bush to fully fund veterans programs.

The lawmakers sent a letter to the President asking that he provide the necessary funding for the Department of Veterans' Affairs health care system and related benefits programs. "Mr. President, the time is right for your administration to change course and fully fund the VA, cease efforts to shift the costs of health care onto the backs of veterans, and finally recognize and implement the concept of 'shared sacrifice' with respect to the federal budget," the letter states.

"I know that the Veterans in New York have done a great service for our country, and it is the Federal Government's job to see that they are given proper health care and have their benefits fully funded," said the Democratic Engel. "I am tired of the Bush Administration turning a blind eye to the needs of America's veterans when they return home."

Engel said theirs is a “simple request” to the President that he provide funding in the 2008 budget “so that our men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan receive the care and benefits they have earned and deserve.”

Many Hopefuls Keep Bush Ties Under Wraps (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Since President Bush's approval rating sank to the lowest level of his presidency in May, nearly six in 10 of his appearances helping Republican candidates have been closed to all media coverage.

Unlike his barnstorming leading up to the 2002 congressional elections, when he was more popular and the divisive Iraq war had not begun, Bush has yet to hold a single traditional campaign-style rally for one of his party's hopefuls this election cycle.

Every one of his events for GOP gubernatorial, House and Senate candidates has been to raise money from faithful Republican donors — not to urge support among the broader voting public.

The GOP's control of Congress is in danger. The tendency of many Republican candidates to keep their president under wraps is represented starkly in Bush's schedule in the week ahead.

Republicans hardly have abandoned their enthusiasm for having the president exercise his talent at raising money for their campaigns. But of six fundraisers Bush is headlining this week, all but one — for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley — are private, by agreement between the White House and the campaigns.

GOP Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, one of the more vulnerable Republicans, is a case study in the sometimes tricky dynamics of a president's assistance.

Bush is raising money for DeWine on Monday at a private home in Cincinnati. It is the third time the president will have helped the senator, to the tune of about a $1 million each time. No other candidate has rated as many appearances from Bush, and all have happened out of public view.

Earlier in the year, there was so much discussion of why DeWine was snubbing the president whenever he traveled to Ohio that the senator eschewed his family's baseball seats to take in the Cincinnati Reds' home opener at Bush's side.

DeWine's campaign stresses that all the senator's fundraisers are closed and that there is no attempt to shun the president. "Not at all," said spokesman Brian Seitchik, who added that DeWine plans to appear with Bush during a tour, open to reporters, of a business earlier Monday.

Still, DeWine's ads have emphasized his independence and ability to work with Democrats.

Ohio Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking House Republican, once cozy with Bush. Now she stresses her independent side as she struggles to hold onto her seat in an evenly split district. Bush is returning to Ohio on Thursday to raise money for her; this reception also is closed.

The president appears to be itching to join the battle. Highly competitive and a political junkie, he becomes invigorated in front of large and supportive crowds.

"I'm looking forward to the campaign. I'm looking forward to reminding the American people there are significant differences in between what our party believes and what the other party believes," the president said Thursday at the first of two open fundraisers in Florida. He pounded his lectern and shouted so loudly that donors sometimes had to cover their ears.

That event in Tampa, to collect cash for state Rep. Gus Bilirakis' bid to succeed his father in Congress, was in a safely Republican district.

DOJ_NMG_0068331

The White House says more fundraisers will be opened to coverage as Nov. 7 gets closer, that Bush will start speaking before larger crowds in bigger venues and that he will hold some rallies. But White House press secretary Tony Snow acknowledged that the president's role through the end of the campaign will remain largely fundraiser in chief.

Republican Party and White House officials say Bush is in such great demand by candidates that he cannot fill all the requests and that he is appearing at political events at the same rate as he did in 2002.

But the nature of the events this time around is different.

In 2002, between July and the end of September, nearly all of Bush's political appearances — most fundraisers — were open. From the end of August to this time in 2002, Bush also appeared in a half-dozen areas with tough races at "welcome" events, thinly veiled attempts to marshal presidential power to boost the struggling Republican candidates smiling at his side.

But this year, in the same time period between July and the end of September, nearly two-thirds of Bush's political events are scheduled to be closed, held in private homes where the White House says media coverage would damage the intimacy and intrude on hosts' privacy.

Overall, from the first political event Bush headlined in March 2005 through the end of September, 47 percent of Bush's 68 political events — for candidates, the national GOP, several state counterparts and the campaign arms of House and Senate Republicans — will have been private. Before May's approval-rating slide, the percentage of closed events was 34 percent; since, it is 59 percent.

Of the candidates Bush will have helped by the end of this week, 16 have chosen to have him in private and 23 have elected public appearances. Two have had public and private events — Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri, in a tough re-election race, and Bob Corker, hoping to beat Democratic Rep. Harold Ford to succeed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist in Tennessee.

Most who choose public displays, such as Bilirakis, are running in Republican-leaning districts.

Most preferring a private Bush appearance are competing in some of the toughest races. Among them are Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, whom Bush has helped twice; Reps. Clay Shaw of Florida and Dave Riechert of Washington, and Rick O'Donnell, running for an open House seat in Colorado.

Still, several Republicans in close races have not shunned Bush, including Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, and Reps. Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Jim Gerlach and Mike Fitzpatrick of Pennsylvania.

As Bilirakis put it Thursday in Florida, for some people nothing beats having the president of the United States at your side.

"Today we have the honor and the privilege of hearing from a man of great character and strong conviction: President George W. Bush. I'm proud to stand on this stage with the president," he gushed.

Both Parties Sensing Tighter House Races (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

After months of unrelenting bad news, President Bush and his Republican allies have begun to change the mood, if not the overall trajectory, of a midterm election campaign that has tilted against them for a year.

A combination of good luck -- in the form of a sharp decline in gasoline prices -- and dogged persistence by the president's political team in trying to redefine the terms of the fall campaign has given a much-needed morale boost to beleaguered Republican candidates. The ebullience many Democrats exhibited throughout the summer has given way to more cautious assessments of how difficult the final six weeks may be.

Republicans remain very much on the defensive, anticipating losses in the Senate and possible loss of control in the House. Surveys show that voters strongly disapprove of the performance of this Congress and continue to express far greater willingness to vote for Democrats over Republicans in House races in November.

But top strategists on both sides believe the battle for the House will be hard-fought to the end. Democrats need to win 15 seats to take control of the House and six seats to recapture the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0068332

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said conditions continue to favor his party, but many Democrats in Washington have been "out over the tips of the skis" with unduly optimistic predictions of a November takeover of the House. "Anybody associated with this process the past 19 months has been nothing but pragmatic" about prospects for winning a majority, he said.

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, reiterated to reporters last week his belief that Republicans will still control the House in January. His predecessor, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), said in an interview that while Republicans are still running uphill, the Democrats' "forward march has been halted" since Labor Day.

"Voters early on decided they didn't want Republicans, but they haven't decided they want Democrats," Davis said. "So the House is very much in play."

Bush's anti-terrorism initiative timed to the fifth anniversary of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the end of hostilities in Lebanon, a rise in the stock market and last week's compromise between the White House and three powerful but rebellious GOP senators on the treatment of detainees have all helped give Republicans a sense of forward momentum for the first time in months.

Some of that may prove illusory. Iraq has not disappeared as a burden for Bush and Republican candidates, and despite the recent drop in gasoline prices, economic worries persist, polls show.

Republican hopes on Nov. 7 -- 45 days away -- now hinge on whether the president can sustain the modest gains of the past few weeks and whether that translates into a rise in approval for congressional Republicans.

Bush's approval ratings remain low by historical standards but are markedly higher than they were at their lowest point in the spring, when they dipped below 35 percent. Most of the polls taken after Bush's nationally televised Oval Office address Sept. 11 put the president's approval rating above 40 percent, with two polls -- USA Today-Gallup and Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg -- pegging his approval at 44 percent. A New York Times-CBS News poll put his approval at 37 percent.

The president's support among Republicans has risen, and once-balky GOP voters apparently have begun to coalesce around vulnerable House incumbents, operatives on both sides believe. "Republicans seem to be awakening and coming back to their partisan senses," said a Democratic strategist, who would discuss private data only on the condition of anonymity.

Democrats see independent voters, who continue to register disapproval of Bush and Congress, as the key to victory. Republicans, citing low turnout in many primaries this year, believe many of those independents will not vote in November and are focused on mobilizing their own base.

A sustained rise in the president's approval rating could translate directly into fewer lost seats in the House, according to two political scientists who have built models forecasting House elections.

Alan Abramowitz, a professor at Emory University in Atlanta, previously projected Democratic gains of about 25 seats in the House, but based on the latest Gallup Poll, he said the gains might be closer to 15 seats.

If Bush's approval is at 40 percent, that will translate to Democratic gains of 13 to 16 seats, projected James Campbell, who is on the faculty at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He said that could drop to 10 to 14 seats if the president's approval stands at 45 percent.

What continues to encourage Democrats is their advantage in what operatives call "generic ballot" polls. That is when surveys ask voters which party they intend to vote for in the election -- with no names of candidates attached. This measurement often appears more optimistic for the Democrats than the actual election results, but Republicans have been about 10 percentage points behind the Democrats through much of this year, including in the latest polls that showed Bush's approval rising.

The decline in gas prices has diminished the significance of an issue that has the power to move voters to the Democrats. In May, when average gasoline prices were $2.95 a gallon, 15 percent of Americans in a Washington Post-ABC News survey cited the issue as the single most important in determining their vote. An ABC News poll in early September, when the average price of a gallon was $2.73, showed that just 5 percent of those surveyed cited it as their most important issue. Gasoline prices have fallen even further since then.

Bush's speeches on terrorism, culminating with his nationally televised Oval Office speech on the night of Sept. 11, were designed to shift focus away from the unpopular war in Iraq to the broader issue that aided Republicans in 2002 and 2004.

Whether Bush has succeeded in doing so is not yet clear, although there are signs that Republicans have gained ground against the Democrats in the public's evaluation of which party is better equipped to confront the threat of global terrorism.

"It's probably their best issue because they've won with it in 2002 and 2004," said Rhodes Cook, an independent analyst. "It's like in football. If a play is successful, you keep running it until your opponents stop you, and the Democrats haven't stopped them."

In a new memo from the liberal Democracy Corps, Democratic strategists Stanley Greenberg, Jeremy Rosner, Amy Gershkoff and James Carville argue that Democrats can contest the national security issue successfully, if they engage robustly with the Republicans and continue to press economic issues. "The president's strategy is backfiring because it is driving independents to the Democrats," they wrote.

How all this is affecting House races is what preoccupies strategists in the two parties. Democrats say they see no significant shift, while GOP strategists say they have seen some improvements in their candidates' standing. But they caution that the overall climate remains negative. A survey in targeted House districts by the Republican firm Fabrizio, McLaughlin & Associates comparing voters' attitudes today versus four years ago found that, "in every measure tested, GOP fortunes have eroded significantly."

The impact in individual districts appears uneven, based on interviews with strategists tracking the races. In the Northeast, where Democrats must pick up a number of seats to regain the majority, Republicans say their prospects have improved. They point to recent GOP polls that show embattled Pennsylvania Reps. Jim Gerlach and Curt Weldon and Connecticut Rep. Nancy Johnson leading their challengers as evidence of progress. Republicans also say they are more confident about holding several potentially vulnerable districts in New York.

But Republican incumbents in Indiana and Kentucky remain in deep trouble and Ohio's environment has kept Republicans on the defensive. Democratic prospects in several districts where Republican incumbents are retiring have brightened in recent weeks. Republicans, for example, see little chance of holding the seat in Arizona's 8th District after conservative Randy Graf won the primary. Late last week, the NRCC canceled October television time it had reserved in that district. Open seats in Iowa and Colorado now held by the Republicans also could easily tip to the Democrats, as could the Texas seat left vacant by former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

Not all the movement is related to the GOP political offensive. In Connecticut, the nasty Senate race between insurgent Democratic nominee Ned Lamont against Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, who is now running as an independent after losing the primary, appears to have spilled over on the three critically important House races in the state.

Lieberman has been leading Lamont in the polls, thanks to Republican and independent support, and key Democrats say they are increasingly worried about the party's prospects of carrying the GOP districts held by Reps. Johnson, Chris Shays and Rob Simmons.

These races, like many others this fall, are expected to remain close until Election Day.

Democrats' Edge Erased In New Poll (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

The Democrats' yearlong lead among likely voters has evaporated, strengthening Republican chances of holding majority control in the House, according to the Gallup Poll.

Gallup's latest survey of voters who say they will go to the polls Nov. 7 showed the contest is a "dead heat" between those who say they will vote Republican (48 percent) and those who say they intend to support Democrats (48 percent). The poll of 1,003 adults was conducted Sept. 15-17.

Democrats continue to maintain an advantage among registered voters; however, pollsters consider likely voters to be a more accurate measurement of the electorate's preferences. The neck-and-neck estimates suggest the Republicans have the potential to offset the Democrats' lead "with greater turnout," Gallup said last week in an analysis of its findings.

"Should that result persist until Election Day, it suggests Republicans would be able to maintain their majority-party status in the House," Gallup said.

Democratic strategists dismiss Gallup's survey and other polls showing a similar tightening of the election, but some acknowledge that Republicans' numbers were helped by President Bush's higher job-approval scores -- now at 44 percent -- and his recent speeches highlighting the war on terrorism and its connection to the ongoing conflict in Iraq.

"Nobody believes those numbers. I don't think anybody in the country believes the generic party preference is even right now," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

Still, Mr. Rosenberg said, Mr. Bush's efforts to elevate the terrorism issue in the campaign "has been marginally effective."

"The Republicans got a bounce out of his 9/11 speech. The president does have the ability to change the debate in the country. The problem is, it is not sustainable," he said.

However, additional polling data released by Gallup within the past week suggest that not only is the president changing voter attitudes about the war in Iraq, but that the Democrats' inability to shape a strong message about dealing with terrorism and Iraq may be hurting them among their own base.

"Americans are more positive about the war on terror, and voters are more likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush on terrorism, rather than one who opposes him," Gallup said in a separate analysis. "By a slight margin, Americans tend to think that the country will be safer from terrorism if the GOP retains control of the House, rather than if the Democrats take control."

While a majority of Americans still disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war in Iraq, only one in four now "believe the Democrats have a clear plan on Iraq -- fewer than those who say this about the Bush administration," Gallup said.

"Also, Americans are about equally likely to say they would vote for a candidate who supports President Bush on Iraq as to vote for a candidate who opposes Bush," the pollsters said.

What should worry Democratic campaign officials "is the fact that only 14 percent say the Democrats have a clear plan, but Bush does not, while a greater percentage (23 percent) says Bush has a clear plan, but the Democrats do not," Gallup said.

Gallup's findings on these and related issues mirror those from several other polls that show a similar movement in the Republican Party's favor. One poll conducted last week for the Los Angeles Times and Bloomberg found "the GOP may be gaining momentum before November's battle for control of Congress."

While that survey of 1,347 registered voters showed Democrats leading 49 percent to 39 percent in the party preference question, the Times said "that advantage may rest of softening ground: On virtually every comparison between the parties measured in the survey, Republicans have improved their position since early summer.

"In particular, Republicans have nearly doubled their advantage when voters are asked which party they trust most to protect the nation against terrorism -- the thrust of Bush's public relations blitz in recent weeks," the newspaper reported.

With Prices Falling, Gas May Lose Its Electoral Punch (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

AMERICA, the cost of filling up your Hummer just got $16 cheaper.

The price for a gallon of regular gasoline now averages just under $2.50 nationwide, according to the Energy Information Administration. While that is not exactly cheap, it beats the $3-plus per gallon seen as recently as last month. (For those keeping score at home, the Hummer H2 has a 32-gallon tank.)

So what does this mean for the midterm elections?

Democrats have been beating the oil drum for months, coupling rising gas prices with oil companies reaping record profits and big tax breaks. In commercials from the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat running for Senate from Ohio, is described as having “fought for tax cuts for the middle class, not for oil companies,” while a different ad criticizes Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, saying he “voted oil companies billions in special tax breaks.” Yet another ad from the committee, for the Senate race in Missouri, asserts that the Republican incumbent, Jim Talent, “has voted to give the oil and gas companies billions,” while his Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, would instead invest more federal money in alternative fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0068335

Voters can expect this tack to continue, despite the falling prices.

"We still see it as a strong issue for two reasons," said Charles Schumer, the New York Democrat who runs the Senate campaign committee. "First, just about everybody believes they're going to go back up again, and second, it's an example, one of many, of the administration and the Republican Senate not having a policy that makes people's lives better."

Republicans, on the other hand, believe the sting of this argument is waning.

"Virtually every newspaper in America is reporting on their front page that gas prices are plummeting," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Campaign Committee. "That denies Democrats another issue that they're trying to use to nationalize the election."

Poll numbers show that high gas prices are receding as an issue. Back in May, 14 percent of those surveyed by the Pew Research Center said energy prices were the nation's most important problem, ahead of terrorism and Iraq, up from 5 percent in March. This month, only 7 percent gave energy prices top billing. Gallup has had similar findings.

"It's certainly good for the Republicans," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center. On the other hand, he added, prices have been high for a long time, "and they've taken a toll on people's pocketbooks and people's sense of well-being."

Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, said "it's common sense that if the price of gas continues to go down, it's more favorable to the party in power."

"There aren't many other economic measures that are so readily available," he said, adding, "you see those big numerals as you drive down the street."

But recent Gallup numbers have also shown that the decrease in gas prices has not translated into general optimism about the economy. And there is no shortage of skeptics who doubt that only market forces are at work. A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last weekend found that 42 percent of the roughly 1,000 adults surveyed nationwide said they believed the Bush administration had "deliberately manipulated the price of gasoline so that it would decrease before this fall's elections."

Tangible reasons cited for the dip in prices include the end of the Israeli-Hezbollah war, which had raised tensions across the Middle East. Also, forecasts of a severe hurricane season that could disrupt oil supplies from the Gulf of Mexico have not, so far, panned out.

Even with the summer's increases, gas prices still have not topped their inflation-adjusted peaks from the early 1980's. And the long gas lines of the 1973 oil embargo left more of a mark on the national psyche. But the recent high prices have lined the pockets of nations like Iran and helped undercut what's left of the domestic auto industry, which built much of its business around inexpensive gasoline.

How long will prices keep falling? At least for a few more weeks, predicted Michael Burdette, the Energy Information Administration's senior oil analyst, because crude prices are dropping and retail prices have not fully caught up.

"We probably have another 20 to 25 cents in retail declines we would expect to see over the next few weeks," he said. "On the flip side, there are some people out there calling for retail prices way under $2 a gallon. We just don't expect to see that."

How about a forecast for Election Day?

"No," he said, "I'm not going to go there."

GOP Mines Data For Every Tiny Bloc (LAT)

AMERICA VOTES

The Battle for Control

--

WASHINGTON — As Democrats drive to extend their power in Congress, holding on to Debbie Stabenow's Senate seat is a must. And the Michigan incumbent is currently ahead in the polls.

But Republican strategists are working hard to upset Stabenow, in part through a low-profile appeal to a group that most politicians rarely think of as a voting bloc — snowmobilers.

DOJ_NMG_0068336

And the stealth campaign to woo the thousands of working-class, historically Democratic Michiganders whose cold-weather passion is snowmobiles is just one small example of a technique known as "micro-targeting" that GOP strategists are using across the country as they try to pull off another election day victory against the odds.

By most measures, the November elections offer Democrats their best chance in years. If anti-Republican sentiment turns out to be a tidal wave, strategic and tactical brilliance may not be enough to protect the GOP majorities in Congress.

But if control of Congress comes down to three or four dozen closely contested races, as now seems likely, then micro-targeting and the other technologies that Republicans are using in battleground states could make a difference.

The GOP system — built around a database nicknamed Voter Vault — combines huge amounts of demographic, financial and other personal information on individual voters with the data-mining techniques used by direct-mail advertisers to deliver surgically targeted appeals to voters identified as likely to respond, including many who might be considered part of the Democratic base.

In Michigan, for example, the GOP contacted snowmobilers by mail, telephone or other personal communication suggesting that Democrats' environmental views stood in the way of greater opportunities for snowmobiling.

Though details of the GOP system are secret, snowmobilers and other categories of voters are identified from such diverse sources as credit card transactions, product warranty files, magazine subscription lists, consumer surveys, vehicle registrations and other public records.

Going back at least to the 2002 elections, the Republicans' use of technology, coupled with elaborate computer profiles that make educated guesses about individuals' political inclinations, has demonstrated its power in close races.

In the recent Rhode Island Senate primary, the GOP assessed reams of data — from prior voting histories to signatures on petitions — to identify Democrats and independents whose profiles suggested they might support beleaguered Republican incumbent Lincoln Chafee; his victory improved GOP chances of holding the seat in November. In June, the same technology helped the GOP retain the House seat vacated by convicted felon Randall "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe.

Democratic strategists understand the power of the new technology and techniques, and they have scrambled to develop their own micro-targeting capabilities. The Democratic National Committee is deploying a new system in six states, and another system will be available in 20 or so others.

With the November elections only seven weeks away, however, many Democrats concede they are far behind — their efforts hamstrung by a late start, arguments over tactics, personal feuds and divisions inside the party's leadership.

The GOP system was developed by the Republican National Committee with the encouragement of White House political strategist Karl Rove.

In addition to locating potentially sympathetic voters, it proved more effective than traditional get-out-the-vote schemes in 2002 and 2004 in making sure they got to the polls.

In their search for voters, Republican strategists can quickly pull up information not only about voting histories, age, address and marital status, but also consumer habits, vehicle ownership, magazine subscriptions, church membership, hobbies, major purchases — even whether a household prefers bourbon over gin. (Bourbon drinkers tend to be Republican; gin is more often a Democrat's drink).

The data and the profiles, held in a centralized system to maintain quality control and help strategists monitor overall trends, are continually updated and massaged on the basis of contacts with voters.

In Michigan alone, Republican workers are making 20,000 telephone contacts with voters per day; Democrats also have telephone banks, but they are not integrated into a system as advanced as that of the Republicans.

Because both parties shroud their efforts in secrecy, it can be difficult to compare their programs, especially in individual races. Still, the evidence suggests the Democrats are substantially behind in micro-targeting and related technologies.

The Democratic National Committee will have a test version of its micro-targeting models available in only half a dozen states; the basic GOP system has been in place nationwide since the campaigns began.

"We are not where we need to be," says Maren Hesla, who handles voter outreach for Emily's List, a liberal group that is part of a coalition helping Democrats develop more sophisticated grass-roots operations, including micro-targeting, in about two dozen states.

Hesla insists that her party "will have enough going on in enough key states to surprise people about what we are able to accomplish."

The question is whether it will be enough to help Democrats achieve a breakthrough victory.

So serious do some Democratic leaders consider the technology gap that they have begun devising their own separate systems, especially for House and Senate races.

"It's every man for himself," said Donna Brazile, a longtime party strategist who managed Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign and is now working to unite party leaders behind a strategy for translating favorable opinion polls into victories.

Brazile, like Hesla, says she sees positive developments for Democrats, but she also worries that the party is behind.

Although micro-targeting may seem like inside baseball, activists in both parties say that the methods and technology Rove and others pioneered may revolutionize campaigns. They predict the new techniques will become as crucial in future campaigns as opinion polling — virtually unheard of in congressional races four decades ago — is today.

"The revolutionary change here is that Republicans … are going after voters as individuals, as opposed to a census tract or a media market," says Harold Ickes, a Democratic Party strategist.

Campaigns traditionally relied on geography or other broad indicators to target voters. Democrats, for example, would blanket predominantly African American neighborhoods because those populations had historically supported Democrats. Republicans would focus on suburbs, which were historically Republican.

Such targeting was far from precise. And many of the old targeting assumptions are less true now. Some suburbs have become more liberal as jobs spread beyond the central city. And enough African American voters peeled away from Democrat John F. Kerry in 2004 for Bush to retain the presidency.

Now, Republicans nationwide can identify approachable voters inside what had previously been seen as Democratic territory, then deliver appeals to them on issues that cut across party lines.

The system's real power develops when complex algorithms are used to rate how likely individuals are to vote for particular Republican candidates.

Bruised by the power of the GOP system in 2004, Ickes commissioned a study in early 2005 that concluded: "The Republicans are light-years ahead of us. This is not rocket science, and we Democrats will get our clocks cleaned if we don't catch up."

A year later, Ickes launched his own effort to develop such resources with a new coalition of labor and activist groups. His $9-million project, active in two dozen states, is taking a leading role in making micro-targeting and other advanced technology available to Democrats.

Even combining this effort with that of the DNC, Democratic strategists lament that their party remains behind the GOP.

Looking at the technology available to Democrats in Michigan, where the party is at its most advanced, a Democratic coalition strategist said ruefully, "We can't do snowmobilers."

The snowmobiler appeal was developed by state GOP Chairman Saul Anuzis. Michigan has a higher proportion of snowmobilers than any other state. Anuzis says the "extreme environmental views" of Stabenow and incumbent Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm have hindered development and use of snowmobile trails.

Anuzis says that created an opening to reach out to snowmobile users — many of whom belong to demographic groups often considered Democratic.

Similarly, Michigan Republicans have sent messages to African American households in predominantly Democratic inner-city Detroit extolling education plans that give parents more choice.

In the hottest congressional race in Minnesota, where the DNC and the Ickes group have developed micro-targeting capabilities, Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling has not yet begun using the technology but expects to start soon.

The campaign manager for Republican Michele Bachmann says the GOP system has proved to be "a critical asset." Using Voter Vault's ability to track voter preferences on hot issues, Bachmann's campaign even identified households where one family member opposed abortion and the others did not. The campaign tailored different messages to different members of those households.

In GOP-dominant Tennessee, where Democrat Harold E. Ford Jr. is running even with the Republican candidate to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Ford's campaign obtained voter data files months ago from the DNC.

But the campaign had to hire its own consultants to develop the computer models necessary to use that data, while the Republican candidate enjoyed access to the full Voter Vault system that has been massaged and updated for years — a potentially crucial difference in a race that is expected to be decided by the ground operations in the final days.

Surveying the Democrats' effort to close the technology gap, veteran strategist Brazile insists her party is making gains. "Unfortunately," she said, "it's late and last-minute. We're still perfecting drive-by campaigning."

1994, The Election To Embrace (and Avoid) (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON

IF it's a truism that the military always fights the last war, it's also true that political parties fight the last big campaign. This year, both parties are studying the climactic 1994 midterm Congressional elections, when Republicans, led by Newt Gingrich, swept Democrats out of power for the first time in 40 years.

That campaign matched relentless Republican discipline against complacent Democrats unaccustomed to political combat. And the environment was very much like the one the parties find themselves in this fall: the voters were unhappy with the president, deeply dissatisfied with Congress and worried about the government's direction. This time, Democrats are the challengers, and Republicans are the incumbents, and politics has changed greatly over the past 12 years. But both parties, for better and worse, are putting many of 1994's lessons to use this fall.

Here, a look at the new old thinking.

Prepare for the Worst

"There were lots of Democratic incumbents who went down in 1994 who thought they were in safe seats," said Philip A. Klinkner, a professor of government at Hamilton College in New York, who edited a book on the 1994 elections.

Remembering how Democrats were caught unaware and fully understanding that these are difficult times for the party in power, Republicans have been preparing for over a year for an onslaught.

Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Party chairman, has raised $175.8 million for his get-out-the-vote operation and television commercials — compared with $97 million raised by his Democratic counterpart, Howard Dean.

Republican workers have scrutinized the records of potential Democratic challengers, coming up with potentially damaging information that can be seen in the advertisements now pelting viewers across the country.

And Republicans pushed the panic button through the summer, loudly telling the world that they were in trouble. Those alarmist sentiments may well have been heartfelt, but there has been some political calculus here as well. Warning of a Democratic takeover gets contributors to write checks, encourages dispirited Republicans to vote and pushes candidates to campaign scared.

It also has allowed Republican leaders to do what Democrats largely failed to do in 1994: Persuade incumbents who are not facing a serious challenge to give up some money to candidates who are. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the head of the Republican Congressional campaign effort, has made clear to incumbents who seem certain of re-election that he expects them to divert their campaign funds to help Republicans in trouble.

Put It In Writing

One of the few things that Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Dean agree on, it seems, is that Republicans won in 1994 in no small part because they laid out an agenda, the Contract With America.

"The contract really mattered for a wide range of reasons," said Mr. Gingrich, who was the Republican leader in the House at the time. "It said to every Republican candidate, you can be confident, you can be positive. If we had run a negative campaign, if we had run a hate-Clinton campaign, we would not have gotten control of the House."

DOJ_NMG_0068339

Joe Gaylord, a Republican consultant who was Mr. Gingrich's political lieutenant in engineering the takeover, said he and Mr. Gingrich determined that the first priority in an insurgent campaign was to spell out "what we do when we get in power."

"If people are going to vote for change, they need to know what kind of change they are voting for," Mr. Gaylord said. There were less obvious benefits as well: An agenda worked out in Washington gave weaker candidates "a lifeline to hang on to and explain what they would do if they got elected."

Some Democrats argue that this year, the party would be better off standing aside, to keep the focus on a faltering White House. After all, why put out ideas that give Republicans a target in the days ahead? And some political analysts argue that the Contract With America's impact on the election was overstated: most voters didn't even know about it. But by now, most Democrats agree that part of the 1994 strategy was what the party needs in in 2006: Mr. Dean said he was convinced Republicans took over because "they were clear that they were unified and they wanted a new direction."

Democrats have released their own six-point agenda — "Six for '06" — but it doesn't seem to have made much of a splash yet. In a New York Times/CBS News Poll released last week, just 38 percent of those surveyed said Democrats had offered a clear idea of what they would do if they won the White House.

That may be because the 2006 Democrats have not been able to match the unity of the 1994 Republicans. For example, Mr. Dean and Representative Rahm Emanuel, the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign committee, are not talking, in a feud over money.

Attack First

Mr. Gaylord, the Republican consultant, said he learned one thing from Democrats in 1994: that the old rule of politics — ignore your challenger — was wrong. He said that a party in power had to slap back threats early and harshly. The party in power must discredit them — political professionals prefer the word "define" — before they have a chance to make themselves known.

Which is precisely what Republicans are now doing. In North Carolina on Friday, Republicans launched a fierce television commercial attacking Heath Shuler, a Democrat challenging Representative Charles Taylor, for paying his taxes late. Republicans said they expect to spend the vast majority of their advertising budget on negative ads.

Democrats have learned the same lesson, and have fought back with attacks of their own. And they have also moved to seize the advantage by doing what Mr. Gingrich did in 1994: Transform the election into a referendum on the party in power and an unpopular president.

For example, Mr. Emanuel said that his committee has borrowed from a 1994 Republican radio advertisement, in which a voice that sounded like President Bill Clinton left a message on an answering machine of a Democratic congressman, thanking him for voting with the White House. This year, a Democratic advertisement features a voice that sounds a lot like Mr. Bush leaving a similar message for Representative Chris Chocola, an embattled Republican from Indiana.

Control the Electoral Map

Finally, in 1994, the number of seats in play was large: 100 or so compared with just 40 now. That gave Republicans plenty of targets to shoot at, making their victory — in retrospect — seem almost easy. That lesson has not been lost on either party this year.

Democrats have made a concerted effort to expand the number of competitive races, to the evident anxiety of Republicans.

Republicans have countered by investing early and heavily in races that appear on the brink of being competitive — for instance, in upstate New York and in Florida — to try to lock them down immediately.

Clearly, both the challengers and the incumbents have drawn what they consider to be the right lessons of 1994. But with all due respect to Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Gaylord, at the rate this campaign is going, it seems a pretty good bet that the next time there is a pivotal midterm election, it will be the Campaign of 2006 — and not the Campaign of 1994 — that Democrats and Republicans will be studying.

Tired of political commercials?

So are we. In fact, we're even more tired than you are, because we just pored over the transcripts of 122 TV and radio ads for this year's crop of candidates for senator and governor from all across America. We were looking for trends and themes and insights into the state of American democracy. Unfortunately, by the time we finished, our brains were far too frazzled for rational thought.

But we did learn some things: We learned that America is in crisis. We learned that Americans want change. We learned that Americans value values, particularly Ohio values, Colorado values and Nebraska values. We learned that almost every pol has new ideas but that almost none of them reveals what those ideas are. And we learned that the guy who paid for the ad is a man of vision and values but his opponent is a gutless, crooked hack. And vice versa.

Now, after enduring this hideous ordeal, we have taken pieces of these 122 ads and used them to create the ultimate political commercial for the ideal candidate.

Every phrase, indeed every word, comes from a real political commercial aired this year. Here goes:

ANNOUNCER: It's the big squeeze. Taxes go up every year. Gas prices through the roof. The cost of living is skyrocketing. The legislature wastes more and more. Every week brings new scandals. People are leaving our state. Criminals are coming across the border, victimizing American citizens.

Are you tired of politics as usual? Do you ever feel like no one's representing your interests? Isn't it time for a fresh start?

CANDIDATE: We need to make a change. We need real change. It's time to change the way things are done in Washington. If you want a change, I'm your guy.

ANNOUNCER: Grandson of a farmer. Son of a police officer. Raised by a single mother. Born in a rural small town. His values were shaped in rural Arkansas, a half-mile down a dirt road. A paper route earned a new bike.

He worked his way up from poverty to Harvard Law. He volunteered and saw combat in Vietnam. He built an investment company from the ground up. With his wife, Debby, he founded Kids Reading Network in honor of his mother.

He was elected mayor. Cut taxes. Created jobs. Balanced the budget. Cut waste, fraud and abuse. Abolished 71 obsolete boards, commissions and task forces. Turned the city around.

CANDIDATE: I want to set the record straight. I'm opposed to illegal immigration and methamphetamine. I believe in the wonders of science. I believe you deserve better. I believe our state needs government that works -- servant leadership. Our children deserve a senator who wants the job. That's why I'm running for governor.

ANNOUNCER: The choice? A successful businessman and mayor -- or an ineffective congressman.

She's a liberal, supports gun control, abortion on demand, mandatory gay rights. He voted against strengthening criminal laws against terrorist attacks. He voted against the Patriot Act, which gives law enforcement the tools to fight terrorism. Weakening America's security. Out of touch with Ohio values.

CANDIDATE: The choice in this race is simple. If you're satisfied with the way things are, I'm not your candidate. I believe change starts with ideas. You deserve good ideas. But more importantly, you deserve a governor who gets the job done for you.

I'll stand up for the little guy. It's that simple. It's that fair. It's that important. And I'm not just talking about these issues. I've done something about them.

ANNOUNCER: Protecting the California dream. Changing Maryland for the better. Ready to lead Massachusetts. Turn around Ohio. Make Wisconsin great again.

Colorado values. Nebraska values. Nebraska common sense. Real Montana.

CANDIDATE: This grandma wants to shake Austin up. Bring some passion back to Albany. We need a senator who will stand up for New Jersey. I'll fight for Florida. I'll fight for Iowa's future. That's the Colorado promise -- and mine, too.

ANNOUNCER: Courageous, determined, a fighter for our issues. Challenging politics as usual with honest ideas to lift our state. Hard work. Results.

CANDIDATE: I approved this message about conservative change. I approved this message because working together is the only way to solve our problems. I approved this message because I won't play politics with our security. I approved this message because we've got a great future here in Michigan and I'm fighting for it every day.

DOJ_NMG_0068341

ANNOUNCER: It's time to have a governor on our side.

CANDIDATE: I approved this message because it's time for a new politics of unity and purpose. I approved this message because when good ideas cross party lines, we should, too. I approved this message because we really need to know how our representatives vote.

ANNOUNCER: Smart solutions that work.

CANDIDATE: I sponsored this ad because we need someone on our side. I sponsored this ad because we need to protect our borders. I sponsored this ad because you can't change Washington unless you change the people you send there.

ANNOUNCER: Together we can.

CANDIDATE: Why the hell not?

Lost Horizons (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

It should have been an easy morning for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. He had settled in for a radio interview with a friendly questioner, Frank Beckmann, broadcasting live on WJR from the first floor of the Renaissance Center, home to General Motors in Detroit. As the traffic report hummed over the studio monitors, Mehlman and Beckmann bantered about the liberal media and the war on terrorism and all the problems with the Democrats. But something changed when the microphone went live. Beckmann did not turn hostile, but he was nothing like the cheerleader-interviewer Mehlman tends to find on the other side of the table. Why has Bush been so slow to make a case — "He waited too long, didn't he?" — for Iraq? Was Bush's unpopularity dragging Republicans down in places like Michigan, one of the few states where Republicans actually had a chance to topple a Democratic governor and senator? And why was Bush, sounding just like a Democrat, pressing an immigration plan that could help illegal immigrants become citizens? "Why should anybody support what the president puts out there on this, Ken?" Beckmann asked.

It is hard to fathom how much Mehlman's life has changed since he took the chairman's desk at the Republican National Committee headquarters on Capitol Hill in January 2005, the reward for managing, together with Karl Rove at the White House, what was widely praised as one of the most sophisticated and groundbreaking presidential campaigns in a generation. "It was an election where they knew more than we did," Joe Lockhart, a senior strategist for

John Kerry, the Democratic presidential candidate, told me. For the next year, Chairman Mehlman talked big and thought big about the Republican Party: about how he and his allies could fundamentally redraw the political architecture of America, change the way Americans conceptualize the two parties and establish Republicans as the dominant party in America long after George Bush returned to Texas. That meant putting a lock on the White House and Congress, and it meant winning statehouses and governorships, which draw the redistricting maps that are the cement of long-term political realignments. This was nothing short of a campaign to marginalize the Democratic Party and everything that Mehlman, reflecting Bush and Rove, said it stood for: big government, high taxes, liberal judges, a timorous foreign policy.

In meticulous detail and with a cool mastery of his subject, he preached about the revolution in marketing and data technologies and the new world of advertising and communications that had transformed politics since he first arrived at the George Bush for President campaign in Austin seven years earlier. It is a political paradigm that Republicans — particularly Rove, Mehlman and the Bush campaign's senior strategist, Matthew Dowd — grasped before Democrats did, and nearly as much as anything else, it accounted for Republican successes in 2002 and 2004. After he was named chairman, Mehlman began filling his days with appearances before African-American audiences across the country, where he apologized for past Republican slights to black Americans, portrayed Republicans as the "party of Lincoln" and pledged to challenge Democrats for black, as well as Hispanic, support. Quixotic? Perhaps. But it reflected just how bullish the second-term Bush Republican Party, with its eye to history and legacy and lasting power, had become.

There was time for such indulgences in the days before a hurricane roared through New Orleans and the country turned against the war Bush had launched in Iraq. These days, of course, talk of a Republican realignment has given way to talk of simple survival this November. Now the lofty ideals and bold ambitions of Mehlman and Rove often seem in direct conflict with the short-term survival instincts of Republicans who want nothing more than to get past the next election. House Republicans sabotaged Bush's immigration plan, ignoring Mehlman's warnings about the damage that an enforcement-only immigration bill could do to the party's long-term growth among Hispanic voters, a critical part of the party realignment that the White House had envisioned. He spent much of July trying to manage the fallout among black leaders after House conservatives delayed a routine extension of the Voting Rights Act. Earlier this year, at the American Jewish Committee's 100th annual meeting, Mehlman, the second Jewish chairman in the history of the Republican National Committee, heard scattered boos as he defended the Iraq war to a room fearful that the White House's Iraq policy had empowered Iran, whose new president had expressed a desire to destroy Israel. It was dispiriting for Mehlman, especially since Jewish voters are another group that Republicans are trying to peel off the Democratic base.

Mehlman finds himself this fall atop a Republican Party as divided as at any time since George W. Bush came to Washington. He is confronted, day after day, with Republican candidates who criticize the president and his policies or who execute a high-profile skedaddle when Bush comes to town — both of which Mehlman reacts to with a peculiar combination of empathy and disapproval. "My goal for them is to win elections," he said last month, sitting in a wing chair in his office, under a photo that showed him and Rove talking as they walked out of the West Wing behind Bush. "But if you don't want this election to be a referendum on Bush, don't make it a referendum on Bush. If they run against Bush — rather than running as an independent Republican — it can't help them; it can only hurt them."

While Mehlman blames Iraq for most of the administration's problems — a conflict that he argues was noble and one that, he says, will in the end make the world safer — he acknowledges the damage his party suffered because of Katrina. Mehlman is renowned in Washington for his organizational skills, for assembling lean and efficient operations filled with loyal and largely happy people who rarely make mistakes, so it is understandably vexing for him that many Americans have come to see the administration as managerially incompetent and politically inept. Late this past spring, Mehlman began warning Republicans that the party could lose the House, something that seemed unthinkable a year earlier. Over dinner this summer, he told me he was fairly certain that Republicans would hold on in November, yet the bouncy confidence he once displayed seemed gone. When asked if he worried that Republican voters, demoralized by this tough year for the Bush White House, would stay home in November, Mehlman responded with a one-word answer — <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="173185;154756;313721">"Yes" — that was striking to anyone who has spent time with this always-on-message chairman.</object.title>

Mehlman still travels tirelessly on behalf of his party (270,000 miles to 43 states and Puerto Rico since becoming chairman) and is still raising money at a breakneck pace ($184 million from the beginning of 2005 through the end of August). He is still fast to the draw in an argument on any subject, no matter how technical or arcane, and never without a defense for an administration that certainly seems to need one these days. "The president is dealing with big and hard things," Mehlman patiently told a Republican volunteer in a Detroit suburb who could not understand why Bill Clinton — Bill Clinton! — was more popular than George Bush. But there are dark bags under Mehlman's eyes now, and the wear of this past year was etched on his face when he turned 40 in August. A man who never seemed to take pleasure in the kind of sledgehammer attack that Rove so clearly savors — who seemed much happier talking about the legacy of

Ronald Reagan or microtargeting as a tool for turning out voters — could be heard in recent weeks issuing searing partisan attacks, reverting to the familiar stance of a party leader who does not like what he sees on the horizon.

"I'm not flipping out," he told me recently, looking straight ahead. "There are absolutely days when you are — you know — when this is very challenging. Absolutely."

Ken Mehlman jumped into the front seat of the S.U.V. squiring him through a three-day rush of fund-raisers and pep talks to Republican activists, his spirits lifted on this wet June day by what he had just seen in a squat and messy sprawl of an office in the battleground suburbs of Detroit. It was the Macomb County "victory center," a jumble of tables and folding chairs and boxes of cold pizza where dozens of volunteers clutched Republican Party-issued cellphones against their ears — the days of banks of telephones plugged into a wall are over — and read from scripts. At the end of each interview, they blackened a circle on a bubble sheet (think No. 2 pencils and the SAT test), signifying whether this was a voter the party would circle back to — once, twice or more — to make certain he or she would be at the polls on Nov. 7. It was still nearly five months before Election Day, but the 72-hour plan, the Republicans' voter-turnout program that ambushed the Democrats in 2002 and 2004, was already humming along. Mehlman was delighted as he watched what he said was his party's latest technological adaptation. The bubble sheets could be scanned by a computer, he said proudly, saving time and money as the results are incorporated into the Republicans' formidable database. "It is a relatively nice day at the end of June, and in the building we just left, they just made 10,000 ID calls," Mehlman said. "That is really good for the party."

If there is a defining characteristic to Mehlman and his tenure as Republican national chairman, it is his fascination with the communications and technological revolution that is sweeping American politics. This has produced once-unimaginable new ways to track down potential voters, by predicting voting habits based on where Americans live and the cars they drive and the magazines they read, and delivering tailored messages to different segments of an overly saturated electorate. Mehlman's chairmanship has become an argument for the notion that the garrulous and instinctual political boss may be all but obsolete in this age of supersophisticated polling, data mining, niche marketing and microtargeting. In an arena that seems to value instinct, bravado, gall and undisciplined excess, Mehlman is empirical and deliberative. Why should a campaign manager direct resources based on a hunch when there is consumer data that can flush out Republicans living deep in Democratic enclaves? Why guess when you can measure what words will be most persuasive to the middle-class exurbanite voter marching on the StairMaster (watching, no doubt, the Republican ad that the Bush campaign placed on the closed-circuit gym channel after realizing that its voters were no longer at home watching the network news)?

When Mehlman talks about politics, he doesn't talk about Machiavelli; he talks about "Moneyball," Michael Lewis's book about how the Oakland A's employed statistical modeling to assemble a powerhouse baseball team, sending to pasture the old-line scouts with their years of calling it from their guts. "We are the party of 'Moneyball!'" Mehlman proclaimed, practically shouting and bouncing on the balls of his feet, talking to a room of slightly bewildered Republicans in California last year. "They measured everything. We are doing the same thing in politics."

Mehlman, the son of a certified public account, seems as happy talking about the latest employee-relations techniques as he is talking about the inspiration he said he found watching Reagan stand up to the Soviet Union. "Gut alone is crazy," Mehlman told me. "Why do gut when you can go with objective information? Hope is not a strategy. And gut instincts are always less effective than objective analysis." Mehlman's endless talk of metrics and management techniques is viewed as a quirky if fundamental part of his chemistry. His White House colleagues and friends poke fun at his obsession with order and measurement, at his daily spreadsheet of to-do lists. "He's anal-retentive, man!" Karl Rove says.

Back when Mehlman took the job of party chairman, Republican command of the technologies of winning elections seemed the icing on the cake. Now it seems more like the cake itself. If there is one defining question in this campaign, it is whether the two big Republican Party weapons in this age of Bush — voter turnout and national security in the post-9/11 era — can be wheeled out again to overcome a political environment that has curdled for the Republican Party. As in 2002 and 2004, the White House has been hitting Democrats on national security and terror in a choreographed way, with a rollout that began, predictably, around Labor Day. But Democrats are pushing back this time, arguing that Bush's policies have if anything made the world a less safe place, an argument reinforced by the continued images of turmoil from Iraq. Polls show that the Republican advantage on the issue is not what it once was, and even some Republicans worry about how many times the White House can credibly go back to this same well.

By contrast, the intricate political machine that Mehlman has built to identify and turn out Republicans is growing, and if the election in November is close, it could provide the Republican Party with the fire wall it needs. Democrats have, if belatedly, learned lessons from what the Republican Party has done and are adopting many of the same techniques. Still, no one thinks the Democrats have caught up on get-out-the-vote, or even can catch up before Election Day. Harold Ickes, a long-term national Democratic leader and one of the smartest strategists in either party, didn't hesitate when asked if he thought the Republican Party had lapped the Democrats in the area of targeting and turnout. "Yes — there's no question about it," he said. Ickes's response was revealing because he has embarked on a private effort to build a national database of registered voters, an implicit rebuke of the slower pace of Howard Dean, the Democratic Party leader, in this area. And Ickes was warm in his appraisal of Mehlman. "The general view is, he's very good," Ickes said. "They have good systems and he's a good system person."

Mehlman has for this election taken what the Republican Party assembled in Ohio in 2004 — a database of every voting-age resident that includes voting history, party registration, demographic data and consumer history — and expanded it, he said, to include every voting-age American in the country. "In Ohio, in '04, we got the tip of the iceberg," Mehlman said. "What we did over the last two years is we got the entire iceberg." With that kind of data, Republican campaign workers in every state in the country can identify potential Republicans who may never have voted before and bring them to the polls. To help neighborhood organizers plot their door-to-door visits — and to make what might be a dreary exercise at least interesting — the Republican Party uses satellite pictures from Google Earth to chart the routes for house-to-house canvassing.

There have been two early tests of this machine already in this election cycle, and both were encouraging for Mehlman. The most recent was in Rhode Island earlier this month, where Republicans dispatched 72-hour teams to help Senator Lincoln Chafee beat back what had seemed to be a very threatening conservative challenge by Steve Laffey, the mayor of Cranston. (Mehlman and other top Republicans concluded that they had no chance of keeping the seat in this Democratic state if Laffey won.) Turnout shattered the Republican primary record for the state, set in 1994: 62,099 people voted, a 38 percent increase. Republicans said their 86 get-out-the-vote volunteers made 198,921 contacts with prospective voters in the final 11 days of the campaign. As Chafee declared victory, Democrats could not help taking note of these numbers. And earlier, on June 6 in California's 50th Congressional District, in San Diego, in a special election to replace

Duke Cunningham, the Republican congressman from San Diego who quit in scandal, the Republican Party put the full press of a 72-hour plan to work. The Republican, Brian Bilbray, squeaked out a victory with 49 percent of the vote over the Democrat, Francine Busby. That was a race, Mehlman said, in which turnout was able to overcome a very challenging environment.

Still, this is a district where Republicans should not be crowing about a 49 percent victory. For one thing, it has a substantial Republican edge; Cunningham beat Busby 58 percent to 36 percent in 2004. Bilbray campaigned for tough immigration controls in this district snug on the Mexican border, and Busby threw him a lifeline in the final weekend of the campaign when she appeared to be encouraging illegal aliens to vote for her. The 72-hour plan helped pull the Republicans through that Tuesday. But will it be able to manage such extensive operations nationwide if, say, 50 districts are really in contention come Election Day? And what if the White House's campaign-season drumbeat on terrorism doesn't work this time? As Mehlman himself says, turnout operations help — but only so much. "Historically, turnout matters at the margin," he said. "If you are losing an election because of an issue or the environment or the candidate, you are not going to win it on turnout."

"Just left the Urban League," Mehlman wrote in a BlackBerry message to Donna Brazile, reporting on his attendance at a reception with black leaders. "Got nice acknowledgment and applause." This was in the spring of last year. Back then, Mehlman kept up a regular e-mail correspondence with Brazile, a prominent African-American Democratic leader who was, in 2000, the manager of Al Gore's presidential campaign. (She later shared the e-mail messages with me.) Mehlman made a habit of letting Brazile know about each of his appearances before black audiences, where he invariably described Republicans as "the party of Lincoln and Frederick Douglass." He told her of his efforts to recruit black candidates for statewide offices around the country, a roster that today includes candidates for governor in Ohio and Pennsylvania and for Senate in Maryland (in the person of Michael Steele, whom Mehlman warmly describes as a "good friend"). "Am always going to try to bring candidate or local elected official with me to African-American newspaper ed boards so they build relationships that will go beyond my leadership," Mehlman wrote Brazile in another e-mail message. Mehlman gave a speech to the N.A.A.C.P. saying that some Republicans had been "trying to benefit politically from racial polarization" and that "we were wrong." Brazile was impressed. She told me at the time that she was accustomed to Republicans making high-flying but short-lived appeals to blacks but said she thought that Mehlman seemed to be on a different kind of mission.

A year later, a small group of Washington reporters attended a luncheon in a private dining room at Charlie Palmer, a glistening modern steakhouse within walking distance of the Capitol. In attendance was a Republican running for the United States Senate. The rules of the lunch stipulated that the candidate could be quoted but identified only as a Republican candidate for Senate. The "Republican candidate for Senate" spent a good part of the lunch offering harsh criticism of the White House; indeed, at times he sounded like a Democrat. Dana Milbank, a Washington Post columnist who was there, wrote it all up — precisely following the rules of the lunch, identifying the speaker only as a Republican Senate candidate — to devastating effect.

Mehlman was highly distressed upon reading the Post article, one associate said, and flabbergasted after learning that the candidate was his friend Michael Steele. This was four days after Bush finally spoke before the N.A.A.C.P., after refusing its invitations for the first five years of his presidency. (His aides had cited harsh attacks on him by the organization's leaders.) Bush went, in part, in response to pleadings by Mehlman, and he went a few weeks after the Voting Rights Act was tabled in the House by conservatives. The reception Bush got was tepid.

Democrats like Brazile no longer view this Republican appeal for African-Americans with much concern, or even interest, and she did not need the platform of a not-for-attribution lunch with reporters to make that view known. Mehlman, Brazile said, was on a roll in 2005. "But Katrina washed away any illusions that Republicans had something to offer African-Americans," she told me. "I know he's out there every day. I just don't know if his sales pitch has any potency at the moment."

The problems that Mehlman has encountered in his effort to make the Republican Party the party of Lincoln suggest a recurring frustration of his chairmanship. Mehlman argues that the "opportunity" initiatives that Bush has put forward, albeit with limited legislative success — giving Americans more control over their health-care insurance, setting up private accounts for retirement, school choice — are the core of the Republican appeal for black support. Mehlman wants Republicans to compete with Democrats for black votes not on so-called racial issues, like affirmative action, but on basic issues of economics and the role of government. He talks about the high-level black appointments Bush has made to his cabinet. He points to the three black statewide Republican candidates running under his watch. He suggests that Democrats have taken the black vote for granted all these years. Less obviously, the White House push on such issues as a ban on gay marriage is aimed in part at socially conservative blacks.

But is that enough?

Bruce S. Gordon, president of the N.A.A.C.P., says that Mehlman called him after the Voting Rights Act faltered. "He didn't seem too satisfied with the behavior of some members of his party," Gordon told me, recounting their conversation. "He said he doesn't have much control over them. But he's the chairperson of the Republican Party: he's got some clout." And it's not just the Voting Rights Act. Or Katrina. The war in Iraq is also highly unpopular among blacks. So are the cuts in social programs; and the nomination of judges who oppose affirmative action; and the problems with financing No Child Left Behind, the education-reform bill that Mehlman often cites as the kind of measure African-American parents should embrace.

There is certainly a degree of calculation to Mehlman's outreach campaign: it is designed, at least in part, to make the party more appealing to moderate white voters who might be scared off from supporting a party identified with racial intolerance. As demonstrated in Ohio in 2004, it takes only a few percentage points to affect the outcome of an election: with such a polarized electorate, small shifts can produce large gains. But the political calculations go only so far in trying to account for Mehlman's dedication — "his maniacal focus," as Brazile put it, admiringly — to attract African-American votes.

The black leaders and elected officials I spoke with said they had no doubt about the sincerity of Mehlman's motivations — that he really was uncomfortable heading a party that is so white and is considered with suspicion by so many black Americans. "I think Ken is sincere in wanting to see greater diversity in the Republican Party, in the same way that George Bush wants to see greater diversity in the Republican Party and in his cabinet," says Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat, who attended Harvard Law School with Mehlman. "But what they are not willing to do is fundamentally change a set of priorities, or reorient their party, in a way that is actually going to help the African-American community get ahead."

J.C. Watts, a Republican former congressman from Oklahoma, who has been critical of the White House in its handling of racial issues, says that Mehlman's efforts as chairman "are probably unprecedented in the time I've been a Republican. This is his passion; I think it's in his DNA to do what he is doing."

Mehlman was raised in a Jewish family in Baltimore, his mother a Democrat who voted for Jerry Brown (yes, that Jerry Brown) for president. Mehlman counts the civil rights movement as one of the seminal political events in American history and lists two Democrats (and no Bushes) among his three most influential presidents of the past century: Reagan, F.D.R. and Johnson. "What he did on civil rights makes him one of the great presidents of the 20th century," Mehlman says of Johnson. Mehlman, according to his office, has appeared before 50 black audiences since becoming party leader. When members of the Republican National Committee gathered in Pittsburgh in August 2005 for their annual summer meeting, the banner across the stage read: "Give us a chance, We'll give you a choice — Strengthening Lincoln's legacy."

Three weeks later, Katrina ripped through New Orleans. Mehlman was on the Greek island of Mykonos that week, attending the wedding of Nicolle Devenish, who was then the White House communications director, and Mark Wallace, a deputy director of Bush's 2004 campaign. Mehlman said he followed what was happening, a little helplessly, from his hotel in Greece. "I certainly recognized watching CNN that it was not good," he said. "And it required a large infusion of ouzo. Which I had every night. My answer to Hurricane Katrina was Hurricane Ouzo."

When Bush ran for re-election in 2004, he drew 11 percent of the African-American vote. That counted as progress; in 2000, Bush drew the support of 8 percent of the black electorate. But in a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted last month, just 6 percent of black respondents said they approved of the job the president was doing. And in a separate New York Times/CBS News poll in July, only 9 percent of blacks said they had a favorable opinion of the Republican Party, a year and a half into Mehlman's outreach campaign.

Earlier this month, Mehlman and I had dinner at a restaurant he goes to frequently — Georgia Brown's, a spot not far from the White House that has a large African-American clientele. Mehlman was upset with an article of mine The Times published that described his effort with black voters as faltering, and as he dived into a salad with knife and fork, he argued vigorously that it was wrong to use public-opinion polling as the measure of progress for what he had always said would be a long climb. "If you had told me in the beginning of 2005 that 100 days before the election we would have African-Americans all in striking distance for governor of Ohio, governor of Pennsylvania and senator in Maryland, I would have told you that is incredible," he said.

Ken Mehlman and Karl Rove started every day of the 2004 presidential campaign with a 7 a.m. telephone call, during which they discussed what happened over the past 24 hours and what they wanted to happen over the next 24. It would be the first of what would be — by the account of both men — dozens of daily telephone calls and e-mail messages between the two, going into the night, over the course of nearly two years. Mehlman, who was the White House political director for the first two years of the Bush administration, was officially the campaign manager, and Rove was Bush's chief White House adviser, but Mehlman was the subordinate in this relationship. "Karl was far and away the senior leader," says Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker, talking about the campaign. Bush famously called Rove the "architect" of his victory. Mehlman lifted an eyebrow when I asked him about that. "I don't know — I think a bunch of us were architects," he told me.

The relationship between Mehlman and Rove — two men of similar fascinations, skills and ideologies — has long been at once cooperative and competitive; Mehlman's friends voice private frustration at just how much credit Rove drew for the campaign of 2004, though Mehlman is far too disciplined and corporate to concede any such resentment. But Rove's star has dimmed because of the troubles of the second-term Bush White House and his own legal battles, and heading into the fall the two men appear to be equals in calling the shots on this midterm campaign. And it is Mehlman who is out front — along with the White House's political director, Sara Taylor — immersed in dealing with candidates, contributors and consultants, riding campaign managers, overseeing the latest voter-turnout innovation, determining where money and resources will be spent. Mehlman is the public face of this campaign, giving speeches at events, appearing on television, talking to reporters; Rove has largely kept out of public view. And it is Mehlman, rather than Rove, who seems positioned to take much of the blame if November delivers the first big defeat of the Bush political machine since it took the White House six years ago.

Mehlman's friends say they doubt that he will seek another term as party chairman at the end of the year, no matter the outcome of the election, and that he is interested in entering the private sector, perhaps as a consultant. If anything, this has made him even more intent on maintaining Republican control of Congress; he does not want to be identified with a Republican loss. Still, there is a good argument to be made that the problems darkening the Republican Party this fall have much more to do with what has happened in the building where Rove works than with what has taken place at the headquarters of the Republican National Committee. A Democratic victory in November would add another paragraph to the rather glum second term of the Bush presidency. But it may not say much about the new Republican Party. The G.O.P. under Mehlman has changed the way elections are run and won in this country. That is what Mehlman understood when he told Republican workers in the victory center in Michigan to soldier on, ignore the bad news, flip open their cellphones and call another Republican voter.

Polls Give Both Parties Things To Hang Onto (HC)

By Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, September 24, 2006

GOP touts Bush approval ratings; Dems cite voters' level of discontent

Several polls released last week gave both parties ammunition as they plot strategy with about six weeks until the congressional elections.

Republicans touted a USA Today/Gallup poll that found President Bush's public relations offensive on terrorism may have paid off. His public approval rating rose to 44 percent, from a low in May of 33 percent. The survey also showed that likely voters were evenly split over whether Republicans and Democrats should be elected to Congress. Other polls have given Democrats an advantage on that question, although most surveys included registered voters rather than the smaller sample of likely voters.

Meanwhile, a New York Times/CBS poll bolstered the Democrats' argument that they will benefit from a sour public mood toward Washington. The survey found that Congress's approval had dipped to 25 percent, the lowest level for lawmakers since 1994, when Republicans ousted Democrats from control of Capitol Hill.

Only 39 percent in the Times poll said their representatives had done good enough jobs in Congress to deserve reelection; 48 percent said it was time to give someone new a chance.

Experts warned about reading too much into changes registered in any one survey. Karlyn Bowman, a polling expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, noted the "extraordinary continuity" in polling data over the past year, with pessimism pervading public attitudes.

Whether Democrats can win the 15 House seats and six Senate seats needed to take back control of the chambers may depend on whether they can counter a well-funded voter turnout effort by the GOP.

Financial reports released last week by party operations showed that at the end of August, Republicans had $94 million on hand, compared with $76 million for the Democrats. The GOP advantage is largely the result of fund-raising by the Republican National Committee, which had $39 million compared with the Democratic National Committee's $11 million.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean has diverted much of his party's funds to building up party operations in 50 states, causing friction with House and Senate Democrats who wanted the money spent in competitive races.

Retirement boosts Democrat's chances

One of the best chances for a Democratic pickup in the House this year is a border district in Arizona that has been represented by Rep. Jim Kolbe, a moderate Republican and one of three openly gay House members.

Kolbe's retirement set off a fight among local Republicans, with Randy Graf, who stressed his hard-line stands on immigration, winning the GOP primary this month. Graf, however, was opposed by national Republicans, who feared he is too conservative to win a district that includes the university town of Tucson.

Kolbe has refused to endorse Graf against former Democratic state Sen. Gabrielle Gifford. The independent Cook Political Report last week changed its assessment of the seat from a toss-up to leaning Democrat.

Incumbents locked in tight Senate races

Senate incumbents in Ohio and New Jersey are fighting for their political lives, according to polls released last week.

In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez trailed his Republican opponent, state Sen. Thomas Kean Jr., by 3 percentage points, according to the Quinnipiac University poll.

Even though New Jersey is a Democratic leaning state, Menendez has been dogged by ethical questions regarding a property he rented to a charity for which he helped secure federal funding.

In Ohio, Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing his Democratic challenger, U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 4 percentage points, according to the Ohio Poll by the University of Cincinnati.

DeWine may be suffering from voter disgust over ethical problems hanging over other state Republicans.

Pelosi Takes Barbs In Pursuit Of Gavel (AP-Y)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Rep. Nancy Pelosi stuffs cotton in her ears when she takes her grandkids to a rock concert. She's so petite that a policeman once lifted her out of her shoes during an evacuation of the Capitol. She's a chocoholic with a great giggle.

DOJ_NMG_0068348

And she's Exhibit A as Republicans argue that Americans would be crazy to let Democrats take over the House.

"A disaster," former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich warns, calling the prospect of the San Francisco-area congresswoman standing third in the line of presidential succession truly frightening. "A hyperpartisan obstructionist," a GOP campaign tract pronounces.

Pelosi, leader of the House Democrats, has twice presented Republican Dennis Hastert with the speaker's gavel as the GOP extended its control of the House for two more years. "This is getting tiresome, Mr. Speaker," Pelosi joked last time.

Now, heading into the November elections in which Democrats have their best chance yet of retaking the House after 12 years in the minority, all sides are taking the measure of the woman who would become the first "Madam Speaker" if her party succeeds.

"It's the battle of definitions," said Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in California who has written extensively about Congress. "If the Republicans have their way, she's a wacko San Francisco liberal; if Democrats have their way she's an Italian-American grandmother."

Or, as Pelosi described herself this week: "An Italian Catholic mother of five, grandmother of five, going on six."

In truth, Pelosi, born Nancy D'Alesandro, is an energetic, street-smart politician from Baltimore, a liberal who knows that the key to leading the fractious House Democrats is to accommodate the broad spectrum of views in the party when possible and come down hard to enforce unity when necessary.

Pelosi, the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors, moved west in her 20s because her investment banker husband wanted to return to his roots. She managed to work herself into California's Democratic political structure while raising five children who were born over six years. She was first elected to Congress when her youngest daughter reached high school.

The 66-year-old Pelosi represents one of the country's most liberal congressional districts, taking in much of San Francisco. She has a voting record that consistently gets her laurels from liberal interest groups and raspberries from conservatives.

She also is a pragmatist.

"She's good at counting noses, which means that she'll do everything she can to represent the whole caucus," says Bruce Reed, president of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. "She'll have to."

California Rep. Dennis Cardoza, one the Blue Dog Democrats who advocate fiscal restraint, is quick to point out that Pelosi has promised to make an early push for reinstating "pay-as-you-go" budgeting rules. These require that any tax cuts or increases in entitlement spending be paid for by raising taxes or cutting spending elsewhere.

"You wear members out if you ask them to go to the well on every single vote," said Rep. Anna Eshoo, a California Democrat who has known Pelosi for three decades.

But, Eshoo adds, "When it comes to the votes that really define Democratic Party principles, she, in her very strengthful and convincing way, sits down with one member after another to present that case."

Pelosi presides over a Democratic caucus, united against President Bush, in which members voted with their party 88 percent of the time in 2005, one of the most cohesive records in decades, according to an analysis by Congressional Quarterly.

That is not to suggest the party lacks fissures, though, or that Pelosi operates only through gentle persuasion.

Black members, for example, were irked earlier this year when Pelosi successfully pushed to strip Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, of his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee while an FBI bribery investigation is still under way.

In 2002, Pelosi raised eyebrows by giving a political contribution to one of two House Democrats who were being thrown into the same, newly redrawn congressional district in Michigan. It was no coincidence that Pelosi backed Rep. Lynn Rivers, who had supported Pelosi's bid to become Democratic whip, over Rep. John Dingell, who had been allied with Pelosi's competition. Dingell won.

Pelosi helps instill loyalty with cold cash: Her political action committee, PAC to the Future, has given nearly $450,000 to federal candidates this election cycle, which ranks 15th among all leadership PACs and is exceeded by only two other Democrats, according to the private Center for Responsive Politics.

"No one is working harder to bring us out of the desert," says Eshoo. "This woman is a human tornado."

DOJ_NMG_0068349

Rutgers political science professor Ross Baker said that as a leader of the Democratic minority, Pelosi has been tireless at "conducting a guerrilla warfare against a vastly superior force." Her weaknesses, he said, include the Democrats' failure to offer a clear message to counter the Republicans and her sometimes halting television presence. "She needs some work in the green room," he said.

"My hunch is that there is some uneasiness in the House about her as speaker," Baker said, saying that such reservations are tied partly to her representation of such a liberal district.

Pelosi demurs when asked to talk about a potential Speaker Pelosi's agenda, saying she is focused for now on Nov. 7, when Democrats need to pick up 15 House seats to take control of the House. But she has promised to put in reforms to make the House operate with more civility, fairness and fiscal accountability.

Early policy actions probably would include a push to:

_increase the minimum wage.

_revise the Medicare prescription drug program to provide more help to the elderly.

_put in place recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

_overhaul immigration policy.

_make it easier to get student loans.

_reduce subsidies for oil companies.

With Pelosi leading the House, Democrats could be expected to let most of Bush's tax cuts expire and block any new effort to privatize parts of Social Security.

Pitney, the California political scientist, predicts that Pelosi's talk of treating Republicans more fairly than they have dealt with Democrats "would be the first casualty of a Pelosi speakership. ... With a narrow majority and a lot of passionate partisans on her side, she is going to have to play very, very tough with procedure."

The president merely snapped, "That's not going to happen," when The Wall Street Journal asked him what Pelosi might be like as speaker.

But other Republicans are happy to expound on the likely hallmarks of a Pelosi-led House, using them as a GOP rallying cry.

In a recent eight-page release, "America Weakly," the Republican National Committee cast Pelosi as a tax-raising, soft-on-terrorim, extreme-on-abortion, questionable-on-ethics liberal who wants the nation to "cut-and-run" from Iraq and would focus on "launching bitter partisan investigations" of the Bush administration, including possible impeachment hearings.

Eager to douse any speculation about impeachment, Pelosi's office earlier this year put out word that she privately had advised the Democratic caucus that impeachment was off the table.

"It speaks volumes that she felt it necessary to deny it," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres.

Falwell Says Faithful Fear Clinton More Than Devil (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The evangelical leader tells a conference that the New York senator will mobilize his base like no one else if she runs for president.

WASHINGTON — Nothing will motivate conservative evangelical Christians to vote Republican in the 2008 presidential election more than a Democratic nominee named Hillary Rodham Clinton — not even a run by the devil himself.

That was the sentiment expressed by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, the longtime evangelical icon and founder of the once-powerful Moral Majority, during private remarks Friday to church pastors and activists as part of the Values Voter Summit hosted this weekend by the country's leading Christian conservatives.

A recording of Falwell's comments was obtained by The Times, and his remarks were confirmed by eyewitnesses.

"I certainly hope that Hillary is the candidate," Falwell said, according to the recording. "She has $300 million so far. But I hope she's the candidate. Because nothing will energize my [constituency] like Hillary Clinton."

Cheers and laughter filled the room as Falwell continued: "If Lucifer ran, he wouldn't."

DOJ_NMG_0068350

At that moment in the recording, Falwell's voice is drowned out by hoots of approval. But two in attendance, including a Falwell staff member, confirmed that Falwell said that even Lucifer, the fallen angel synonymous with Satan in Christian theology, would not mobilize his followers as much as the New York senator and former first lady would.

One critic who has been observing the conference said Saturday that Falwell's words offered a rare glimpse into how religious conservative leaders were planning to inflame opposition to the Democrats with below-the-radar messages that are often more scorching than the ones showing up in public.

"He was calling Hillary Clinton a demonic figure and openly arguing that God is a Republican," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "It's hard to know whether people thought he was joking or serious, but once you start using religious imagery and invoking a politician in this way, it's not funny. A lot of people who listen to him do think that she's a dark force of evil in America."

Such controversy is nothing new for Falwell, who once described Islam's prophet Muhammad as a terrorist and said that abortion providers, feminists, gays and lesbians were to blame for the 9/11 attacks.

An aide to Falwell said Saturday that the Lucifer reference was an "off the cuff" comment and that Falwell "had no intentions of demonizing her."

Falwell's remarks about Clinton were part of a 40-minute address at a private breakfast that included assurances that God would preserve a Republican majority in Congress and that moderates such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani could not be allowed to win the GOP presidential nomination.

Falwell's estimation of Clinton's campaign war chest appeared to be hyperbole; she has raised about $47 million for her Senate account this cycle, according the Center for Responsive Politics. But she has raised millions more for other candidates, and many strategists believe that if she decides to run, Clinton will amass record-level contributions.

Falwell wasn't the only public figure to invoke Satan in reference to a political adversary last week. Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez referred to President Bush as the devil before the United Nations General Assembly, speaking the day after Bush had stood at the same rostrum.

About two hours after Falwell's speech at the Values Voter Summit, James Dobson, founder of the influential group Focus on the Family, spoke publicly at the same conference. Dobson denounced what he said was a limp response by both political parties to Chavez's comment. Dobson, whose group was a sponsor of the weekend gathering, told the nearly 2,000 activists crammed into a hotel ballroom near downtown Washington that Chavez had "attacked our president viciously."

"And there has hardly been a statement of defense out of members of Congress about that," Dobson said. "There's been [only] a few pantywaist comments."

Neither Falwell nor Dobson responded to interview requests.

One conference official, Family Research Council President Tony Perkins, said Saturday that he believed Falwell intended his comment to be a "humorous remark."

Asked if he was comfortable with the connotation, Perkins deferred questions to Falwell.

"I can only be responsible for what I say," Perkins said, adding that he disagreed with Falwell that a Clinton candidacy would be good for conservatives. "I think it would be a little too risky. Anything could happen, and that's just one step closer to her actually being elected."

Falwell's remarks about Clinton were not the only indication this weekend that the evangelical movement was focused on the senator from New York.

One meeting on the agenda featured three analysts from the conservative Heritage Foundation for a discussion of health policy titled "The Future of Health Care: HillaryCare or Values-Driven Health Care?" The title was referring to Clinton's 1993 efforts to draft a national health plan that conservatives continue to deride as a form of big-government socialism.

But Falwell's speech captured the spirit of much of the weekend, which was devoted to rewing up the GOP base for November and beyond, and included appearances from several prospective Republican presidential candidates — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Sam Brownback of Kansas.

At the breakfast, Falwell made it clear that he thought the 2008 nominee must be a true conservative.

DOJ_NMG_0068351

"It can't be a Giuliani and it cannot be a [New York Gov. George E.] Pataki," he said. "It cannot be a pro-choice. It cannot be a person on the wrong side of the social issues. We've got to have somebody worth fighting for because we will be energized if Hillary is the standard-bearer."

Falwell predicted that this year's midterm elections would go in the GOP's favor, despite polls showing Democrats in position to make gains.

"I think we're going to keep the House and the Senate," he said. "I think the Lord will take care of that."

GOP Hopefuls Audition At 'Values Voters' Summit (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Potential Republican presidential candidates spent the weekend rewing up evangelical "values voters" by pledging to keep up the fight against abortion and same-sex "marriage," and to protect religious freedom.

Sens. George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, as well as Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee participated in the Family Research Council's "2006 Values Voter Summit," which drew about 1,800 conservative activists to the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was scheduled to address the crowd last night.

Mr. Santorum, who is in a bruising re-election battle, was among several who strongly advocated marriage as being only between one man and one woman.

"I believe the family is the central unit of our society and marriage is the glue that holds it together," he said yesterday in a recorded speech. Mr. Santorum had planned to attend the summit, but his visit was canceled because of a family obligation.

The two-term senator, who is trailing his Democratic opponent in polls, said that like others in the crowd, he has "paid a price" for taking a strong stand against abortion and same-sex "marriage" but will continue the fight. The audience applauded when he said life begins at conception.

Mr. Santorum's comments echoed those made Friday by Mr. Huckabee, who said, "Marriage has been between a man and a woman for all time, in all civilizations."

For his part, Mr. Allen called for protecting religious freedom, private-property rights and traditional marriage and urged immigration reform.

"We shouldn't reward illegal behavior with amnesty," he said Friday to loud cheers.

There did not appear to be a strong consensus among the attendees on which Republican leads the field of possible White House contenders for 2008.

"I'm impressed with all of them, because they're speaking my language," said Janis Christensen of North Ogden, Utah.

"I think George has got a shot at being the next president," said Doug Hesse of Eatonton, Ga., who heard Mr. Allen speak for the first time on Friday. "He was articulate; I was impressed."

"I like Mitt Romney," said Judy Boteler of Roanoke, adding that it was the first time she had "zeroed in on him."

Her husband, Bruce, said he liked all the potential Republican presidential candidates but didn't see any of them "running above the crowd" yet.

"We don't see any Ronald Reagans," he said. He quickly added of the Democratic field: "I don't see any Harry Trumans, either."

"We were impressed with all of them," said Margaret Blackwood of Hartselle, Ala. When asked who she would vote for, she said, "I think it would be Mitt Romney, but I could change my mind."

Several other possible presidential contenders were invited to the conference but didn't attend. They were Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, as well as Republican Sens. Bill Frist of Tennessee and John McCain of Arizona.

DOJ_NMG_0068352

Outside the event yesterday, a small group of protesters held signs with slogans, such as "Hate is not a family value" and "Focus on your own Darn Family." The latter referred to Focus on the Family, the conservative group led by evangelical icon James Dobson, who was a frequent speaker at the conference.

The Tide's In For Independents (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

The independence being demonstrated all over the political spectrum these days -- by Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman and Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee, both in tough reelection battles, and by Republican Sens. John McCain and John Warner -- has its roots in American history. When they ran for the presidential nomination, Ronald Reagan and John Kennedy defied the preferences of their parties' power brokers. And earlier, Teddy Roosevelt and Abe Lincoln did the same thing.

The American people often have been equally ready to discard conventional wisdom by rewarding independence and those candidates who, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, show "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." In my view, and that of many others, had Colin Powell chosen to run for president in 2000, in either party or in none, he could have been elected -- his character and reputation overcoming any partisan ties and any lingering racial prejudice.

Instead, we had George W. Bush, a president who has governed on party-line votes and who, after taking the country to war in Iraq, repeatedly has used the war on terrorism as a partisan weapon against Democrats.

Powell will not run in 2008, but if this year's election strengthens the hands of the independent members of both parties -- those who are prepared to defy the dictates of their interest groups and clamorous extremes -- the next presidential race may be very different from recent cycles.

Who could provide such a contest? On the Republican side, either of the two men atop the early polls, McCain or former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani. Giuliani has flourished in Democratic New York by defying his party's rigid doctrine on social issues. McCain has challenged everything from the first of President Bush's deep tax cuts to Bush's recent demand for a free hand in questioning and trying alleged terrorists.

I also would guess that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney would be such a candidate. Like Giuliani, he has governed in Democratic territory, and he managed with an overwhelmingly Democratic legislature to pass a major step toward universal health care coverage.

On the Democratic side, Sen. Hillary Clinton would, if she runs, provide a crucial test case for the independence movement. Though tied to some of the party's most important constituencies, she has, like her husband before her, carved her own path in policymaking. Friends say that she has learned in her Senate service to value some of the members of the opposite party she previously distrusted, and she has followed the example of Sen. Ted Kennedy in seeking Republican co-sponsorship of her bills.

Clinton is not alone among possible Democratic aspirants in showing her independence. Others, such as Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and former Virginia governor Mark Warner, have demonstrated their ability to conciliate differences without abandoning principles. And the field of potential candidates who are moderate is a large one. A race involving any of these people would provide more substantive debate than cheap shots and demagoguery.

And looking beyond 2008, think about a future contest involving Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- or any of many other pairs of younger talents, with similarly inclusive and expansive views of the national interest. What a boon for the country.

But is this rosy scenario likely? Look at the powerful forces working against it. Congress is rigged to promote partisanship and extremism. Most congressional districts are drawn to favor one party or the other, and contests take place only in primaries, where low turnouts favor candidates who appeal to the motivated extremes. The flow of special-interest money into congressional races adds to this tilt, and now the bloggers are pummeling anyone who deviates from their definition of ideological purity.

The sequencing of presidential primaries, it is said, has the same effect on the race for the White House. Democratic aspirants have to satisfy the lefties to win Iowa, just as Republicans must placate the religious right to have a chance in South Carolina.

All that may be true. But still the forces of the independent center are gaining. The public disgust with the breakdown of Congress as a functioning institution has liberated more House and Senate candidates to challenge the status quo. They may be the same people, but they're not behaving the same way.

And the political environment is changing. More and more traditional conservatives are complaining that the Bush administration is wrecking their heritage, with its reckless military, foreign and fiscal policies and its disregard for the law. I hear this regularly and have reported it. David Brooks has been making that same point in his influential New York Times columns.

The tide is turning against dogmatism -- and toward political independence.

Bush Sending Delegation To Lebanon (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

President Bush announced Saturday that he is sending a delegation to Lebanon to meet with Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and discuss ways to help rebuild his nation left in ruins after this summer's 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah.

Dina Habib Powell, an Egyptian-born former White House official who is now assistant secretary of state for promoting educational and cultural exchange, will lead the five-member delegation.

The other four delegation members are: Jeffrey Feltman, U.S. ambassador to Lebanon; John Chambers, president and chief executive officer of Cisco Systems; Yousif Ghafari, chairman of GHAFARI Inc.; and Ray Irani, chairman, chief executive officer and president of Occidental Petroleum Corp.

In a statement, the White House also announced that Chambers, Ghafari and Irani along with Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp., are launching a nationwide effort to encourage private donations for reconstruction needed as a result of the conflict. In coming days, the group will ask Americans to donate money to a fund set up to help the Lebanese people, the White House said.

Lebanon's Three-Sided Postwar Game: Who Gets Shabaa Farms? (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

SHABAA, Lebanon — Disarming Hezbollah, the militant Lebanese Shiite group that fought Israel last month, is a major goal in Washington, Jerusalem and even among the political elite in Beirut. But the main stumbling block, at least according to Hezbollah's current position, is a 10-mile-square area of hilly land known as Shabaa Farms.

Israel and the United Nations say the land belongs to Syria and is part of the Golan Heights that has been occupied by Israel since the 1967 war. But the Lebanese insist it is theirs, and Hezbollah says it will not lay down its weapons until Israel gives it back.

"As long as we have evidence that we own that land, Hezbollah must fight," said Qassem Saab, 52, reiterating Hezbollah's position. Mr. Saab, a Sunni Muslim, was born in his family's mud-brick house on the now-occupied land.

When the long and bloody civil war ended in 1990, all of Lebanon's warring militias agreed to give up their arms — except Hezbollah, which argued that it needed to keep its weapons to fight Israel, then occupying southern Lebanon.

Israel and many other observers say the Lebanese claim on Shabaa Farms gained traction only when Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000.

According to that view, Hezbollah, backed by Syria, has seized on the farms as a way of legitimizing what it describes as continued resistance against Israeli occupation. Whether or not that claim is legitimate, it is one of the central issues in bringing a sustainable peace to the region.

"Shabaa is the key," said Patrick Renaud, the European Union's representative in Lebanon.

Of course, there is no guarantee that Hezbollah will disarm if the Shabaa Farms area is transferred to Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0068354

[The leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, told a crowd in the Beirut suburbs on Sept. 22 that no army could force the militia to disarm. He said that even after the 34-day war with Israel, Hezbollah was stronger, and that it had more than 20,000 missiles.]

"Shabaa is important," a Hezbollah Politburo member, Ahmad Malli, said during an interview last week. "But maintaining the sovereignty of Lebanon is more important. We will keep our weapons as long as there is a real threat from Israel."

Even so, the coalition of Lebanese parties opposed to Hezbollah says that removing the Shabaa issue would, at the very least, give it more leverage in pressing Hezbollah to give up its arms.

Israel sees it the other way around. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that if Lebanon fulfilled its obligations under the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting — including the disarming of Hezbollah — then Israel would be willing to discuss Shabaa Farms.

For as long as anyone here can remember, the people of Shabaa say they have farmed the southwestern slope of the Mount Hermon foothills, overlooking the Hula Valley of what is now northern Israel.

After France split Lebanon from Syria in the 1920's, most maps showed the border running between the town of Shabaa and the farms. It is one of many pockets of land that were separated from their historic administrative jurisdictions when the Great Powers carved up the Levant, as the region was known, after World War I.

But the maps were moot as far as people on the ground were concerned. Though the French-drawn border put the Shabaa Farms in Syria, the people who owned the farms continued to pay taxes to the government of Beirut and continued to register births, deaths and other events in Lebanon.

The Lebanese say a study commissioned by President Adib al-Shishakli of Syria in 1951 and finally published in 1964 found that the farms were part of Lebanon and that the maps showing them in Syria were wrong. Even Syria still agrees that the farms are Lebanese.

The original 14 farms were divided and passed down through the generations to eventually become 14 hamlets of 20 or 30 houses each. By the time Israel took over the territory, about 200 families shared the land. Sitting in his parlor here, Mohamed Ibrahim Atui, 80, unfolded a stained handwritten deed from 1952 recording his purchase "of 32 olive trees."

"My father sold the land to Mohammad Mahdi in the 1940's, and I bought it from him," Mr. Atui said. He keeps the deed hidden in his house for safekeeping.

Besides olive trees, Mr. Atui said he raised grapes, corn, tomatoes and chickpeas on the land. But he has not seen his land since 1970. "The Palestinians were firing rockets at Israel from the area and so Israel began occupying the land, farm by farm, until they pushed us here," Mr. Atui said.

While protection from such attacks is the primary reason Israel occupied the farms, many Lebanese say that water is the reason Israel is reluctant to let the territory go. Springs and streams fed by the melting snow from Mount Hermon irrigate northern Israel and form the principal tributaries of the Jordan River.

"It's not security, it's water," said the Druse leader, Walid Jumblat.

Shabaa is a Sunni Muslim town, and Mr. Atui, like most of the townspeople, is a staunch supporter of the late Sunni prime minister, Rafik Hariri. Many people in Lebanon contend he was assassinated at the behest of Syria, which backs Hezbollah.

The assassination has driven a wedge between Sunni Hariri supporters and Shiite Hezbollah supporters elsewhere in the country. But the Sunnis of Shabaa support Hezbollah nonetheless.

Hezbollah's persistent attacks are widely credited here with forcing Israel to withdraw that year.

Mr. Atui says he believes that Hezbollah is the only reason Israel would ever give back the farms, because the Lebanese Army and government are so passive on the issue.

The problem for Lebanon is that the United Nations certified that the 2000 Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon was complete. Until the United Nations recognizes Shabaa as Lebanese territory, Israel has no reason to leave unless it withdraws from all of the Golan Heights. The United Nations wants Lebanon and Syria to decide where the border lies before it takes any action.

But Syria — even though it publicly supports Lebanon's claim to the land — is apparently happy to let the issue simmer, hoping it will lead to negotiations with Israel over the return of the larger territory seized by Israel in the 1967 war.

"Shabaa Farms, from the Syrian point of view, won't be delineated as long as the Golan is occupied," said a political analyst in Damascus who is close to the Syrian government, who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "When you delineate one side you delineate the other, but what is the other, Syria or Israel? Delineating the border would be legitimizing the Israeli occupation."

Like many Lebanese, Mr. Atui contends that once the landowners have recovered their land, Hezbollah will no longer need a militia.

"Hezbollah should continue until the farms are liberated and the prisoners are free, but after that they should put all of their forces under the Lebanese Army," he said. "God willing, they'll do it."

Mr. Saab said, "It's Nasrallah's last reason to fight Israel."

U.S. Delegation for Lebanon

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A delegation of business leaders will head an effort to encourage Americans to donate money to assist the people of Lebanon in the aftermath of the recent war between Hezbollah and Israel, President Bush said Saturday.

Delegation members also will meet with Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and local business leaders in Beirut, the White House said.

The effort will be headed by Craig R. Barrett, the chairman of Intel; John T. Chambers, the chief executive of Cisco Systems; Yousif Ghafari, the chairman of Ghafari; and Ray R. Irani, the chief executive of Occidential Petroleum.

Delusion In Damascus (WP)

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Bashar Assad believes that Syria won the Lebanese war.

IN THE aftermath of the summer war in Lebanon, the Middle East is haunted by the hubris of two self-declared winners. Israel and Hezbollah, which did the actual fighting, are both licking their wounds. But Iran is in a triumphalist mood, as the rhetoric of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at the United Nations last week confirmed. And so, it seems, is Hezbollah's other foreign sponsor, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. Countries around the region are responding to what they see as the new strategic menace from Tehran; witness Egypt's announcement that it would soon propose its own nuclear program. But Syria is more likely to trigger a new round of armed conflict in the near future.

The threat stems from Mr. Assad's overt resistance to the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended the war. Among other provisions, the resolution mandated the expansion of a U.N. peacekeeping force along the Lebanese-Israeli border and prohibited any state from helping Hezbollah to rearm. Mr. Assad has denounced the deployment of European troops as part of the U.N. force; last week he described it as a Western plot to divide the Arab world. More significantly, he has threatened that any deployment of the force along the Lebanese-Syrian border would be treated by Damascus as hostile.

Mr. Assad's bluster has successfully deterred the Lebanese and Western governments from taking serious steps to stop the traffic of arms and explosives from Syria to Lebanon. The scores of roads and tracks crossing the border have been the principal routes for missiles and other arms supplies to Hezbollah. They also carry the bombs that Syria's agents have used in a continuing assassination campaign against Lebanese politicians who favor the country's independence from Damascus.

Mr. Assad knows that if he attempts to supply Hezbollah with new weapons he will invite an attack by Israel, which has vowed to prevent any resupply. The Syrian president even referred to that possibility in an interview published last week. But he appears undeterred. In a speech last month he declared that Hezbollah's "victory" in the war had ushered in "a new Middle East," one in which the "enemy" Israel would inevitably be defeated by force of arms. When U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan arrived two weeks later to ask for Syria's cooperation in implementing the resolution, Mr. Assad treated him to "a diatribe . . . depicting the Western powers as bankrupt and powerless," according to a report by Warren Hoge of the New York Times.

Remarkably, Mr. Annan emerged from that meeting to tell the world that Mr. Assad had assured him that Syria would take steps to secure the border. The many statesmen who have tried to do business with the Syrian president in the past -- such as former secretary of state Colin L. Powell or Egypt's Hosni Mubarak -- have discovered that such assurances are not only worthless but deliberately mendacious. Yet Mr. Annan and the European governments deploying troops to Lebanon are essentially counting on those words -- rather than firm measures of their own -- to prevent a new crisis in which their own soldiers would be at risk. That's a lot to expect from a callow and corrupt dictator who believes he is on top of a "new" Middle East.

Setback On Forming Palestinian Coalition (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

CAIRO, Sept. 23 (AP) — Efforts to form a Palestinian government acceptable to the West have gone "back to zero," the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Saturday, a day after the militant faction Hamas said a coalition that recognized Israel would be unacceptable.

Hamas won elections in January, but agreed this month to share power with Mr. Abbas's Fatah in hopes of ending a crippling international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority.

The Hamas-Fatah coalition deal sidestepped recognition, saying the government would seek a Palestinian state alongside Israel, which implies recognition. However, the United States and Israel demanded a clear Hamas commitment, and Mr. Abbas was forced to revisit the issue.

At the United Nations on Thursday, Mr. Abbas indicated that a unity government would recognize Israel. But the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said the next day that he would not lead a coalition that recognizes Israel.

Mr. Abbas said Saturday during a visit to Cairo to meet with President Hosni Mubarak that "backtracking took place" on the negotiations for a unity government with Hamas. "Sadly, we are back to zero," he said.

A CONVERSATION WITH MAHMOUD AHMADINEJAD (WP)

Lally Weymouth

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Do you think it would be in Iran's best interest to move toward a normal relationship with the United States?

We are interested in having talks with everyone. We believe that talks are much better than threats and confrontation. We are currently holding talks with many countries. I have said before that the United States is no exception, but the U.S. administration -- that is, a section of the U.S. administration -- does not create the right circumstances. It destroys chances for constructive talks.

Because a part of the administration wants to overthrow your regime?

It is the behavior I am talking about; the attitude is inappropriate. They believe that they own the entire world so they speak from that position, looking down at us -- even when they meet us. If they change their behavior, it is possible to talk about everything. Some politicians in the United States think that the nuclear issue is a way to put pressure on Iran, but they are wrong. One that has actually produced and used nuclear bombs cannot claim that they now want to stop proliferation.

Why don't you let the IAEA inspectors back in, as the U.N. Security Council demanded last summer?

The Security Council's involvement is, in fact, illegal. We are working under the framework of the IAEA, and the cameras are on our sites. Could you please show me at least one report by the IAEA on the United States' nuclear facilities?

Are you really serious when you say that Israel should be wiped off the face of the Earth?

We need to look at the scene in the Middle East -- 60 years of war, 60 years of displacement, 60 years of conflict, not even a day of peace. Look at the war in Lebanon, the war in Gaza -- what are the reasons for these conditions? We need to address and resolve the root problem.

Your suggestion is to wipe Israel off the face of the Earth?

Our suggestion is very clear: . . . Let the Palestinian people decide their fate in a free and fair referendum, and the result, whatever it is, should be accepted. . . . The people with no roots there are now ruling the land.

You've been quoted as saying that Israel should be wiped off the face of the Earth. Is that your belief?

What I have said has made my position clear. If we look at a map of the Middle East from 70 years ago . . .

So, the answer is yes, you do believe that it should be wiped off the face of the Earth?

DOJ_NMG_0068357

Are you asking me yes or no? Is this a test? Do you respect the right to self-determination for the Palestinian nation? Yes or no? Is Palestine, as a nation, considered a nation with the right to live under humane conditions or not? Let's allow those rights to be enforced for these 5 million displaced people.

If the Palestinian people decided that they wanted a two-state solution, would you support that decision?

The politicians in the United States should allow the Palestinians to vote, and then we'll all respect the results. They won't even accept a small Palestinian state. That's why we think the root cause of the crisis must be addressed. Jews, like other individuals, will have to be respected. It's not necessary to occupy the land of others, to displace them, to imprison their young people and to destroy their homes and agricultural fields and to attack neighboring countries.

What is your analysis of Hezbollah in Lebanon today? What has been the impact of the war?

Everybody has said that the attacks of the Israeli government against Lebanon were pre-planned. The question is: The planes that leveled Lebanon, the laser bombs, where did they come from? Who provided the Zionists with the armaments? Who prevented a cease-fire in the beginning?

I think a section within the U.S. administration must take a new look at the Middle East. They should not assume that they can fix the problems of the Middle East through war.

In your meeting with the Iraqi prime minister last week, did any ideas emerge as to how to stabilize the situation in Iraq?

Saddam was a detested individual, no doubt, and although he was supported by a group of American politicians during the eight-year war with Iran, we nonetheless were happy when he left. This paved the way for the American government to improve their relations with the people in the region, but they lost the opportunity -- they decided to occupy Iraq in search of oil and their own interests. . . . The Iraqi nation has deep roots -- an ancient, civilized culture -- it cannot accept to remain under occupation. It cannot accept that its authorities are told on a daily basis what to do by American authorities. In the past years, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi civilians have been killed. Even worse than what it was under Saddam.

Everybody in Iraq is unhappy. Iraq has a government now that has risen as a result of the vote of the people and it has a constitution and a parliament. Let them run and administer the country. Our policy is to support the government of Iraq, to create security for the country.

It seems as if a Shiite majority has emerged with the bulk of power in Iraq. Is this good from Iran's point of view?

We are friends with the entire nation of Iraq. Our nation is like an extended family of the Iraqi nation. . . . We are not like American politicians who divide people and fracture.

[Prime Minister Nouri al-]Maliki has said that the most important job for him is to control the militias, many of which have close contact with Iran and some of which receive money from Iran. Will you help Prime Minister Maliki control the militias?

This is your mistake again. Mr. Maliki is a friend of ours. Our nations are very close. The country that is hurt most by the insecurity in Iraq is our country.

Everyone in the region says Iran is now the most powerful country -- that the result of the U.S. invasion is that Iran is more powerful than it has ever been.

Do you think there is a problem with Iran being a powerful country? Are you implying that the Americans went there to strengthen Iran?

No, but don't you think that is the end result?

Iran is a powerful country. A powerful Iran will benefit the region because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country. If the Americans had not imposed the shah, Iran could have been a far more powerful country.

Are you going to continue backing terror groups -- Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad?

Are you here on a mission or are you a journalist? A journalist does not judge. You say that Hamas is a terror group. Hamas is working in its own territory, in its own country. Why do you call them terrorists? If someone occupied the United States and the American people rose to defend their home, would you call the American people terrorists?

I would say they were terrorists if they started killing civilians.

The Palestinian people have the right to live. Gaza is being bombarded. Homes are being destroyed. Why? Because some politicians in the United States insist on supporting the Zionists at the cost of destroying the Palestinians and buying the hatred of all the nations in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0068358

This will work against the American government because anti-American sentiment and hatred is increasing by the day. One day it could turn into a storm.

You've made statements about the Holocaust, saying maybe it was exaggerated. Is that your opinion?

It's not the numbers that are important here. It's a very fundamental question: When we allow all researchers to do research freely, why don't researchers have the right to research this history as well? Let's remember that 60 million people were killed as a result of World War II. So let's put everything in context and let's research it further. . . . We know this was a historical event that has happened. But why is it that people who question it, even in the smallest sense, are persecuted and attacked?

Are you willing to take any steps to suspend uranium enrichment?

We think that the American politicians should change their attitudes. If they think that by threatening Iran they'll have results, they are wrong. I'll ask you: Who cut ties with Iran? It was the U.S. government. Who imposed the war with Saddam on us? So who is the one who has to give the positive signal, us or the U.S. government?

What do you want the United States to do for you and what are you willing to do in turn for the U.S.?

I sent a very detailed and caring letter [to President Bush]; I truly mean it when I say that I hope Mr. Bush will change his behavior and attitude. It doesn't make us happy that sentiments against him rise on a daily basis around the world. This can be reversed. It's the attitude and the approach of some American politicians that ruins things. They want to return Iran to what it was before the revolution, under the shah, when it was really a puppet for the United States. That's history. It will never come back. The Iranian nation is a free and independent nation with an elected government, a parliament and a constitution.

How can you come to this country and tell our president to change his behavior?

We're just defending our honor.

Ahmadinejad's Gauntlet (WP)

The U.S. and Iran Need Each Other Too Much Not to Find Accommodation

NEW YORK -- The most telling moment in a conversation here last week with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came when he was asked if America would attack Iran. He quickly answered "no," with a slight cock of his head as if he regarded the very idea of war between the two countries as preposterous.

Ahmadinejad's confidence was the overriding theme of his visit. He was like a picador, deftly sticking darts into a wounded bull. As he moved from event to event -- TV and print interviews, a chat with the august Council on Foreign Relations, his lecture to the U.N. General Assembly -- he displayed the same flinty composure. It sometimes seemed as if he owned New York, dispensing his radical bromides like a tidy, compact version of Fidel Castro. I sensed the same certainty that was expressed by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini back when this confrontation began in the late 1970s: "America cannot do a damn thing."

Over the course of a week's time, I had an unusual chance to sit with both President Bush and President Ahmadinejad and hear their thoughts about Iran. The contrasts were striking: Bush is groping for answers to the Iran problem; you sense him struggling for a viable strategy. When I asked what message he wanted to send the Iranian people, Bush seemed eager for more contact: He spoke of Iran's importance, of its great history and culture, of its legitimate rights. He made similar comments in his speech Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, is sitting back and enjoying the attention. He's not groping for anything; he's waiting for the world to come to him. When you boil down his comments, the message is similar to Bush's: Iran wants a diplomatic solution to the nuclear impasse; Iran wants dialogue; Iran wants more cultural exchanges. At one point, Ahmadinejad even said that "under fair conditions," he would favor a resumption of diplomatic relations with the United States.

But if the words of accommodation are there, the music is not. Instead of sending a message to the administration that he is serious about negotiations, Ahmadinejad spent the week playing to the gallery of Third World activists and Muslim revolutionaries with his comments about Israel and the Holocaust. This audience hears the defiant message between the lines: America cannot do a damn thing.

Ahmadinejad is the calmest revolutionary I've ever seen. Sitting in a plush easy chair in his suite at the InterContinental hotel, he barely moves a muscle as he makes the most radical statements. His feet don't jiggle, his hands don't make gestures, his facial expression barely changes. His eyes are the most expressive part of his body -- sparkling one moment, glowering the next, focusing down to dark points when he is angry.

An interview with Ahmadinejad is an intellectual ping-pong match. He bounces back each question with one of his own: Ask about Hezbollah's attacks, and he asks about Israel's attacks. Question his defiance of the United Nations, and he shifts to America's defiance of the world body. In more than an hour of conversation with me and Lally Weymouth of Newsweek, he didn't deviate from his script. Indeed, some of his comments in the interview were repeated almost word for word when he addressed the General Assembly a few hours later. This is a man adept at message control.

The common strand I take away from this week of Iranian-American conversation is that the two countries agree on one central fact: Iran is a powerful nation that should play an important role in the international system. Bush put it to me this way: "I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. . . . I recognize the importance of your sovereignty." Here was Ahmadinejad's formulation, when I asked how Iran could help stabilize Iraq: "A powerful Iran will benefit the region because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country."

That's the challenge: Can America and Iran find a formula that will meet each side's security interests, and thereby allow Iran to return fully to the community of nations after 27 years? Iran can't achieve its ambitions as a rising power without an accommodation with America. America can't achieve its interest in stabilizing the Middle East without help from Iran. The potential for war is there, but so is the bedrock of mutual self-interest. The simple fact is that these two countries need each other.

U.S., Libyan Diplomats Celebrate Ties (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 24, 2006

Top diplomats from the United States and Libya celebrated their newfound friendship Saturday, but disputes remain from more than two decades of hostility.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice points to Libya as a model for other nations after its historic decision to renounce weapons of mass destruction and engage the world, but she has repeatedly put off a splashy trip to Tripoli to inaugurate a U.S. Embassy. The United States quietly upgraded its small diplomatic office in Tripoli to an embassy this summer, but has held no formal ceremony to mark the occasion.

Rice and Libyan Foreign Minister Abdurahman Shalgam discussed cooperation in fighting terrorism, a turnabout for the North African nation that the United States long called a terror sponsor.

A U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the meeting was private, said Rice also emphasized what the United States sees as a need to resolve outstanding legal issues related to the 1988 bombing of Pam Am flight 103.

The Pan Am issue is one of two major sticking points between Washington and Tripoli four months after the United States announced it would establish full diplomatic ties with Libya and remove it from the State Department's list of state terror sponsors.

It was not clear whether Rice and Shalgam aired the other outstanding issue: Libya's treatment of five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor accused of infecting Libyan children with the virus that causes AIDS.

Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi surprised the world in late 2003 when he swore off terrorism and announced plans to dismantle his country's weapons of mass destruction programs. Libya was eager to end the international isolation and economic hardships from United Nations and U.S. sanctions in the Pan Am case, and Gadhafi concluded the weapons programs were best used as a bargaining chip.

The diplomatic thaw began almost immediately, with the opening of a small U.S. diplomatic office in Libya in 2004.

The U.S. had not had formal diplomatic relations with Libya since 1980.

DOJ_NMG_0068360

Although Gadhafi is apparently eager to demonstrate his new status as a U.S. friend, Rice is not expected to pay a visit until the case of the medics is resolved.

The United States says the six should be freed and allowed to go home; Libya says they remain under charge.

The Bush administration went ahead with plans to establish normal diplomatic relations with Libya despite pressure to slow the process from families of Americans killed in the Pan Am bombing.

Libya was held responsible for the airliner bombing, which claimed 270 lives, most of them American.

Families of victims say they are still owed $2 million apiece as part of a settlement that Libya made with the United States. The families have already received $8 million each.

Rice Presses Libyan FM On Terror Compensation (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 24, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed her Libyan counterpart to finalize compensation payments to US victims of Libyan terrorist attacks, one of the last remaining disputes between the former enemy states, a senior US official said.

Rice also urged Foreign Minister Abdurahman Shalgam to release "on humanitarian grounds" five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor convicted of injecting Libyan children with the AIDS virus, the official said.

Their meeting, on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly, was the first between Rice and Shalgam since the United States and Libya established full diplomatic relations in May following a 25-year rupture.

US-Libyan relations have warmed dramatically since the regime of Moamer Kadhafi renounced terrorism and abandoned efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction in late 2003.

A key to the rapprochement was Libyan acknowledgement of responsibility for two terrorist attacks that took US lives: the 1986 bombing of the La Belle disco in Berlin, where two US servicemen were among the victims, and the 1988 destruction of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270.

Libya agreed to pay 10 million US dollars in compensation to the families of each of the Lockerbie victims, but has so far only paid out eight million dollars each.

While Tripoli also reached a compensation agreement for non-US victims of the La Belle bombing, a similar demand by the US victims is still in federal courts.

During Saturday's meeting with Shalgam, Rice "emphasized the need to resolve the outstanding issues related to Pan Am 103 and the La Belle claims," the senior official said on condition of anonymity.

She also "urged a rapid resolution on humanitarian grounds" of the case involving the six foreign medical workers, the official said.

The six have been jailed since 1999 and were sentenced to death by firing squad in May 2004 for "knowingly" injecting over 400 Libyan children with AIDS-tainted blood in a Benghazi hospital. Some 50 of the children have died.

The Libyan Supreme Court quashed the conviction, but a retrial is currently underway in Tripoli and prosecutors have again demanded the death penalty.

Foreign health experts have testified in defense of the six that the AIDS infections were caused by poor hygiene at the hospital long before the arrival of the foreign personnel.

The US State Department has called repeatedly for the release of the six, as well as progress on a number of human rights issues in Libya.

Since the reestablishment of diplomatic relations, which were cut in 1981, a number of senior State Department diplomats have visited Tripoli.

But Rice herself has yet to seal the renewal of ties with a visit of her own, conditioning the trip on the release of the foreign medical workers.

She brushed aside a reporter's question at the start of Saturday's meeting about whether she could visit Libya soon if the issue was resolved.

"We'll let you know our travel plans when we have them," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0068361

The senior official said Rice and Shalgam also discussed counter-terrorism cooperation and efforts to convince the government in neighboring Sudan to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to halt violence in its Darfur region.

'Empower Women,' Rice Tells Female Politicians (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gathered other influential female political leaders to promote the empowerment of their gender.

"We all have experiences we would like to share," she told about 20 female political figures, including Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first elected woman head of state. "We have to promote and empower women," Rice added. "We are going to champion the empowerment of women because it is only right."

Islamists Calm Somali Capital With Restraint (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Sept. 23 — As the sun begins to sink over this broken city, work crews swing their axes over their shoulders and head home.

Young couples take to the waterfront, mingling openly in the salty breeze. Thousands of children flock to soccer fields in the city center, with a backdrop of beautifully crumbled ruins from battles now over.

It is hard to imagine that this is Mogadishu, the same Mogadishu of "Black Hawk Down," and clan against clan and 15 years of anarchy. But over the past three months, the Islamists in control here have defied international expectations — in many ways. Not only have they pacified one of the most dangerous cities in the world, they also seem to have moderated their message.

Instead of acting like the Taliban and ruthlessly imposing a harsh religious orthodoxy, as many feared, the Islamists seem to be trying to increase public support by softening their views, at least officially, delivering social services and pushing for democratic elections.

Islamic leaders are operating almost in campaign mode, organizing street cleanups, visiting hospitals, overseeing a mini building boom and recruiting elderly policemen to don faded uniforms they have not worn for years and return to work. Beyond that, they sent a letter this week to the United Nations Security Council pledging to support democratic rule.

Maybe this is just smooth talk. Or premature signs that could prove misleading. Hard-core elements still operate here, including militiamen who drive around with black scarves and black flags and shoot people for watching Hollywood movies. Young men like them were believed to have killed an Italian nun at a Mogadishu hospital last Sunday, apparently in retaliation for Pope Benedict XVI's remarks on Islam.

But the Islamist leaders say they are rogue elements who will be punished, and they have reopened some movie theaters and issued decrees emphasizing tolerance. Whether they live up to those promises seems to hinge on whether they can, or even want to, rein in the militant groups that helped propel them to power.

"The world was so quick to label us," said Ibrahim Hassan Addou, the foreign minister for the Islamic administration in Mogadishu. "All we are asking is to be judged on our deeds."

The United States continues to assert that the Islamists are sheltering Al Qaeda terrorists. The suicide attack against the United Nations-backed transitional government in Baidoa on Monday only reinforced that suspicion, though the Islamists deny any involvement.

But the darkest fears of a draconian Islam on Africa's east coast have not come true, at least not yet. Boys are allowed to play soccer, and girls are allowed to go to school, despite rumors to the contrary. And businesses are not forced to close during prayer time, as has been widely reported outside of Mogadishu.

In fact, people were selling bread, biscuits and watermelon right in front of the Islamic forces' headquarters during the noon prayer earlier this week. The teenage militia members standing guard regressed to the boys that they were, giggling over giant slices of watermelon and spitting seeds at each other, the juice running down their chins and dripping onto their guns.

DOJ_NMG_0068362

"Nobody knows where we're headed," said Ahmed Mohammed Ali, chairman of a Mogadishu human rights organization. But, he added, the Islamists "pacified this place and brought the clans together."

"Whatever you think about them," he said, "you can't overlook that."

There is a famous story that says much about Somalia. It sounds like a fable, but according to several Somali businessmen, it is sad but true.

There were two close friends who owned a fishery north of Mogadishu. They were like brothers and vowed that if anything ever happened to either of them, the other would take care of the his family. They were from the same clan but from different branches of it, the Saad and the Saleeban. One day the Saad man was caught in a cross-fire and killed accidentally by a Saleeban militia. Within hours, the Saad took their revenge and without consulting the dead man's family shot to death his best friend.

"Anarchy is bad, man," said Adam Daley, a Somali-American businessman living in Mogadishu. "Can you imagine New York City without any police? Or light?"

This is how Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, was since 1991, when clan-based warlords brought down the central government. United States marines and United Nations peacekeepers tried to restore order, but the people rallied behind the warlords and helped drive the foreigners out.

The fighting razed the city's famed Italian architecture and left a leadership vacuum. Gradually, clan elders set up small courts to resolve disputes, using Islamic law to guide them.

Before the war, that might have seemed strange. Somalia used to be a secular place, where women wore skirts and men drank beer.

But in the period of anarchy, the culture changed. After Western aid organizations pulled out, Arab charities rushed in, bringing Koranic schools and more religion.

Militant Islamic groups opened camps in Somalia's deserts. According to terrorism analysts, American intelligence officers began hiring warlords to kidnap terrorism suspects and take them to bases outside Somalia. Often the suspects were innocent imams or businessmen who were soon set free.

By 2004, the Islamist groups teamed up with clan courts and businessmen to protect themselves from the warlords, calling their alliance the Union for Islamic Courts.

Last winter, the warlords announced that they, too, had formed an alliance, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism. It was a well-known fact, buttressed by the annoying aerial drone that buzzed over Mogadishu at night, that they had American support.

That played straight into the hands of the Islamists, who quickly built an army called the Shabab, or youth, made up of young, devout fighters, to overthrow the warlords. The Shabab wore green skull caps and little beards. They did not smoke cigarettes or chew qat, the popular narcotic leaf that had spurred so much of Mogadishu's madness.

People were impressed.

"Every day at noon women were driving to the front lines to bring these guys food," recalled Ali Iman Sharmarke, one of the founders of the HornAfrik television and radio station.

The warlords were steadily pushed back and soon could not trust anyone, including phone operators, whom they suspected of tapping their calls.

"We had no communication or leadership," said Col. Ali Warsame, whose warlord commander ended up fleeing Mogadishu on the back of a donkey and wearing a veil. By the first week of June, all the warlords had been defeated.

The courts' first move was a thank you to their patrons. Within weeks, Mogadishu's port and airport, which had been essentially closed for more than a decade, were open for business.

The courts then took many of the warlords' militiamen to an old army base outside the city.

There, under a searing sun, 700 young men march in circles, chanting, "God is great!" and doing a funny elbow-swinging goose step.

"It's Russian," Col. Muhidin Haji, the camp commander, explained.

DOJ_NMG_0068363

The courts are now focusing on civil administration, with committees on sanitation, reconstruction, education and justice. Investment money is already flowing back in. The streets around Mogadishu's main market are clogged with trucks hauling logs and cement. To oversee all this, the Islamists have appointed university professors, including many educated abroad, to crucial posts.

The Islamists are meeting with leaders from the transitional government based in Baidoa, 150 miles inland, to discuss sharing power. Despite being recognized by the United Nations, the transitional government has very little support among Somalis.

Under a United Nations-backed framework, Somalia is supposed to have elections by 2009. The Islamists say the sooner the better. They know they are the most popular force in the country.

One morning this week, hundreds of men volunteered for an Islamist-organized clean up. With the clap of his hands, the work leader sent them plunging into overgrown thickets to clear brush. "It's an exchange," said Abdul Aziz Issah, one of the workers. "They brought us peace, we give them work."

There is so much of it to do. Huge swaths of the capital have been reduced to ruins, with an arch left here, half a crumbling wall left there. In many places, Mogadishu looks like an ancient city that has been deserted for centuries, just riddled with holes.

Somalian Militia Looks To Take Over Port (AP)

By Mohamed Sheikh Nor

AP, September 24, 2006

Hundreds of Islamic militiamen in heavily armed trucks headed Saturday to the strategic town of Kismayo in what appeared to be an imminent takeover attempt of one of the last seaports outside their control in Somalia, witnesses said.

Key leaders of the Islamic militia — which controls the capital, Mogadishu, along with much of southern Somalia — have been in Kismayo for several days in direct challenge to the warlords who are in control there.

Fearful residents of the town, some 260 miles southwest of Mogadishu, have been fleeing across the border to Kenya in case fighting breaks out.

"I saw 50 trucks from the Islamic courts and more than 300 militiamen who were heading to Kismayo," Quasim Munye told The Associated Press from the coastal town of Brava, which is on the only road that leads to Kismayo. "The trucks were huge and the militias well-prepared."

Somalia has not had an effective national government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another, throwing the country into anarchy.

An official government was formed in 2004 with U.N. help in hopes of restoring order after years of lawlessness. But the Islamic movement seized Mogadishu in June and now controls much of the country's south.

The government controls just one town, Baidoa, 150 miles from the capital, but it has a strong ally in Kismayo. The government's defense minister, Col. Barre "Hirale" Aden Shire, is a member of the Juba Valley Alliance that rules the town.

The United States has accused the Islamic group of sheltering suspects in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden has portrayed Somalia as a battleground in his war on the U.S.

The group's strict and often severe interpretation of Islam raises memories of Afghanistan's Taliban, which was ousted by a U.S.-led campaign for harboring bin Laden and al-Qaida fighters. Still, many residents credit the courts with bringing a semblance of order.

Also this week, Islamic leaders in the capital banned the sale of a leafy stimulant called qat, which is wildly popular among Somalis, during daytime in the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins this weekend. Islamic officials in Balad, about 18 miles from the capital, banned qat altogether during Ramadan.

Islamists consider qat un-Islamic but have generally tolerated it since they came to power. Users chew qat like loose tobacco and experience a mild buzz that lasts for anywhere between 90 minutes to a few hours. It can also cause an elevated heart rate and create a feeling of euphoria.

Kurdish Rebels Suspected In Turkey Blast (AP)

By Selcan Hacaoglu

DOJ_NMG_0068364

AP, September 24, 2006

Suspected Kurdish guerrillas set off an explosive-laden minibus across from a police guest house in eastern Turkey Saturday, injuring 17 people, the governor's office said.

The Ford minibus parked across from the police guest house, went off in eastern city of Igdir on the Armenian border. The blast shattered the windows of the police guest house and other buildings in the area.

Two of the injured were in serious condition, the governor's office said. The injured included five police officers and officials of a small soccer club who traveled from Ankara to Igdir for a match, private Dogan news agency said.

The explosion coincided with complaints by imprisoned rebel chief Abdullah Ocalan about his prison conditions, which were relayed by his lawyers, the pro-Kurdish news agency Firat reported on its Web site on Saturday.

The attack also comes after recent declaration of cooperation between Turkey, the United States and Iraq in fighting the guerrillas, who are based in northern Iraq.

The conflict has claimed the lives of more than 37,000 people since the guerrillas took up arms for autonomy in 1984.

The rebels have recently intensified attacks across the country and have so far ignored a recent call by the pro-Kurdish Democratic Society Party to declare a unilateral cease-fire in the hopes of establishing dialogue with the state.

Earlier Saturday, autonomy-seeking Kurdish rebels detonated a remote-controlled bomb, derailing a freight train in southeastern Turkey, officials said. No injuries were reported in that attack which occurred in the province of Elazig.

In late August, the rebels have also carried out bomb attack in Mediterranean resorts, killing at least three people and wounding dozens, including 10 Britons in a minibus bombing in the popular resort town of Marmaris.

Ocalan has been in prison on the prison island of Imrali, off Istanbul, since his capture on Feb. 15, 1999 in Kenya. His guerrilla group has long demanded that Ocalan be moved out of solitary confinement and expressed concern about his health.

A delegation from the Council of Europe's committee for the prevention of torture, which visited Ocalan on the island in 1999, said the rebel leader's cell was well lit and suitably equipped.

Turkey also maintains that doctors closely monitor Ocalan's health.

Venezuela: U.S. Held Foreign Minister (AP)

By Ian James

AP, September 24, 2006

Venezuela's foreign minister said he was illegally detained for 90 minutes at a New York airport Saturday by U.S. authorities whom he accused of treating him abusively and attempting to frisk him.

U.S. and U.N. officials called the incident regrettable but said Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro had been identified for "secondary screening" — an added security check that can kick in for a variety of reasons.

"We were the object of an illegal detention by the U.S. government," Maduro told reporters at Venezuela's mission to the U.N. "We were detained during an hour and a half, threatened by police of being beaten."

Maduro said the authorities at John F. Kennedy International Airport at one point ordered him and other officials to spread their arms and legs and be frisked, but he said they forcefully refused.

He said his passport and ticket were retained for a time, and finally given back to him. But he said the incident prevented him from traveling home Saturday.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke denied that Maduro was mistreated. "There's no evidence to substantiate any sort of abnormality in the screening process."

The incident comes as tensions between the two countries — strained for several years — took a particularly confrontational turn. Both Maduro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez were in New York the past week attending the yearly U.N. General Assembly, where Chavez called President Bush "the devil" during his speech and criticized him during a stop in Harlem.

Knocke said in Washington that Maduro was referred for further screening but never reached that section of the airport.

DOJ_NMG_0068365

"He began to articulate his frustration with secondary screening right after he went through the magnetometer," he said, referring to the walk-through metal detector. "Port Authority officials confronted him when the situation became a ruckus." Knocke did not elaborate.

Airlines check passengers names against watch lists and apply certain criteria — such as paying for a ticket with cash — to direct passengers to a more intensive, or "secondary," screening process.

A U.N. diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said that Maduro's trip was delayed because he had showed up late without a ticket, prompting the screening.

"We can confirm that a regrettable incident occurred at John F. Kennedy airport for which the U.S. government has apologized to Foreign Minister Maduro and the government of Venezuela," U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

Maduro told the reporters that his government has been in touch with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan about the incident and was gathering a team of lawyers to challenge a detention that he said violated international law.

Earlier, Chavez said on Venezuelan television that U.S. officials had detained Maduro after linking him to a failed coup that Chavez led in Venezuela in 1992.

"They have held him accusing him of participating in terrorist acts here," Chavez said in Venezuela. "He didn't even participate in that patriotic rebellion," he said, referring to the uprising he led while still an army officer.

Chavez has previously called Bush a "devil," "donkey" and "madman." While two countries are tied by oil — Venezuela is among the top five suppliers of crude to the U.S. — relations soured sharply in 2002 after the Bush administration swiftly recognized leaders who briefly ousted Chavez in a coup, before the Venezuelan returned to power amid street protests.

Bush's political foes and friends alike have condemned the remarks, newspapers have sharply criticized the Venezuelan leader, while a call has emerged for businesses to boycott Venezuela-owned Citgo Petroleum Corp. One U.S. governor said his state is no longer interested in buying discounted heating oil from Venezuela this winter.

Earlier Saturday, Chavez said Bush may be seeking to kill him for calling him "the devil" at the United Nations.

"Some worried friends over there have called me (to say) that because I called him the devil they have condemned me to death," Chavez said without elaborating further on his sources.

US Apologizes After Venezuelan FM Detained At Airport (AFP)

By Alfons Luna

AFP, September 24, 2006

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro said he was temporarily detained, threatened and stripped of his travel documents at a New York airport, prompting an apology from the US government.

"I was detained in a room ... for an an hour and 40 minutes" at John F. Kennedy International Airport, Maduro told CNN television in remarks broadcast on Venezuelan television. "Then they handed me to a delegation headed by our UN ambassador (Francisco Arias Cardenas)."

"I denounce before the world the US government. I ask UN Secretary General Kofi Annan that he speak about this case, that investigations be opened. I demand that the US government respect international rights."

Maduro, who attended the United Nations General Assembly in New York this week, said "the situation got worse" when he identified himself to the security officiers as Venezuela's chief diplomat.

"I told the on-duty officials that I was the foreign minister, and the situation got worse because they started insulting, yelling and brought a police officer ... and they started threatening us," Maduro said.

"Now I have no documents and cannot travel," he said.

At a later news conference, Maduro said: "We were threatened with being beaten."

"They took my passport and plane ticket and only gave them back to me at the end, after I had made a public denouncement" of the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0068366

He said he received a phone call from Thomas Shannon, the US top diplomat for Latin America, who expressed surprise at the incident.

When US State Department officials arrived on the scene, and Maduro said he thought the situation would be resolved, "we were told to spread our feet and stretch out our arms so the police could search us."

Maduro said UN chief Annan "had designated a team of lawyers that will immediately start work on the case."

He called the incident "a complex, shameful situation and an attack against international law," and linked it to a speech by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the UN General Assembly this week in which the anti-US leader called his American counterpart George W. Bush the "devil."

The US Homeland Security Department denied Maduro's claims.

"There's no evidence to support any of this," US Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke told AFP by telephone.

"There's no evidence to support the claim that his travel documents were taken away, there's no evidence to support the claim that he was assaulted, there's no evidence to support the claim that he was somehow arrested or taken into custody," he said.

Knocke said Maduro was simply asked to go through a routine, secondary security screening.

The US State Department later confirmed the incident and apologized.

"The State Department can confirm there was an incident with Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro at JFK airport in New York," department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said.

"The State Department regrets this incident. The United States government apologized to Foreign Minister Maduro and the Venezuelan government."

According to a State Department official, the airport security services "questioned" the foreign minister and asked the State Department to confirm his diplomatic identity.

"Diplomatic security was sent out to the airport. We understand he was able to board the plane before it took off but he refused and returned to New York City," the official said on condition of anonymity.

Earlier, Chavez accused Bush of ordering his assassination for his "devil" remark Wednesday at the UN General Assembly.

"The devil appears very sulphurous, and a few people say that he has given the order to kill me," Chavez said during a speech before scientists in western Venezuela.

"Many concerned friends have called me, (saying) that because I said 'devil' over there (at the UN), they have sentenced me to die. They will not kill me, I have much faith in life," Chavez added.

Chavez said Maduro had been detained for allegedly taking part in a failed coup attempt in Venezuela on February 4, 1992, that Chavez had led against then-president Carlos Andres Perez.

"Apparently he is on a list for February 4," Chavez said on Venezuelan television. "But he was not in the rebellion."

A Speech That Khrushchev Or Arafat Or Che Would Admire (NYT)

UNITED NATIONS

WHEN President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela used his General Assembly appearance to call President Bush a devil who had left a telltale scent of sulfur on the speaker's podium, he was acting in an old, if not grand, tradition.The General Assembly hall with its green marble rostrum and giant golden screen bearing the United Nations seal was meant to sound with high-minded calls for international understanding. But on more than a few occasions, the cathedral-like space has rung instead with barbs and insults. And American presidents — from Harry Truman to Bill Clinton to George H.W. Bush — have been the favored targets.

In 1950, Wu Xiuquan, a Chinese representative, denounced the Truman administration effort to promote Taiwan, saying, "This is a preposterous farce, unworthy of refutation, in which Truman makes a mockery of Truman himself."

DOJ_NMG_0068367

President Reagan came in for a Hollywood-specific scolding in 1987 from Daniel Ortega, the president of Nicaragua. Denouncing Mr. Reagan's decision to continue financing contras fighting his Sandinista regime, Mr. Ortega said, "Rambo only exists in the movies."

Cuban foreign minister Roberto Robaina in 1996 took after President Clinton, saying, "We are facing a King Kong escaped from its cage, destroying and smashing without orientation or control."

Why has the United States come in for such tongue lashings?

Edward C. Luck, a professor of international affairs at Columbia who has followed the United Nations for more than three decades, said the General Assembly was a particularly alluring place for demagogues.

"If you want your 15 minutes of fame, what better place to get it than the rostrum of the General Assembly?" he said. "I think very often they are playing for the domestic audience and trying to build up their persona as a tough guy not afraid to take on the Yankee superpower."

But what might work at home doesn't necessarily play well on the world stage. "I think in the end they all come off as rejectionists," he said. "They're good at saying what they don't like, but they don't have any positive thoughts."

In that sense, the Chávez rant with its claim that "the U.S. is the greatest threat looking over the planet" harks back to speeches by Fidel Castro and Nikita Khrushchev during the chilliest days of the cold war. That's when the true art of America-bashing reached its pinnacle, even as it tended to follow a boilerplate script of "isms" — colonialism, imperialism, racism.

Che Guevara told the General Assembly in 1964 that "the United States is not the champion of freedom, but rather the perpetuator of exploitation and oppression against the peoples of the world and against a large part of its own population."

Castro, in 1960 managed to insult two future American presidents at the same time. He described John F. Kennedy as "a millionaire, illiterate and ignorant" and warned delegates against construing the comment as favoring Richard M. Nixon. "As far as we're concerned," he said, "the two of them lack, should I say, political brains."

While these rhetorical taunts don't necessarily influence the real course of world affairs, the threat of mobilized public opinion on a global scale against American policy can't be ignored and has at time spurred pointed responses.

In 1975, after a particularly harsh run-in with African countries, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, then the American UN ambassador, said: "For too long, we have been given private assurances that public obscenities were not meant. That currency is no longer acceptable."

President Ronald Reagan took the strongest stance against the Washington-baiting when he appointed Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, an outspoken conservative, as ambassador to the United Nations. She said that countries attacking the United States covered up their own misdeeds by using the "Big Lie" — accusing the United States of committing crimes that they in fact had perpetrated.

Finally, in 1987, when Daniel Ortega, the Marxist leader of Nicaragua, compared Reagan to Rambo, Vernon Walters, the American envoy, called the speech "typical revolutionary babble." And he and the rest of the American delegation walked out.

But perhaps the most effective retort was the less demonstrative one delivered by the British. In 1960 Nikita S. Khrushchev, the Soviet premier, had interrupted a General Assembly address by the prime minister, Harold Macmillan, by waving his arms in the air and shouting in Russian. In response, Mr. Macmillan stopped speaking and imperturbably sipped a glass of water. He murmured over his shoulder to Frederick H. Boland of Ireland, the assembly president, that if Mr. Khrushchev wished to continue, he would insist on a translation.

The Soviet leader went silent.

What's worse for energy security: a natural disaster or a petro-bully?

HUGO CHAVEZ got the attention that he craves by comparing President Bush to Satan last week. But the Venezuelan leader's absurd talk may be less threatening than his equally absurd incompetence. Since Mr. ChÃ¡vez took power seven years ago, Venezuela has mismanaged its oil so disastrously that production may have fallen by almost half, according to the estimates of outsiders, reducing global oil supply by a bit more than 1 percent. Along with natural disasters and Nigerian rebels, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's ineptitude has contributed to high energy prices.

It takes sustained determination to reduce output by that much, and Mr. ChÃ¡vez has provided it. He inherited a competent national oil company that produced three times more per worker than its Mexican counterpart. He immediately starved it of investment capital and dispatched ignorant political cronies to oversee it. When this abuse provoked a strike, Mr. ChÃ¡vez fired the staff en masse, getting rid of two-thirds of the skilled employees and managers.

Mr. ChÃ¡vez imagines that he can damage the United States by rerouting Venezuelan oil to other markets. He fails to understand that oil is fungible: If Venezuela's crude is sold to the Chinese, the Chinese will buy less of it elsewhere, freeing up supplies for U.S. consumers. But Mr. ChÃ¡vez also appears oblivious to the technical difficulties in sending oil halfway round the world rather than selling it in his own hemisphere. Oil tankers do not come cheap, and China will have to build special refineries to process the heavy brand of crude that Venezuela produces. Despite Mr. ChÃ¡vez's bluster about tripling exports to China in three years, Venezuela will depend on Yanqui consumers for the foreseeable future.

To the extent that Mr. ChÃ¡vez's wild talk stirs up anti-American feeling, he must be regarded as an irritant. If he secures a temporary seat on the U.N. Security Council, as he hopes to do next month, he will doubtless render U.N. diplomacy even more challenging than it is already. Yet it is not the United States but rather Mr. ChÃ¡vez's own countrymen who should most fear his intentions. Venezuela's courts, media organizations and civil society groups have been bullied into submission, and Mr. ChÃ¡vez is talking about a constitutional change that would allow him to remain in power indefinitely. "The people should not be stripped of their right if they wish to reelect a compatriot whoever it may be three, four, five, six times," he said recently.

Thai Coup Highlights Struggles Over Democracy (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

BANGKOK -- Inside the teeming Khlong Toei slum in the shadow of this city's modern skyscrapers, 60-year-old street vendor Chalaem Tiensiri is still proudly displaying campaign stickers from deposed prime minister Thaksin Shinawatra's party on the walls of her shack. Asked about the bloodless military coup last week that abruptly ousted Thaksin from power, she looked down at her empty hands and quietly cried.

Echoing the feelings of many on the warren-like streets of Khlong Toei, Chalaem said the poor in Thailand were largely ignored before Thaksin was elected in a landslide in 2001. A billionaire tycoon who became the hero of the underclass, Thaksin ushered in universal health care that allowed Chalaem's cancer-stricken daughter to receive chemotherapy for less than $1 per treatment. His war on drugs, she said, drove the methamphetamine dealers from the neighborhood's tough streets. Local leaders from Thaksin's party provided free milk for her young grandson and brought the struggling widow gifts of rice several times a year.

"I don't care what they say about Thaksin, he was the first one who ever cared about us," she said, kneeling next to her ill daughter who rested languidly on a cot. "He gave me a chance to keep my daughter alive. He gave us food when we were in need. Now that he's been chased out, the poor have lost their closest friend."

Chalaem's lingering respect for Thaksin -- still widely shared among the urban poor and rural farmers across the country's north and northeast -- underscores the core problems confronting Thailand and a host of other emerging nations as they try, and sometimes fail, to cultivate healthy democracies.

Thaksin followed the path of other democratically elected leaders, like Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez, who are accused of using their posts to enhance their power at the expense of democratic institutions. Thaksin, following that pattern, gained popular support by pushing through policies aimed at easing the plight of the poor while using handouts of food and even cash to ensure votes at election time.

Experts say such populist-driven politics has exacerbated class divisions and created a significant hurdle to maintaining the rule of law for some developing countries. Well-educated middle- or upper-class Thais have generally embraced the coup as a regrettable but necessary step toward ending Thaksin's grip on power and ushering in a new constitution. The provisional military government, headed by the soft-spoken Royal Thai Army chief, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, has promised to name a civilian as caretaker prime minister in the coming days and hold elections within one year.

Foreign advocates for democracy and some domestic observers in Thailand have seen a clear conflict in such support for the coup. While the ousted prime minister infuriated his opponents by clinging to power, he simultaneously enjoyed unparalleled popularity among the nation's largest block of voters -- the poor. Some anti-Thaksin forces have even indirectly blamed the unquestioning support by poor Thais of the ousted prime minister for Thailand's current crisis.

"We understand that to some extent we have failed to address the problems of the poor, and we need to do a better job," said Surin Pitsuwan, a former foreign minister and leading member of the opposition Democrat Party. "The problem is that in Thailand, Thaksin created a class of people dependent on state handouts. We need to teach these people that there are no such things as free gifts in a real democracy and that it does them more harm than good to live off the largess of corrupt leaders."

Democracy advocates abroad, meanwhile, are viewing the case of Thailand -- an important regional ally of the United States and one of Southeast Asia's largest economies -- as particularly demoralizing.

In the 15 years since the last military takeover here, Thailand had emerged as the region's model for democratic reform. Already, the jailed leaders of a February coup attempt against Philippine President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo have made comments to the foreign press hailing the successful military men of Bangkok as exemplary patriots.

Analysts fear the Thai coup will also embolden existing military juntas, such as the one in neighboring Burma, to resist mounting international pressure to enact democratic reforms.

"The comeback from other nations in the region when they are told to make democratic reforms will be, 'Hey, look at Thailand. They couldn't make it work and the military had to take charge again,' " said Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political analyst at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University. "Their argument will be that the people are just not eager for democracy and that the military men still know best."

The coup has brought swift international condemnation. The Bush administration is now in the process of reviewing military and other aid to Thailand and has said a pending free trade agreement with Bangkok cannot go forward without a restoration of democracy.

Thaksin, who was in New York preparing to address the United Nations at the time of the coup, is now in London, where he told reporters he was taking a "holiday" for the time being. In a statement, Thaksin appeared resigned to his ouster, saying he would remain in Europe for the time being to promote Thai unity.

But foreign investors remained jittery, with the Thai currency, the baht, and the stock market going on wild rides as rumors of a counter-move by officers still loyal to Thaksin have raged through Bangkok. So far, there have been no serious indications of violent resistance to the provisional military authority.

Anti-Thaksin forces here insist the coup is being misrepresented outside Thailand. They describe it as the result of Thaksin's attempt to usurp the constitution and set himself up as a "democratic dictator" in a nation where King Bhumibol Adulyadej remains the beloved head of state. Public protests against Thaksin, they said, had grown in the aftermath of a corruption scandal in which his family sold its controlling stake in a major telecommunications company to a Singapore state investment firm for $1.9 billion without paying a cent of taxes. But those protest rallies were confined to Bangkok.

Still, the spark that finally ignited the coup appeared to be Thaksin's recent interference in the military promotion system to elevate his allies to top positions.

In a signal that the royal household had effectively endorsed the coup, the king officially named Sonthi the head of an interim council.

On Friday, Sonthi again promised to swiftly name a civilian caretaker, with foreign observers calling for the appointment of a well-known and respected figure to prevent the impression of a puppet government. Attention has focused on former World Trade Organization chief Supachai Panitchpakdi and Thailand's central bank head, Pridiyathorn Devakula. But on Friday, speculation also turned to a less renowned figure, Ackaratorn Chularat, president of Thailand's Supreme Administrative Court.

Analysts note that Thaksin's adversaries had yet to exhaust all legal means of opposing him, and they said the checks and balances of Thailand's constitutional monarchy had recently begun to function.

With a nod from the king, Thaksin loyalists on an election commission were purged by the still largely independent Supreme Court -- opening the way for a more level playing field in elections that were set to be held in the coming months. Thaksin's critics say his party was already gearing up for a cash-for-votes campaign that would have kept him in power.

DOJ_NMG_0068370

Instead, with the military now in charge, Thailand has reverted to martial law. At least four of Thaksin's top aides have been detained by military authorities, who have also outlawed political meetings of five or more people. TV and radio stations have been warned to prevent criticism of the new military government, with armed soldiers stationed inside or near major domestic networks as a reminder. The military authority on Friday also named an official body to probe allegations of corruption under Thaksin.

Resistance to military control has already begun to fester. A group of about 100 university students staged an ingenious protest on Friday near an upscale shopping mall. To avoid violating the new military rules against political gatherings, they clustered themselves in groups of twos or threes across a broad public area.

"This coup is not what we wanted," said a 19-year-old university protester who declined to give his name, but held a sign saying: "No to Thaksin, No to the Coup."

"Thailand needs real democracy," he said, "and we don't feel this was the right way to achieve it."

Coup May Allow Thais To Take New Tack On Insurgency (NYT)

By Seth Mydans, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

By SETH MYDANS

BANGKOK, Sept. 23 — Jesse Lee Daniel had just called for mustard for his chicken burger when the first bomb went off with a thud strong enough to shake the Swan Bar, where he was sitting in the southern city of Hat Yai.

After the second bomb last Saturday evening, 100 yards away at the Odeon department store, he hurried out with other foreign teachers who had been eating at the bar to take a look.

He was standing in front of the New Cherry Ancient Massage parlor, in a crowd of onlookers and masseuses, when the third bomb exploded on a motorbike parked at the curb beside them.

Mr. Daniel, a Canadian, died instantly, apparently the first Western victim of the almost daily violence that has taken more than 1,700 lives since the start of 2004 in Thailand's largely Muslim south.

The attack that killed him and five others was part of a new escalation in a separatist insurgency that has been aggravated, according to experts, by the militarized, give-no-quarter approach of former Prime Minster Thaksin Shinawatra.

Mr. Thaksin's ouster in a coup this week offers the chance for a new approach, though not a quick end, to an insurgency that has become nastier and more entrenched and that experts say may be receiving guidance and training from foreign Islamic insurgents.

"We are seeing that the insurgency is escalating at a very significant pace and very likely we will soon see an attack in Bangkok," said Rohan Gunaratna, a Singapore-based expert on terrorism. "They have created a movement."

The general who led the coup, Sonthi Boonyaratglin, is a Muslim who had clashed with Mr. Thaksin over the government's southern policy. Days before the coup, General Sonthi proposed negotiations with the insurgents, only to be brushed off by Mr. Thaksin.

But starting negotiations will not be easy. The only separatist group to respond to his offer has little control over insurgent activity, and General Sonthi himself conceded that "right now, the military does not know who their real leader is."

Another limit to negotiations is the complicated nature of the violence, which appears to include not only the Muslim insurgency but also political and business rivalries, drug running, banditry and feuds involving the military and the police.

But experts expect General Sonthi at least to begin to carry out the recommendations of a National Reconciliation Committee, led by the former prime minister, Anand Panyarachun. It proposed in May the creation of a regional administrative body to mediate.

Although the committee was created by Mr. Thaksin, he ignored its recommendations and proceeded with a policy of confrontation.

"If implemented, all those alone would go a long way to improving the trust of the local community," said Zachary Abuza, an expert on terrorism who is studying the violence in southern Thailand.

DOJ_NMG_0068371

The recommendations amount to a turnaround in dismissive and discriminatory attitudes of the central government in this largely Buddhist nation toward the Muslims who make up 5 percent of the population of 64 million people.

They would start with the lifting of a martial law decree that the commission found had aroused fear and resentment in the three Muslim-dominated southern provinces — Yala, Narathiwat and Pattani.

They also urge greater attention to local conditions and culture, including public school education in the local Malay language, and an end to a culture of impunity that has allowed hundreds of killings and kidnappings by security forces.

In addition, Mr. Abuza said, Mr. Thaksin's ouster is likely to end a constant, destabilizing rotation of military commanders in the region.

But for now, the momentum seems to be with the insurgents, who carry out killings and kidnappings, the assassination of local government officials and teachers and the burning of schoolhouses, as well as attacks on the military and local volunteers.

The latest bombings have frightened residents of Bangkok as they have seen the violence spreading from the core of the Muslim south into the capital of a neighboring province, Songkhla. Muslims here make up a smaller proportion of the population and most of them speak Thai rather than Malay.

"People here are afraid," said Thaveesak Khaotemdee, 29, a truck driver who lives in Hat Yai. "Wherever we go, we hurry out and hurry back. Nobody goes out at night. Just dead silence. Even at a restaurant we look at each other's faces. We never thought it would happen here in Hat Yai."

A year ago a bomb was planted at the Hat Yai airport. But the latest bombings — six altogether, within minutes of one another — brought the violence into the heart of the city.

It seems clear that the attacks were aimed at foreigners in the entertainment district of Hat Yai, which depends on tourism for much of its income, said Chaiwat Satta-anan, a professor at Chulalongkorn University who was a member of the reconciliation commission.

"There is no record of foreigners or tourists as victims in the southern violence," he said. "So the meaning of this particular incident is that another taboo of violence in the south as been broken."

Previous escalations included the killings of Buddhist monks, attacks in Buddhist temples and the killing of a Muslim preacher, he said.

The attack in Hat Yai occurred three weeks after the bombings of 22 banks simultaneously nearby in Yala Province in which one person was killed and 29 wounded. Experts said these bombings showed the degree of coordination of a movement whose leadership, General Sonthi said, remained unknown.

The bombings in Hat Yai killed five people in front of the massage parlor, including three of the young women who were standing near Mr. Daniel and a man on a motorbike.

Officials said 14 foreigners were among the 72 people who were wounded that evening, including 6 Malaysians, 3 Singaporeans, 3 Britons, an Indian and an American.

The next morning, when Boonmi Ngoeichai, 27, returned to the Swan Bar, where she works as a waitress, she discovered that the manager had saved Mr. Daniel's chicken burger, still unsure why he had not returned to eat it.

When he learned that Mr. Daniel had been killed, the manager threw it away. But he immediately regretted what he had done, she said.

"Oh, I wish I hadn't done that," the manager said. "I wish I'd saved it, and I could have taken it out to feed his spirit."

Tanks Roll In Thailand (WP)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

When I arrived in Thailand in the summer of 2003, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra seemed to be presiding over a bona fide success story. Thailand's economy, battered by the Asian financial crisis in the late 1990s, was roaring back to life, with foreign investors returning to the country, the stock market blossoming and consumer spending soaring. At the chic restaurants along Bangkok's Sukhumvit Road, upper-middle class Thais in slick suits tossed back plates of expensive tapas and bottles of wine. Boasting the region's fastest growth rates, Thaksin had proudly toured Southeast Asia, promoting his "Thaksinomics" brand of economic stimulus as an example for other countries.

Thailand's politics also seemed to be operating on cruise control. With nearly 15 years of civilian rule, the country had built a vibrant democracy, and in 1997 created a reform-minded constitution hailed as one of the most progressive in the region.

It didn't last. By earlier this year, thousands of Thais had gathered in the streets to call for Thaksin's head, Thailand's political system had broken down, a rumbling insurgency in the country's south had exploded into open warfare and the economy had begun to nosedive. The situation came to a head last week, with a decidedly retro action: a military coup, not seen in Thailand since the early 1990s. Indeed, the sight of armed troops in camouflage patrolling the streets of Bangkok seemed jarring -- a sight more appropriate for Mauritania or Burma than a city full of malls lined with Chanel and Louis Vuitton boutiques.

But the decline of such a promising nation was not as rapid as it seems. Since he was first elected in 2001, Thaksin had slowly undermined Thailand's democratic institutions, and his economic policies, though initially successful, mortgaged Thailand's future. As a result, when Thaksin needed to rally support from the country's democrats last week, he found few still standing in his corner.

Entering politics as the head of one of Thailand's biggest telecommunications companies, Thaksin had promoted himself as a CEO-type leader, a man who made quick, firm decisions. This image of Thailand's richest man proved appealing, especially in a country accustomed to fragmented, slow-moving political coalitions, and along with massive, populist handouts of state money to rural areas, it helped him win large majorities in the 2001 and 2005 elections.

But Thaksin never seemed to understand that, unlike in a corporation, he could not simply order results in a democracy and stifle opposition. In the deep south, home to a Muslim minority with longstanding grievances against majority-Buddhist Thailand, Thaksin eliminated an institution designed to hear residents' complaints and then amassed near-total control over the situation.

In Bangkok, Thaksin's family company bought up Thailand's most independent television station, fired critical journalists and then used the government's Anti-Money Laundering Office to intimidate other reporters. The prime minister also cashiered civil servants who questioned his policies, including the governor of the Bank of Thailand and the reform-minded head of the armed forces. He helped install people close to him in key positions at the supposedly independent government watchdog agencies created by the 1997 constitution. He launched sedition charges against critics, and he openly undermined the authority of Thailand's judges.

The prime minister's economic policies, meanwhile, often seemed designed more to benefit his telecommunications empire. Though the Thaksinomics fiscal stimulus jump-started the economy, it left Thailand saddled with deep debts, and it failed to produce high-value industries that could compete with China and other Asian economies. In January, his family sold shares in its telecommunications company to a Singaporean firm, netting $1.9 billion without paying any taxes. A 2003 study by Vanderbilt University found that eight of the 10 largest conglomerates in Thailand had people in Thaksin's cabinet linked to their company.

As he amassed more power, Thaksin's attacks on his perceived enemies increased. He lashed out at the few independent media organizations still remaining. He refused to heed calls for reconciliation in southern Thailand, where anger had spiraled into widespread violence. Instead, he may have tacitly allowed death squads to rampage in the south, "disappearing" human rights advocates. More than 1,200 people have died in the region, at the hands of militants and the authorities, in the past two years alone.

But the government's crackdown there only made the problem worse. On most evenings, Thailand's deep south feels more like Iraq than a part of a modern democracy. At major intersections some troops manning heavy machine guns sit surrounded by sandbags, while others stop vehicles and search passengers. On back roads, insurgents gun down police and fire-bomb government buildings.

Eventually Thaksin went too far. Army officials and political elites chafed at his perceived corruption, and complained to me that the military was sacrificing soldiers in southern Thailand with no plan. Worse, when Thailand's revered monarch, King Bhumibol Adulyadej, obliquely criticized Thaksin in a speech last December, the prime minister did not listen.

Thaksin should have bowed before the king, honored like a god in Thailand for steering the country through decades of political crises. But he seemed not to heed the monarch, and though the poor still loved Thaksin, street protests erupted in February and March. These were not violent affairs. At one demonstration, thousands of urbane Bangkokians gathered on a central green to swap T-shirts mocking Thaksin, groove to anti-Thaksin funk music, chant slogans -- and snack on reams of Thai sweets.

Still, the street protests may have given the military the confidence to intervene, especially after Thaksin won another disputed election in April; the coup was led by Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratglin, army commander in chief and an ally of the royal palace. The coup-makers wore the monarchy's traditional colors, and the king later endorsed Sonthi's transitional government.

After the coup, the response from many of Thailand's leading liberals was decidedly lukewarm, though Thaksin had won three elections and international organizations such as Human Rights Watch condemned Sonthi's actions. Former prime minister Chuan Leekpai announced, "As politicians, we do not support any kind of coup but . . . Thaksin has caused the crisis."

Thailand now stands on a precipice. The military government has promised to appoint a civilian caretaker as prime minister and outline a path to elections next year, but it also has declared martial law and arrested activists who tried to protest the coup. By removing Thaksin, the military may have taken out a leader with anti-democratic tendencies, but it also shredded Thailand's 1997 constitution, which was supposed to offer a bulwark against the army playing a role in politics. "Political troubles should be solved by politicians," Sonthi himself had said last year.

And if Thailand holds another election, Thaksin, who remains popular among the poor, could legitimately win again, setting the stage for the kind of ongoing political turmoil that has doomed Southeast Asian nations such as the Philippines. For a country full of promise, that would be the saddest fate of all.

Putin Rejects Europe's Fears On Company (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

COMPIÈGNE, France, Sept. 23 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia dismissed concerns over his country's growing interest in the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company at a meeting here Saturday with his French and German counterparts.

"As far as the acquisition of a 5 percent stake is concerned, it is not at all evidence of aggressive behavior on the part of the Russian side," Mr. Putin told reporters after discussions with President Jacques Chirac of France and Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany at Compiègne, north of Paris, that ranged from Russia's handling of its energy resources to such diplomatic issues as Lebanon and Iran. "We will not use this stake to change in any way the institutional situation of EADS."

This month, a Russian state-controlled bank bought a 5.02 percent stake in EADS, the parent company of Airbus, and Russian officials indicated then that the government hoped to increase its stake. But EADS and Thierry Breton, the French finance minister, subsequently rebuffed speculation that Russia might gain a position on the board of the European consortium.

Mr. Putin also said that Russia was ready to send "a small deployment of Russian military engineers" to Lebanon, as part of a bilateral agreement outside the United Nations-backed force. Mr. Putin said Russia wanted to be sure its contribution was welcome by all Lebanese parties before proceeding.

The three leaders said they had discussed energy, and Mr. Putin tried to reassure Western countries that Russia was a reliable partner that appreciated the mutual dependence of producers and consumers.

President Putin also announced he signed on Friday two memorandums of understanding for potential contracts representing more than $10 billion in transactions. One, between the Russian transportation ministry and the French construction giant Vinci, concerns plans for a highway between Moscow and St. Petersburg. The other, between the Russian and French Transportation Ministries, provides for possible cooperation on transportation and infrastructure in Russia.

SUKHUMI, Georgia -- Under mounting pressure from Tbilisi, separatist leaders in Georgia's breakaway region of Abkhazia are warning that their armed forces, backed by Russia, are prepared to defend their territory.

"We are ready to fight them, even if they have the support of the Americans," Abkhazia's de facto president, Sergei Bagapsh, said in an interview in the capital, Sukhumi. "We have enough weapons, enough soldiers and enough friends to defend our nation."

Abkhazia, a sliver of land nestled between the Black Sea and the Caucasus Mountains, broke away from Georgia amid fierce fighting in 1992 and now has de facto independence.

Since coming to power after the 2003 "Rose Revolution," Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili has stepped up efforts to reassert control over Abkhazia and Georgia's other separatist enclave, South Ossetia.

Mr. Bagapsh spoke with The Washington Times before the U.N. General Assembly, where Mr. Saakashvili accused Russia of waging a "gangster occupation" with its peacekeeping troops.

Tensions have soared in the region in recent months and particularly since Georgian forces in late July seized the contentious Kodori Gorge, the only part of Abkhazia not under separatist control, from a local warlord.

Georgia is establishing a local government in the gorge made up of members of the Abkhazian "government-in-exile," which supports reunification.

Mr. Saakashvili has promised only "peaceful means" will be used to restore Abkhazia to Georgian control, but Abkhazians fear otherwise.

"We fear that the operation in Kodori was only designed to establish a bridgehead for a wider invasion," said Sergei Shamba, Abkhazia's de facto foreign minister.

Renewed conflict in the region would stoke tensions between Washington, which has backed Mr. Saakashvili's drive to restore Georgia's territorial integrity, and Russia, which funds the separatist government and has provided passports to more than 90 percent of Abkhazians.

The United States has deployed a small contingent of troops in Georgia to provide military training, and Russia has hundreds of soldiers in Abkhazia as peacekeepers.

Analysts expect tensions could reach critical levels later this year if U.N.-led negotiations on the status of Kosovo result in some form of independence for the Serbian province.

The United States and some other Western governments support autonomy for Kosovo, which has been a U.N. protectorate since mid-1999.

"If the international community recognizes Kosovo, it must do the same for Abkhazia," Mr. Shamba said. "There are stronger grounds for granting us independence. We fought for our statehood, have survived through sanctions and created democratic state institutions."

A sun-drenched paradise of palm trees, mandarin groves and sweeping beaches, Abkhazia once drew thousands ofvacationers from across the Soviet Union, but today is largely in ruins.

Along the waterfront in Sukhumi, its once-exclusive hotels lie derelict as the occasional Russian tourists who still venture here sunbathe beside the rusted hulk of a marooned ferry. In the countryside, whole villages have been abandoned.

"In a way, our problem is that we live in such a beautiful place," Mr. Bagapsh said. "That is why there are those who want to take it away from us."

Exit Koizumi, Japan's Relentless Jedi Knight (WP)

In Japan, the wa surrounds you. You can feel it in the priciest sushi bars and lowliest noodle parlors. Call it the particular Japanese way of looking at the world; of harmony, of collectiveness with a do-not-rock-the-boat spirit. In the mythology of "Star Wars" movies, the wa is like the Force. To mess with the wa is a cardinal sin.

Junichiro Koizumi messed with the wa .

But perhaps the most surprising thing about the man who will exit the political stage next week as Japan's most important postwar prime minister is that when he messed with the wa , most Japanese discovered a shocking truth: Maybe the wa needed to be messed with.

In his 5 1/2 years in office, Japan's modern samurai took his light saber to practically every national taboo. He cut through the country's notorious bureaucratic fat, forcing passage of legislation to reduce government payrolls and curb the wasteful spending that had left post-bubble Japan saddled with bridges to nowhere and highways dead-ending in unpopulated grasslands. Where his predecessors had used pork-barrel spending in vain attempts to drag the nation out of its decade-long recession, Koizumi instead turned to market forces -- delivering what is now on track to become Japan's longest period of economic growth since the end of World War II.

When China's looming emergence as a superpower began to cast a long shadow over Japan -- a country many Asia experts dismissed a few years ago as rising only in its irrelevance -- Koizumi charted a new course for a bolder nation. He dispatched non-combat troops to Iraq in Japan's largest military-related operation in six decades, launched Tokyo's first independent spy satellites and fortified the U.S.-Japan alliance to counter Beijing's spreading influence.

He did so with a flair that the Japanese had never before seen in a politician. Yukio Okamoto, Koizumi's former senior adviser on the Middle East, recalled the prime minister's 2003 address to the nation announcing what was then an unpopular decision to dispatch Japan's Self Defense Forces to Iraq. Foreign Ministry bureaucrats had prepared a defensive, almost apologetic speech for Koizumi. But the prime minister tossed it aside and went on live with an impromptu, highly personal discourse of his own.

"Those of us standing around Mr. Koizumi just smiled; it wasn't his words as much as his self-assured body language that convinced the Japanese public," Okamoto told me. "In that sense, Koizumi was able to do more than past prime ministers who just followed public opinion. He influenced it. In other words, he was a leader."

In a country long governed by consensus politics and glacial change, Koizumi's most significant achievement was smashing the body politic itself. He took aim at his own ruling Liberal Democratic Party -- a misnomer for a group of conservative dinosaurs who have ruled Japan for most of the past six decades through backroom agreements and a yakuza-like devotion to a few party bosses. Though Koizumi, 64, sometimes looked like a goof on the world stage -- especially while serenading President Bush with Elvis songs and traipsing around Graceland like a wide-eyed groupie -- he was a ruthless political strategist at home. He slew the reform-resistant LDP bosses like so many Darth Vaders by unceremoniously ejecting them from the party. In the process, he cleared a path for change.

"Koizumi was almost cruel in his political style," said Ichita Yamamoto, part of a new generation of younger LDP legislators. "But that's what we needed -- an unyielding leader beholden to no one."

But mixed in with the new sense of optimism Koizumi brought to the country was a precarious reinvention of Japanese nationalism. He flirted with the Dark Side of the wa , creating a new Japan unfettered by war guilt. His administration backed the new history textbooks' whitewashing of imperial atrocities, and repeatedly did not condemn political statements casting past aggressions in the light of national self-preservation. Koizumi's annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine honoring military dead -- including World War II criminals -- sparked outcries in the countries that suffered most from Japan's wartime actions. The repeat visits created a schism in Tokyo's diplomatic ties with Beijing and Seoul that has left Japan largely friendless in its own neighborhood.

For years, the Chinese, North Koreans and, more recently, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun, have unabashedly used anti-Japanese rhetoric for political gain, to stoke their own flames of domestic nationalism and to distract from their own failings. But Koizumi's actions gave Japan's critics a credibility they had long lacked.

He tried to cloak his worship of military spirits, including Gen. Hideki Tojo, as a mystical rite of Shinto -- the main Japanese religion -- that foreigners could never hope to understand. He sought to separate his visits to the shrine from Yasukuni's shocking war museum -- which still defines Pearl Harbor as an act of self defense and blames the 1937 Rape of Nanking on the "cowardice" of Chinese rulers who fled the city. Yet those arguments have seemed artificial, arrogant and even dangerous.

Koizumi's handpicked successor -- Shinzo Abe, who is set to take over the prime minister's post next week -- is viewed as even more hawkish. Abe has vowed to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution, drafted by the conquering Americans after World War II, within five years. That Japan deserves global clout commensurate with its wealth and a military capable of deterring new threats such as a nuclear-armed North Korea is not in doubt. But to move toward that new future with stubborn indignation will doubtlessly create more problems than it solves for Japan.

"I see Koizumi's actions today, his disrespect for the countries in Asia touched by the war, and I wonder if he is the same man I once knew," said Takayoshi Miyagawa, the prime minister's political consultant during his first parliamentary campaigns in the 1970s. "Both Koizumi and Abe have appealed to the people through nationalism, and that is a tactic that I had hoped Japan had grown out of."

On the domestic front, the pivotal question for Japan is whether Koizumi's reforms will be continued by Abe, who holds a far deeper respect for the old guard and has hinted at a more traditional approach toward public spending that could easily undo Koizumi's work. More important, Abe lacks the charisma of Koizumi, whose celebrity style of politics somehow managed to blunt even his worse offenses. For Americans, Koizumi became the first Japanese leader they could pick out of a lineup. Abe, on the other hand, is likely to fade into the background of G-8 photo ops in the same way that staid, dark-suited Japanese prime ministers have for a generation.

If Koizumi's mark on politics is to fade quickly, it will be Japan's loss. A self-described "weirdo" in a world of well-scripted politicians, Koizumi remained popular at home precisely because he broke the rules. In a nation where a famous saying lectures "The nail that sticks out gets hammered," he defied public conventions from the beginning, eschewing the cookie-cutter image of past PMs by rising to power on the back of pop-star good looks, blunt talk and grass-roots support for bold reform. The biggest surprise for Japan was that Koizumi -- the scion of a political family whose father's deathbed wish to him was "Junichiro Koizumi, be victorious" -- did more than win elections. Though the scope of his reforms never quite reached his own grandiose vision, he delivered on far more of his promises than almost anyone -- except Koizumi himself -- had ever expected.

He began almost immediately, beginning a debate within a year to revamp Japan's overfed entity in charge of building highways and roads; a notorious fount of political graft and excessive spending that LDP bigwigs tried desperately to preserve. Koizumi's battle with his own party would dramatically escalate in the following years, coming to a head in the last 18 months of his premiership. The one constant was his uncanny popularity.

Many of Koizumi's peers saw in him a reckless disregard for consensus -- the coda by which virtually all Japanese prime ministers have survived in the decades after World War II. They cited his display of kamikaze politics last September after reform-resistant LDP legislators rebelled against his plan to privatize Japan's gargantuan postal service. Fulfilling his pledge either to change the LDP or destroy it, he shocked the party hierarchy by ejecting the stonewallers from the party, calling snap elections and offering his own head if the people's will did not vindicate his reform crusade at the ballot box.

As the sun was setting on the outskirts of Tokyo last September, Yuriko Saito, a 57-year-old white-gloved wife of an accountant, joined a throng of thousands who braved sheets of rain to watch a hoarse Koizumi take his argument directly to the people. Convinced voters such as Saito went on to deliver Koizumi one of the biggest landslide victories in democratic-era Japan.

Why? Because Koizumi fought with the wa -- and the wa lost.

"Koizumi is the only prime minister we have ever had who has actually done something," Saito said that day. "Frankly, he surprised me."

New Clashes In An Old Border Feud (LAT)

By Shankhadeep Choudhury, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068377

Since India began fencing off parts of its ill-defined frontier with Bangladesh, skirmishes have killed scores of villagers, officials say.

HARINAGAR, India — The last time Lokesh Chandra Dey heard bullets whizzing past and mortar fire pounding his neighborhood was 35 years ago, when India and archrival Pakistan fought a war that witnessed the creation of Bangladesh.

But on Aug. 9, Dey's village in the Indian border state of Assam found itself caught in the crossfire again, under a deadly barrage from across the frontier.

"The mortar shells came flying through the ceiling," Dey said, pointing to the gaping hole in the tin roof of his house, now covered by a black tarp. "Seven people were holed up in that room…. Pieces of brick were strewn all around…. Everything was damaged."

The attack killed Dey's daughter-in-law and niece. Three family members were injured.

Skirmishes have erupted lately between India's Border Security Force and its counterpart across the divide, the Bangladesh Rifles. The two countries share a 2,500-mile border, parts of which are not properly demarcated or are marked by rivers that occasionally shift course, sparking territorial disputes.

Although relations generally have been stable in recent years, tensions along the border have increased since India began fencing off the boundary to keep out what it describes as illegal immigrants and "cross-border insurgents."

At the same time, some observers fear that political parties in Bangladesh may be fomenting border violence in hopes of capitalizing on anti-India sentiment in upcoming national elections, due by the end of January.

Each country accuses the other of provoking the skirmishes.

Shivajee Singh, inspector general of India's Border Security Force, said that from Jan. 1, 2005, through last month, more than 30 incidents of "unprovoked firing" by the Bangladesh Rifles led to seven deaths on the Indian side, five of them civilians.

New Delhi alleges that the confrontations are part of an attempt at "infiltration and encroachment" by Bangladesh. The government in Dhaka dismisses the charge, instead blaming "trigger-happy" Indian security forces for outbreaks of violence that it says killed more than 50 Bangladeshi civilians from November to May.

On the Indian side, the remote districts of Cachar and Karimganj in Assam, a poor state that shares a 170-mile land border and about 56 miles of river with Bangladesh, have been hit hard. Local officials say 60 villages and a population of more than 60,000 have been affected.

In the Aug. 9 skirmish, which continued into early the next morning, Indian officials allege that more than 70 Bangladeshi shells were fired at Indian posts, but many of them landed in Harinagar. They also say that the Bangladesh Rifles opened fire with machine guns. Bangladesh contends that its men returned fire only after Indian forces launched about 50 mortar shells at their side.

The shell that hit Dey's home filled the concrete-and-mud structure with smoke. Dey was not home. By the time he arrived, his daughter-in-law, Sabita, was dead. His 20-year-old niece, Shanta, died minutes later.

Harinagar, a village of about 1,000 people, is scarred by about two dozen craters, some in paddy fields, others in the courtyards of homes. Fear and panic have gripped many residents.

"Many people, especially womenfolk, have moved out of the village and are staying with relatives elsewhere," said Ranjana Dey, 23, who, like many villagers, has the same last name as Lokesh Chandra but is not related. "Inside most houses, trenches have been dug for shelter."

At least 1,500 people from Harinagar and three nearby hamlets have abandoned their homes for makeshift relief camps set up by the Assam government. More shooting broke out two days this month, but no casualties were reported.

"Why are they doing this?" asked Benimadhab Dey, a worker in a local cooperative. "Just to grab our land? I don't buy that…. There must be a deeper conspiracy."

Indian border police say the skirmishes are partly attempts by local Bangladeshi officials to encroach on vacant land for growing crops and grazing cattle.

But beyond that, they allege that local Bangladeshi politicians are encouraging hostilities in a bid to increase support for the central government, led by the Bangladesh Nationalist Party. The ruling coalition in Dhaka is wary of New Delhi, which it suspects of covertly supporting opposition parties.

DOJ_NMG_0068378

Indian border officials are worried that outbreaks of violence will persist until Bangladesh goes to the polls.

Singh, of the Indian border force, expressed hope that the tension could be eased through regular meetings with his Bangladeshi counterparts. Senior commanders from both forces met for four days last month in the Indian city of Shillong to discuss how to restore calm.

As they were meeting, however, a brief gun battle erupted near Harinagar.

In spite of the violence, many villagers say they have no plans of leaving their homes.

"We have inhabited this village for over 200 years now," Lokesh Chandra Dey said, "so there is no question of us vacating this place and moving elsewhere."

A Crisis Of Trust Takes A Toll On Chinese Society (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Officials steal from the people, friends lie to friends and uncles bilk nephews in a land where many are forced to cheat to survive, analysts say.

BEIJING — Talk about swimming with sharks.

Zhang Xingshui, an attorney with the Beijing Kingdom law firm, knows that like people everywhere else in the world, the Chinese don't always trust lawyers, who often promise things they can't deliver. But in China, he says, lawyers don't trust their clients, who like to skip out without paying. And neither trusts judges, who routinely disregard the law in favor of politics when rendering decisions.

"Living in such a society is tiring for everyone," Zhang said. "You're forced to be vigilant so you don't fall into pits, which are everywhere. Everybody is a victim and at the same time an offender."

Even as China surges onto the world stage as if powered by rocket fuel, Earth's most populous country is beset by trust issues that would test anyone.

Rules aren't clear and must be navigated on the fly. The food supply is full of life- and health-threatening fakes. Factories spew chemicals into the air and water at alarming rates. Power and connections far outweigh justice, and social tension is growing.

Meanwhile, corrupt local officials pay lip service to Communist Party ideals as they line their pockets at the expense of the general population. Land that farmers have tilled for generations can be seized on a moment's notice in a system that doesn't recognize private property. Friends cheat friends and uncles bilk nephews for short-term gain.

Though the widespread insecurity is difficult to quantify, analysts say it is taking an economic and psychological toll, and making governing more difficult.

"China is in a very serious trust crisis," said Zheng Yefu, a sociologist at Peking University and author of the book "On Trust." "I'd say we're looking at a minimum of a generation, maybe 20 or 30 years, to recover, but it could take two or three times that long."

Experts cite several reasons for the dearth of trust. Some point to the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution and other wrenching political campaigns in the first decades of communist rule that ended centuries-old traditions and forced family members and friends to denounce one another, severing basic human bonds.

"Mutual trust among people because of various political movements has deteriorated to the lowest level that any society can possibly hit," said Hung Huang, chief executive of China Interactive Media Group and star of the recent film "Perpetual Motion," about a woman out to determine which of her friends is having an affair with her husband. "There's also a very different starting point: In America, you're innocent until proven guilty. In China, you're guilty until proven innocent."

Others cite the influence of a market economy on a society without a well-developed legal or regulatory system. Some say a lack of religion or meaningful belief system under communism leaves people morally adrift.

The government has tried to address the problem with a recent morality campaign — "Eight Virtues and Eight Shames," a list of do's and don'ts, including "Be honest and trusting" and "Avoid being immoral for personal profit" — but some question Beijing's commitment.

DOJ_NMG_0068379

"Right now they're more concerned with building hardware, big buildings and dams than with morality and other software," said Zheng of Peking University. "And anyway, the government shares much of the blame for the present trust crisis."

Zhou Xiaozheng, a sociologist at People's University in Beijing, agreed, citing the example of wildly inaccurate government statistics released for political purposes, a general lack of accountability and systemic corruption in the party ranks.

"If the beam above is crooked, the beam below won't be straight, either," Zhou said. "Officials cheat the common people and the common people cheat those above them. It's a vicious cycle."

Systemic problems and outdated or intentionally skewed laws and regulations encourage companies and individuals to cut corners.

For example, a driver who kills a pedestrian faces a maximum liability of about $4,100 in rural Shaanxi province but upward of $37,000 in Shanghai. But when pedestrians are merely injured, there's in effect no cap on liability.

This can create some twisted incentives. When driver Ma Yinghao hit a pedestrian in December, he deliberately backed over the injured person in an attempt to kill him, hoping to avoid high hospital and compensatory fees.

Rather than fixing a flawed system, the state often responds by trying to prevent similar abuses through intimidation, which the Intermediate People's Court in Shijiazhuang did by sentencing Ma to death.

The problems affect some of China's most visible professions, including medicine, the media, education, accounting and manufacturing.

The advertising industry, for instance, which is a font of fake claims, is regulated by the Advertising Industry Assn. and a unit of China's State Administration of Industry and Commerce. Both are government-run, have their own agendas and, insiders say, don't even make a pretense of keeping up with industry practices, a function of an unresponsive one-party state that doesn't face political opposition or citizens who vote.

A flawed structure all but forces advertising account representatives to take kickbacks, given wage levels that won't support them, said Zhang Li, general manager of Beijing's Mid-South SeaSky Advertising Co.

"Mistrust in China is less a problem of individual morality than the system," which often makes it difficult to do the right thing, Zhang said. "Even someone so moral they'd jump into the water to save a drowning person might still cheat to survive."

In other parts of the economy, a relentless drive to make easy money has led to a spate of pyramid and other get-rich-quick schemes, with government regulators often uninterested in preventing abuse unless it becomes a political problem that jeopardizes their own careers, analysts say.

Distrust can roil marriages as well. The rapid spread of affairs has shocked many in China, especially in light of the not-too-distant past when employers approved all marriages, divorces, births, travel and job changes, putting a chill on most infidelity.

Chinese society's obsession with marital distrust was epitomized in the 2004 hit "Cellphone," in which a husband spends much of the movie giving excuses over his phone to hide his affairs. His most famous excuse, "Wo zai kaihui," or "I'm in a meeting," became a running joke.

"If you look at the news, watch television, go on the Internet, all you see is a lack of trust," said Wang Huifen, 39, a government worker. "Even within marriage there's no trust."

Does she trust her husband? "I don't want to talk about it," she said. "That's personal."

Cheating on your spouse and cheating the public are closely related, according to the state-run New China News Agency, which reported last year that 95% of Chinese officials convicted of corruption had mistresses.

In the marketplace, unscrupulous hucksters take advantage of the most basic of human needs and insecurities — from food, housing and medical care to welfare and education for treasured only children — to cheat their customers.

In Daoxianghu, an area of lakes, fields and "pay as you catch" fishing operations on the outskirts of Beijing, Shi Yingzhao fingers his bean and cucumber plants. A year ago, fed up with city life and tired of worrying about the poisons and additives in his food supply, the book editor moved into a courtyard home where he grows his own organic vegetables.

"I try not to eat anything from the market," he said. "You just don't know what you're eating. I don't use any chemicals or synthetic fertilizers. Of course you can't ever be 100% sure, because the bigger environment is already polluted."

It's no wonder he's worried. Purveyors of fake baby formula continue to victimize the poorest and least educated people more than a year after a 2004 scandal left 12 infants dead and hundreds of children malnourished or brain-damaged after they were fed white powder with no nutritional value.

There are scandals involving carcinogenic noodles, poisoned melon seeds, waste-filled pancakes, substandard wine and water-injected pork, among others.

According to the New China News Agency, 500 people suffer from sickening or deadly food poisoning a day, and a study released in June by the Chinese Academy of Preventive Medical Sciences found that one-third of foods labeled "nutritious for children" were completely lacking in nutritional value.

Often at the root of the problem are retailers with an extremely short-term outlook, limited accountability and little downside if they fleece their customers. Steven Qiu, 23, said he recently called a computer company in Beijing to make sure it had a particular Sony model he wanted. When he arrived, the company had no Sony products, let alone the item he wanted.

"They lied just to get me to come," he said. "I was furious — it cost me a lot of time and money. And in typical fashion, their attitude was terrible. They weren't in the least bit concerned who I complained to."

Shenanigans in the job market have given rise to a new profession: specialists hired to check the credentials of newly recruited staff. One government crackdown a few years ago revealed that 15,000 civil servant party members had used fake university degrees and other bogus certificates to get their jobs.

The very basis of trade, China's currency, is frequently counterfeited, and even the smallest retail outlets are equipped with special machines to check the authenticity of bills.

Yet Chinese have a high tolerance for uncertainty, some say, allowing them to cope with and even thrive under these conditions, as uncomfortable as they may be.

"After a while, it becomes quite normal," said Shi, the book editor. "While life for ordinary people is very hard, it also makes them strong and determined to survive."

Top Democrat In Hong Kong Will Not Run (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

HONG KONG, Sept. 23 — The most popular and influential democracy advocate here, Anson Chan, announced Saturday that she would not run for chief executive this winter, clearing the way for the re-election of Beijing's favorite for the job and underlining the limits to popular representation nine years after Britain returned Hong Kong to China.

Mrs. Chan, who had been Hong Kong's chief secretary and second-highest official before and after the return to Chinese rule, criticized the restrictive rules that Beijing has chosen for the selection of chief executives in this semiautonomous territory. "The present rules of the game really discourage eligible people from running," she said.

Under the Basic Law, the constitution that Beijing drafted in the late 1980's and early 1990's with some consultation here, an election committee of 800 prominent citizens chooses the chief executive. Many of those prominent citizens have substantial investments on the mainland or other ties to Beijing, and stay in close touch with China's leaders.

Beijing officials have put considerable pressure on election committee members to support another term for Donald Tsang, who has run the territory since the resignation of Tung Chee-hwa as chief executive in March 2005. Tsang Yok-sing, the vice chairman of the Democratic Alliance for the Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong, a pro-Beijing party that has more seats in the legislature than any other political party, said he planned to support Donald Tsang, who is not related, "because Beijing supports him."

Mrs. Chan, 66, has scrupulously avoided visiting Taiwan and taken other steps since retiring from the government in 2001 in the hope of preserving some political credibility with Beijing. But she said Saturday that she had tried and failed to find even one of the city's many influential business leaders who might be willing to join a new, seven-member group that will study ways to promote democracy here.

Mrs. Chan's decision not to run leaves democracy advocates in disarray, with no clear candidate. Election rules here require a candidate to be nominated by at least 100 members of the election committee.

Argentine Land Fight Divides Environmentalists, Rights Advocates (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

CONCEPCIÃ"N, Argentina -- From a flat patch of tree-studded savannah, the gaze stretches for miles: across a small pond where a marsh deer stops to drink, and over swampy wetlands where herons gingerly high-step.

Above it all, a small airplane drones. At the controls is Douglas Tompkins, an American who owns everything underneath him, paid for from the millions he earned as the founder of the North Face and Esprit clothing lines.

"It's an amazing piece of land," Tompkins said shortly after landing. "Extremely rich with biological diversity."

Now, many Argentine officials and social activists want to confiscate the property he says he bought to create an ecological preserve. They think that he and other wealthy foreigners who have bought enormous swaths of the Argentine and Chilean countryside are trying to wrest control of a continent under the guise of environmental preservation.

"We believe this is a new way of trying to dominate the South American countries," said Araceli Mendez, a congresswoman who represents this region and sponsored legislation last month that would expropriate Tompkins's land. "It is dangerous for the defense of our national security to have the concentration of so much land in the hands of foreigners."

Since the 1990s, the relatively cheap and expansive acreage of Argentina has attracted millionaires in search of unspoiled estates, including household names such as Ted Turner and Sylvester Stallone. But last month, Argentina's undersecretary for land and social habitat declared war on such land purchases with one highly symbolic act: He marched onto Tompkins's land, cut down a fence and called for the expropriation of the property.

Days later, he stood alongside the ambassadors of Venezuela and Bolivia -- two countries that recently have implemented measures to redistribute land from wealthy estate owners to the poor -- and made his intentions even clearer.

"We want to tell everyone: We're going to continue cutting down fences," said Luis D'Elia, the government secretary. "What is more important, the private property of a few, or the sovereignty of everyone?"

D'Elia, a former protest leader who recently joined President Nestor Kirchner's government, this month identified another target he plans to go after: Italy's Luciano Benetton, a clothing magnate who owns more Argentine land than any other single private landowner and who also espouses strict environmental stewardship.

Not only do these battles pit South American nationalism against foreign investors, they are drawing a bold line between two activist movements -- environmentalists and social justice advocates -- that are often grouped together under the same "progressive" label.

When Mendez presented to the National Congress the legislation to expropriate Tompkins's land, she was backed by some of the country's best-known human rights advocates, including the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo and other groups that famously fought against Argentina's dictatorship in the 1970s and 1980s.

The Catholic Church joined the chorus this month, issuing a 128-page document that warned against the "foreign-ization" of Argentine territory. Environmental groups, such as the Argentina Wildlife Foundation, have generally backed Tompkins.

"The social justice movements have been extremely poor at understanding ecological effects of their actions -- they're not green movements," said Tompkins, 67. "Concern about things like topsoil, which is the most valuable part of the land and often suffers under agrarian reform, is not being heard through the din of the need for the social redistribution of land. But that redistribution, for those who are not capable of handling it, will be a terrible blow to the future."

Since 1990, Tompkins and his wife -- Kristine McDivitt, the former chief executive of the Patagonia outdoor clothing company -- have bought about 4.7 million acres in Chile and Argentina. Their strategy is to identify properties in danger of ecologically damaging development, buy them, then create private parks that they eventually turn over to the local governments.

In Chile, they bought a large swath of land on the southern coast, creating a private park that they eventually turned over to the Chilean government to create the Parque Pumalin, which is roughly the size of Yosemite National Park. They did the same thing with the Monte Leon National Park on Argentina's side of Patagonia. Last year, they donated about 210,000 acres to Chile to form part of the Corcovado National Park.

Tompkins said he eventually hopes to do the same thing with his 741,000 acres in this species-rich wetland region. So when he hears D'Elia and others calling for his land, he sees an irony so thick that it appears nonsensical to him.

"They're shooting at the guy -- the only guy, practically, from the private sector -- who is buying land and then nationalizing it!" said a fired-up Tompkins, eating a bowl of granola for breakfast in the living room of the ranch house he keeps on the property.

Argentines, he said, don't understand his style of philanthropy. When he talks about eventually donating the land to the government, they suspect a catch. D'Elia has publicly hinted that he believes Tompkins is an agent of the U.S. government. That his property sits near the GuaranÃ- aquifer -- the third largest source of fresh water in the world -- has raised suspicions that he is trying to gain control of South America's water supply. Some say that a U.S. military base about 450 miles away in Paraguay is indirect evidence that Tompkins and the U.S. government might be working together.

The Benetton expropriation effort, meanwhile, centers on two families of Mapuche Indians who say that parts of his vast land holdings are ancestral property that belongs to them. Though Benetton offered to donate a portion of land to the Mapuche groups, the offer was rejected.

"The Benettons can't donate land that isn't theirs," Rosa Chiquichano, a representative of the Chubut province government, told ClarÃ-n newspaper.

A spokeswoman for the Benetton family, which owns 2.2 million acres in various provinces of Argentina, said a judge had previously ruled that the Mapuche groups have no legal rights to the land.

Such hectoring points to cultural differences that separate the American and European landowners from the residents who have lived in the region for centuries and want to hold on to traditional practices -- not legal rulings and fine print.

Tompkins traces the beginnings of the discontent to an American style of land management that is resented here -- specifically, his efforts to hold his neighboring landowners to environmental standards.

He recently financed a legal case against a local forestry company trying to build a dike through wetlands. It was the kind of environmental complaint that is made every day in the United States, but not in a region of Argentina where private ranch owners -- or estancieros -- have held most of the political power for centuries.

"Suddenly they see someone come in and say, 'Hey, what about the rules?' " Tompkins said. "That sort of galvanized people into action against me."

Kirchner's position on the issue remains cloudy. Though Mendez is the local representative of Kirchner's wing of the Peronist party and D'Elia is a longtime ally, Kirchner and other high-level government officials have tried to distance themselves from the controversy.

They label it a local dispute requiring a local solution. Kirchner hasn't publicly supported D'Elia's actions, but he hasn't condemned them, either. Last week, Kirchner was in New York for the U.N. General Assembly, where he was trying to woo foreign investment; on Wednesday, he rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange.

Tompkins, meanwhile, continued working on his property, overseeing projects such as the clearing of eucalyptus trees -- a non-native species that he is trying to replace with vegetation naturally found in the area.

"The Argentine government should look very carefully not at what passport someone carries," Tompkins said, "but at how they behave economically and ecologically."

Prudence's Struggle Ends (NYT)

YOKADOUMA, Cameroon

DOJ_NMG_0068383

As Prudence Lemokouno lay on a hospital bed here, spitting blood, her breath coming in terrible rattles, it was obvious that what was killing her wasn't so much complications in pregnancy as the casual disregard for women like her across much of the developing world.

Neither Western donor countries like the U.S. nor poor recipients like Cameroon care much about Africans who are poor, rural and female, and so half a million such women die each year around the world in pregnancy. It's not biology that kills them so much as neglect.

I began Prudence's story in my column last Sunday, and for a while I thought I would have a happy ending.

Prudence, 24, was from a small village and already had three small children. As she was in labor to deliver her fourth, an untrained midwife didn't realize she had a cervical blockage and sat on Prudence's stomach to force the baby out — but instead her uterus ruptured and the fetus died.

Prudence's family carried her to the hospital on a motorcycle, but once she was there the doctor, Pascal Pipi, demanded $100 for a Caesarian to remove the fetus. The fetus was decomposing inside her, and an infection was raging in her abdomen — but her family had total savings of only $20, so she lay down in the maternity ward and began to die.

I arrived the next day, interviewed Dr. Pipi about maternal mortality — and found Prudence fading away in the next room. Dr. Pipi said she needed a blood transfusion before the operation could begin, so a Times colleague, Naka Nathaniel, and I donated blood (yes, the needles were sterile) and cash.

The transfusion helped Prudence, and she grew strong enough to reach out her hand and respond to people around her. Dr. Pipi said the operation would begin promptly, and Prudence's family was ecstatic. But as we waited in the hospital lobby, Dr. Pipi sneaked out the back door of the hospital and went home for the night.

It wasn't just the doctor who failed Prudence, but the entire system. He did operate the next morning, but by then the infection had spread further — and the hospital had no powerful antibiotics. Prudence's breathing grew strained, as her stomach ballooned with the infection and the bag of urine from her catheter overflowed. The nurses couldn't be bothered with a poor villager like her.

That night she began vomiting and spitting blood. She slipped into a coma, and a towel beside her head grew soggy with blood and vomit. On Tuesday afternoon, she finally passed away.

Intellectually, I knew that women in Africa had a 1-in-20 lifetime risk of dying in childbirth. But it was wrenching to see this young mother of three fade and die so needlessly.

There's no doubt that if men were dying at this rate, poor and rich countries alike would make the issue a priority, but the problem seems invisible, like the victims.

The U.N. Population Fund has a maternal health program in some Cameroon hospitals that might have saved Prudence's life, but it doesn't operate in this region. And it's difficult to expand, because President Bush has cut U.S. funding for the population fund — even for African programs — because of false allegations that it supports abortions in China.

That's shameful. Two women have tried to recoup American honor by starting a group, 34 Million Friends of U.N.F.P.A., to make up the shortfall with private donations.

(I discuss some of the groups active in this area at nytimes.com/ontheground, and I'll also have a link to video of Prudence.)

Neither left nor right has focused adequately on maternal health. And abortion politics have distracted all sides from what is really essential: a major aid campaign to improve midwifery, prenatal care and emergency obstetric services in poor countries. We know exactly how to save the lives of women like Prudence, partly because a few countries like Sri Lanka and Honduras have led the way in slashing maternal mortality.

Lynn Freedman, head of the Averting Maternal Death and Disability program at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University (www.amdd.hs.columbia.edu), notes that we could provide all effective interventions for maternal and newborn health to 95 percent of the world's population for an additional $9 billion per year.

Sure, that's a lot. But think of Prudence and women like her dying in childbirth at a rate of one a minute — and after all, the world spends $40 billion a year on pet food.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Praises Afghan, Pakistani Allies (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

President Bush, playing middleman next week between sometimes-sparring neighbors Afghanistan and Pakistan, praised the U.S. allies Saturday for their work in defeating terrorism under difficult circumstances.

Bush met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the White House on Friday and has talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai scheduled for Tuesday. The next day, Bush hosts a meeting in the Oval Office with both presidents, followed by a working dinner.

The unusual set of meetings has two aims. One is placating the concerns of Pakistan, whose alliance with the U.S. in the war on terror causes domestic problems for Musharraf. The other is soothing the struggling democratic government in Afghanistan, which is suffering its heaviest insurgent threat since U.S.-led troops toppled the Taliban in late 2001.

"This will mark the second time in a few weeks that President Karzai and President Musharraf have also met together, and that's an important thing," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "So anything we can do to support them in their efforts to conduct as aggressively and effectively as possible the war on terror, we're going to do what we can to assist them."

In his weekly radio address, Bush complimented Musharraf for "siding with the forces of freedom and moderation and helping to defend the civilized world." As for Afghanistan, Bush said on the radio that Karzai is continuing "the work of building a safer and brighter future for his nation."

Musharraf and Karzai met in Kabul earlier this month and pledged to jointly fight militants.

With Pakistan, the United States has urged Musharraf to do more to stop militants from crossing from Pakistan's tribal regions into Afghanistan and fanning the violence by Taliban extremists. Afghan leaders say remnants of the Taliban have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border, while Pakistan rejects the charges.

Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border and signed a truce this month with tribal figures in an area where bin Laden is believed to be hiding. Musharraf said the truce calls for no al-Qaida or Taliban activity.

Some Afghan officials have labeled the truce as a deal with the Taliban. Musharraf strongly rejected that at Bush's side in the East Room after their meeting Friday. "This is against the Taliban, actually," Musharraf said.

Bush said he takes Musharraf at his word. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaida, I believe him," he said.

There was some dispute around the Bush-Musharraf meeting as to how Pakistan's decision to join the war on terror was made.

Musharraf told CBS' "60 Minutes" that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage told Pakistan's intelligence director right after the Sept. 11 attacks that the United States would bomb the country if it didn't become a partner in the war against terrorism. Bush said Friday he first learned of the purported conversation from news reports.

"I just don't know about it," he said. "I guess I was taken aback by the harshness of the words."

Musharraf declined to comment further, citing a book deal. Armitage said he never threatened a military strike but did tell Pakistan firmly that "you are either for us or against us."

Bush Lauds Cooperation Of Karzai, Musharraf In War On Terrorism (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, September 24, 2006

Sept. 23 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said talks next week with the ``courageous'' leaders of Pakistan and Afghanistan will show support for two key allies in the effort to marginalize extremists and fight terrorism.

Bush, who met yesterday at the White House with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, is scheduled to meet with Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai Sept. 27 in Washington. Bush is seeking assurances that the two leaders won't let militant Islamic Taliban and al-Qaeda forces regroup or hide in the mountainous border region that divides the two countries.

``Under President Musharraf, Pakistan is siding with the forces of freedom and moderation and helping to defend the civilized world,'' Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. ``It is in America's interest to help him succeed.''

Working with Karzai, ``we will defeat the enemies of a free Afghanistan and help the Afghan people build a nation that will never again oppress them or be a safe haven for terrorists," Bush said.

It was the sixth week in the past seven that Bush has made the war on terrorism the subject of his radio address, which capped a week of meetings at the United Nations and with Musharraf in Washington. Yesterday, Musharraf appeared with Bush at the White House, seeking to reassure the U.S. he is doing everything possible to fight terrorism and saying a recent treaty with Pakistani tribal leaders will deny refuge to Taliban fighters.

Pakistani Border

Musharraf has deployed about 90,000 troops along Pakistan's mountainous 1,500-mile border. The U.S. has 21,000 troops in Afghanistan, most of them in bases along the border and operating separately from a North Atlantic Treaty Organization force of about 20,0000 that is seeking to restore order within the country.

Taliban fighters have increased attacks in Afghanistan after Afghan and international forces expanded operations to the south and east. UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said two days ago that the violence in recent months poses the gravest threat to achieving peace in Afghanistan since the Taliban regime was ousted by U.S.-led forces in 2001.

November Elections

Bush's focus in the past month on national security and terrorism threats, centered on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., gave him a measurable boost in public support a month and a half before the congressional elections. The president's job approval rating rose to 45 percent in a Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll, a jump of 5 percentage points since July, according to the survey of 1,517 adults Sept. 16-19.

Support for Bush's handling of the war in Iraq rose 2 percentage points, to 40 percent, from the last poll. Most Americans, 56 percent, said they don't believe Bush when he says the U.S. military is making a lot of progress in turning Iraq into a safe, democratic country.

Almost 6,600 Iraqi civilians died in sectarian violence and insurgent attacks in July and August, according to a UN report earlier this week that blamed Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government and U.S. training of Iraqi security forces.

In the radio speech, Bush said, ``America will not abandon the Iraqi people in their struggle to defeat the terrorists and build a free society in the heart of the Middle East."

He also repeated his support for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

``By supporting moderate leaders such as President Abbas, the United States can help Israelis and Palestinians build a more hopeful future and achieve the peace we all want in the Holy Land," Bush said. ``We can support the moderates and reformers working for change across the broader Middle East, or we can yield the future to the terrorists and extremists."

Musharraf Visits N. Texas (DMN)

By Paul Meyer And James Ragland, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 23, 2006

Drive to Highland Park follows medical check-up in Paris

After a volatile week of high-level meetings in New York and Washington, Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf said Saturday in Highland Park that his trip has helped "clear certain misperceptions" about Pakistan's role in the war on terror.

Speaking in an exclusive interview with The Dallas Morning News, Gen. Musharraf reiterated his commitment to hunt down Osama bin Laden, and said he could not confirm reports that the al-Qaeda leader died last month of typhoid in Pakistan.

The general said he was aware of a French intelligence report of Mr. bin Laden's death, but could not comment on its details.

Gen. Musharraf spoke by phone during an unannounced trip to Texas on Saturday to undergo routine medical tests and visit with a personal physician.

He arrived at Paris (Texas) Regional Medical Center in the late morning for a checkup with cardiologist Arjumand Hashmi. Hospital officials said Gen. Musharraf was "found to be in excellent health."

After the president had his checkup, he attended a lunch in Paris before departing for Dallas. Later, he visited the doctor's Highland Park home.

"This is a beautiful place you have here," he said of his first visit to Texas.

Dr. Hashmi said he was simply "meeting an old friend" when asked about the high-profile patient on Friday.

"It's a private visit," he said "There's nothing to it."

The trip came on the eve of the broadcast of a CBS 60 Minutes interview in which Gen. Musharraf contends that the U.S. threatened to bomb the country "back to the Stone Age" if it refused to cooperate in the war on terror after the 9/11 attacks.

The Pakistani leader said he planned to watch the interview tonight in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0068388

"The perception of Pakistan is to the better," he said of his trip to America. "We explained our point of view effectively."

In both Paris and Highland Park, the cloak-and-dagger visit generated a buzz in two normally sedate small towns.

A motorcade of more than two dozen cars, including state trooper vehicles, Secret Service cars and a Paris hospital ambulance made the trip from Dallas to Paris mid-morning.

Phillip Hamilton, managing editor of The Paris News, said that about 20 people, including at least one other Paris physician, were at the house and dined with Gen. Musharraf.

He said the Pakistani president stood up to say goodbye shortly before 3 p.m..

"I asked him how his visit went yesterday [with President Bush], and he said it was extremely positive," Mr. Hamilton said. "And I asked him about the Stone Age comment, and he said he can't comment on that" because the general promised his book publishers not to do so before the release of his memoir on Monday.

Dr. Hashmi's family is leasing their Highland Park home from Dallas author Jane Wolfe, who recently relocated to France.

Reached at her home in Paris, France, Ms. Wolfe said, "I never envisioned the house being used for a state visit but I am certainly delighted. I got a frantic phone call on Friday that the water heater had broken. Dr. Hashmi was so nice, he said, 'I am having guests for the weekend, but we can get by without hot water.' "

The water heater was promptly repaired.

Ambassador To Simon & Schuster (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The Pakistani president's refusal to discuss an allegation in his upcoming autobiography spells trouble for diplomacy?

NEWS FLASH: PAKISTANI PRESIDENT Pervez Musharraf accuses a senior Bush administration official of threatening to bomb his country back to the Stone Age! We'll get on with this potentially serious diplomatic incident in a moment — but first, a word from our sponsor, Simon & Schuster.

That was the gist of an odd commercial break in Friday's news conference by Musharraf and President Bush. The somewhat embarrassing love fest between the two leaders was moving along smoothly when a reporter asked about the explosive allegation scheduled to be broadcast tonight on CBS' "60 Minutes": In the wake of 9/11, Musharraf claims, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage threatened that the U.S. would bomb Pakistan unless it cooperated in the war on terror.

"I am launching my book on the 25th, and I am honor-bound to Simon & Schuster not to comment on the book before that day," Musharraf replied.

"In other words, buy the book, is what he's saying," Bush helpfully translated.

International diplomacy has always been dependent on external factors, but it has seldom hinged on the terms of a book contract. At a time when the developing world is protesting what it sees as U.S. unilateralism and bullying — as evidenced by the stark anti-American speeches (and their friendly reception) at last week's annual United Nations General Assembly session — Musharraf's claim threw gasoline on the bonfire. Yet rather than discuss and help resolve the matter during his U.S. visit, Musharraf decided instead simply to plug his upcoming autobiography.

Of course, there might be more behind Musharraf's reticence than a shameless ploy to sell books. Pakistan's president is in a very difficult jam.

Bush, Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai are slated to dine together Wednesday, and security issues will doubtless dominate the agenda. The fighting in Afghanistan has grown more intense than any time since the fall of the Taliban in 2001, largely because militants trained and armed in Pakistan are freely crossing the border. Rather than crack down, Musharraf in early September signed a truce that essentially guaranteed free rein for the extremists. Karzai is rightfully angry, and Bush has ample reason to side with him. Not only is the Afghan violence harming U.S. troops, but key Al Qaeda figures, including Osama bin Laden, are believed to be hiding out in Pakistan. Yet Musharraf's soon-to-be-released claims of a threatened bomb attack will make it politically difficult for Bush to exert any real pressure.

So maybe diplomacy and book publishing aren't that different after all. In both, timing is everything.

Officials Doubt Report Of Bin Laden's Death (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

French Paper Cites Intelligence Document

PARIS, Sept. 23 -- French and U.S. officials discounted a report Saturday in a French newspaper indicating that Osama bin Laden had died of typhoid last month in a remote area of Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0068389

The newspaper, L'Est Republicain, quoted a confidential document from the French secret service as saying that "according to a reliable source, Saudi security services are now convinced that Osama bin Laden is dead."

The newspaper reported that intelligence officials had given the document, dated Sept. 21, to President Jacques Chirac, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and the interior and defense ministers.

A senior French official acknowledged the existence of the document, but Chirac said at a news conference Saturday that there was no confirmation that the leader of the al-Qaeda terror network had died.

"This information is in no way whatsoever confirmed," Chirac told reporters, declining to comment further.

U.S. intelligence sources also cast serious doubt on the report, saying there was no information to support its claims.

Saudi Arabia's Interior Ministry offered no details. "I've heard the reports, but I have no information at all. I have no idea," a spokesman, Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki, told the Associated Press.

Senior government officials in Pakistan and U.S. diplomats there and in Afghanistan said they were not aware of any Saudi intelligence reports indicating that bin Laden may have died, news services reported.

The French defense minister, Michele Alliot-Marie, has ordered an investigation into the leak of the document.

"The report cited this morning by the newspaper L'Est Republicain related to the supposed death of Osama bin Laden cannot be confirmed," the Defense Ministry said in a statement. "The minister of defense has ordered an investigation to determine the origin of this leak, which is likely to constitute an offense subject to penal sanctions."

According to L'Est Republicain, the French intelligence report said: "Information gathered by the Saudis indicates that the head of al-Qaeda was a victim while he was in Pakistan on Aug. 23, 2006, of a very serious case of typhoid, which led to a partial paralysis of his internal organs."

Typhoid is a bacterial disease that can be spread in food or drink handled by a carrier or through contaminated sewage.

The newspaper said that, according to the document, the remoteness of the area where the alleged illness occurred would have made any medical treatment impossible. The report said Saudi officials were awaiting further confirmation, particularly the exact place of bin Laden's burial, before announcing his death.

Bin Laden, born in Saudi Arabia, is believed to be hiding in the remote areas along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, where he has used the rugged terrain and sympathetic locals to evade capture.

U.S. and Pakistani officials have said recently that they had not received a credible lead on his whereabouts in more than two years.

No Confirmation On An Article Announcing Bin Laden's Death (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 23 — French officials said Saturday that the government could not confirm intelligence information published in a French newspaper that the terrorist leader Osama bin Laden died in Pakistan last month.

On Saturday, the newspaper, L'Est Républicain, quoted an internal memorandum from France's foreign intelligence service, the D.G.S.E., as saying, "Saudi intelligence services seem to be sure that Osama bin Laden is dead. The elements gathered by the Saudis indicate that the head of Al Qaeda was the victim, while he was in Pakistan on Aug. 23, 2006, of a strong case of typhoid fever that led to a partial paralysis of his lower limbs."

A senior French intelligence official confirmed that the document was authentic but said the information was "absolutely, absolutely not verified." The official said the memorandum had been sent to the president, prime minister and some ministries as a regular report on terrorism-related intelligence traffic.

President Jacques Chirac responded to questions from reporters by saying, "This information is in no way confirmed, in no way whatsoever, and I have no comment to make about it." The defense ministry, which oversees the D.G.S.E., said it would investigate how the memorandum had been leaked.

In Washington, an American intelligence official expressed strong doubt about the report, which he noted was not the first rumor of Mr. bin Laden's death. "We can't confirm this," said the official, who discussed the matter only on condition of anonymity. "I think it ought to be treated with a great deal of skepticism."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said he could not confirm news reports of Mr. bin Laden's death.

According to the report, the French memorandum said the Saudis first heard Sept. 4 that Mr. bin Laden had died, but were awaiting further details, including the location of the body, to announce the news. The information was passed from Saudi Arabia by a non-Saudi who had proved reliable in the past, said the French intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Saudi Interior Ministry was not available for comment on Saturday, the first day of Ramadan.

Pierre Taribo, the editor in chief of L'Est Républicain, a regional daily, defended his newspaper's decision to publish the unconfirmed memorandum. "It's a note that exists, and from this point on we consider that we did our job, which is to inform," he said in a telephone interview.

Several reports of Mr. bin Laden's death have surfaced since he went into hiding in 2001. His last confirmed videotaped message was released in late 2004; several audio tapes attributed to him have been released this year.

Officials Skeptical About Report Bin Laden Is Dead (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS — A leaked French intelligence memo reporting that Osama bin Laden had died of illness last month caused a flurry of speculation Saturday, but skeptical French, U.S. and Arab officials said they had no information confirming the report.

French President Jacques Chirac told journalists the intelligence report had "by no means been confirmed, not whatsoever." And a French security official cautioned that the memo was based on uncorroborated intelligence from a single source.

"We are not confirming whatever has been said in this report because we consider it a source among other sources," said the French security official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Our services, like others around the world, don't use just one source for reaching such a conclusion, they need multiple sources. We don't think this is a reliable report at this stage."

The latest rumblings about the elusive Al Qaeda leader came from an unlikely source: a small regional newspaper. L'Est Republicain, based in the eastern city of Nancy, published an article Saturday along with a copy of a confidential Sept. 21 memo from France's foreign intelligence agency, which is overseen by the Defense Ministry and known by the initials DGSE.

The memo informed the president's office and the defense minister that Saudi intelligence had "become convinced" that Bin Laden was dead, according to the newspaper.

"The data gathered by the Saudis indicates that the chief of Al Qaeda would have been a victim, while in Pakistan on August 23, 2006, of a very strong attack of typhoid," the intelligence memo said, according to the paper. "His geographic isolation, caused by his permanent fugitive status, made any medical care impossible. On Sept. 4, the Saudi security services obtained the first intelligence about his death."

As in Paris, the response in Washington was skeptical and cautious. "We don't have any confirmation of that report," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

Two U.S. intelligence officials and a senior official of an Arab country also tracking Bin Laden said much the same thing.

The officials were slightly less skeptical about the possibility that Bin Laden was gravely ill. For years, Bin Laden has been rumored to be suffering from a debilitating kidney disease, perhaps requiring dialysis.

"We've been down this road many times before, and there is no reason to think that this one has any more credence than the others," the U.S. intelligence official said.

Bin Laden was last seen in a videotape released in 2004. His voice was last heard in an audiotape released June 29, in which he mourned the slaying by U.S. forces of Abu Musab Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's kingpin in Iraq.

Spy agencies have not detected any "chatter" among Al Qaeda operatives or other traditional indicators of a momentous event such as Bin Laden's death, officials said.

Despite the reservations about its contents, French officials did not question the authenticity of the memo. Chirac said he had ordered an internal investigation of the leak.

French officials said DGSE has good sources in the Arab world, and the Saudis know a lot about Bin Laden, a Saudi native.

But U.S. and Pakistani intelligence services probably would have better information because they are leading the hunt for Bin Laden, a top French anti-terrorism official said. He said he was not aware of any increased talk among international counter-terrorism officials.

"The Pakistanis and the Americans would be more likely to have confirmed it by now," the official said.

The Arab official was equally skeptical. "If he died a month ago you couldn't keep it a secret for two days," the official said. "You'd have to bury the body quickly, and there would be a buzz all over the place, on the Internet and everywhere else."

If the Saudi government had received hard information about Bin Laden's death or imminent death, it would have gone immediately to a U.S.-Saudi counter-terrorism center in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, officials said. From there, it would have been sent to Washington within hours, the officials said, adding that no such referrals have taken place.

Intelligence officials are trying to monitor Al Qaeda operatives in Pakistan and Afghanistan that compose the network's brain trust, as well as associates worldwide with whom they are most likely to communicate such news about Bin Laden.

"What effect would his death or impending death have on the movement? Will there be a race to see who picks up his mantle? Does [second-in-command] Ayman Zawahiri step into his shoes, or someone else? Would the organization be more fragmented, or less, as his senior associates consolidate? Will recruiting spike, or decline?" said a second U.S. intelligence official, an Al Qaeda expert.

Bin Laden's death by a serious illness such as typhoid probably would make him as much a martyr in the eyes of Al Qaeda members as being killed in battle, the second official said.

"They would say that Allah has brought this great leader to his reward," the official said. "That he died a natural death after escaping the biggest manhunt in the world, and without suffering the indignities of being killed or injured by the infidels."

Bin Laden Death Report Doubted (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

PARIS -- A leaked French intelligence document raises the possibility Osama bin Laden died of typhoid, but President Jacques Chirac said yesterday the report was "in no way whatsoever confirmed" and officials from Kabul to Washington expressed skepticism about its accuracy.

There have been numerous reports over the years that bin Laden had been killed or that he was dangerously ill, but the al Qaeda leader has periodically released audiotapes appealing to followers and commenting on current news events.

The regional French newspaper L'Est Republicain printed what it described as a copy of a confidential document from the DGSE intelligence service citing an uncorroborated report from a "usually reliable source" who said Saudi secret services were convinced that bin Laden had died.

The document, dated Thursday, was sent to Mr. Chirac and other top French officials, the newspaper said.

"This information is in no way whatsoever confirmed," Mr. Chirac said when asked about the document. "I have no comment."

Last night, the Saudi Embassy in Washington issued a statement saying, "The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has no evidence to support recent media reports that Osama bin Laden is dead," according to Agence France-Presse. "Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had "no comment and no knowledge" about the report, while presidential spokesman Blair Jones said the White House could not confirm the report's accuracy.

But two U.S. intelligence officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said U.S. agencies had no information to suggest bin Laden was dead or dying.

A senior official in Afghanistan's Foreign Ministry said he was very skeptical of the document, noting past false reports of the death of bin Laden. He declined to let his name be used because he was not authorized to discuss the issue publicly.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, called the information "speculative," saying her government had no information on bin Laden.

Many people suspect bin Laden and other al Qaeda leaders are hiding in the mountains in Pakistan along the border with Afghanistan.

Among previous reports, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said during the U.S.-led offensive that toppled Afghanistan's Taliban regime in late 2001 that he was "reasonably sure" bin Laden had been killed by U.S. bombing raids on the Tora Bora caves.

The Washington-based IntelCenter, which monitors terrorism communications, said it was not aware of reports on the Internet speculating about bin Laden and a life-threatening illness.

"We've seen nothing from any al Qaeda messaging or other indicators that would point to the death of Osama bin Laden," IntelCenter director Ben N. Venzke told AP.

Officials Investigate Unconfirmed Report Of Bin Laden's Death (MCT)

By Hannah Allam, Jonathan Landay And Matt Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068392

CAIRO, Egypt - A French intelligence report that says Osama bin Laden may have died of typhoid in Pakistan last month is causing a stir among al-Qaida trackers who'd already raised concerns about why it's been two years since bin Laden has appeared in a video.

President Jacques Chirac confirmed the existence of the report but stressed that the information in it is "in no way whatsoever confirmed." The United States and several allied governments also cast doubt on the authenticity of the claims, which have been made before and proven erroneous.

News of the al-Qaida chief's possible death surfaced Saturday with a French newspaper's publication of a confidential document from the French foreign intelligence service DGSE that relayed the unconfirmed findings of Saudi agents. The report said Saudi security first received word Sept 4 of bin Laden's alleged death. It was said to have occurred on Aug. 23.

"According to a usually reliable source, Saudi security services are now convinced that Osama bin Laden is dead," said the report published Saturday in the regional newspaper l'Est Republicain.

An American intelligence official, who requested anonymity because the issue is highly classified, said U.S. intelligence analysts consider the report bogus. He said there's "no evidence to support or reason to believe" that bin Laden is dead. He added that U.S. officials were aware of the unconfirmed report before it was made public by the newspaper.

Vincent Cannistraro, a former chief of the CIA's Counter-Terrorism Center, said he was deeply skeptical of the French report.

"There's no confirmation of the report" from U.S. officials Cannistraro said, adding that the sourcing "appears to be very soft."

He said that if bin Laden had died, U.S. intelligence agencies would have picked up "indicators," such as condolence messages from grieving relatives.

"If someone had really died, there are public grievances by relatives and there is no such thing here," he said. "You can hide things among your followers, but not among your relatives."

Yet even before the French report emerged, speculation was mounting among al-Qaida analysts over why it's been two years since the terror chief has appeared in a video message.

While 2006 was a record year for al-Qaida communiques - with more than three times the number of videos from any previous year - none of the tapes showed bin Laden. Several audiotapes purportedly by bin Laden have aired, and the CIA has confirmed their authenticity, but some scholars who closely monitor bin Laden suspect they're old recordings spliced to sound as if they're related to current events.

"I'm not convinced any of the tapes we heard in 2006 are new," said Bruce Lawrence, a Duke University professor and author of the book, "Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden."

Lawrence, who's been described as one of the world's leading al-Qaida archivists, added that "there's something staged and strange" about the wording and style of some of the recently released tapes.

Bin Laden's last video appearance was in October 2004, when the al Jazeera satellite TV channel aired footage of him appealing directly to Americans just before the presidential election.

Lawrence said rumors abounded that bin Laden suffered from kidney trouble and other ailments, but noted that reliable information was scarce.

"He's been living a very rugged life for 15 years, and it's probably taken a toll on him," Lawrence said. "(But) if you're an intelligence person and your target is al-Qaida and bin Laden is one of the most important people you track, the question now becomes: Why haven't we seen bin Laden in two years?"

Lawrence said it would be "disastrous" for the Bush administration to focus on bin Laden's absence, only to have the al-Qaida leader issue a new tape to prove he's alive and still eluding a massive manhunt.

"It doesn't serve the government to say bin Laden is dead unless someone can take credit for killing him," Lawrence said. "Suppose all this speculation is wrong and bin Laden is just on sabbatical?"

Even if the reports are true, U.S. and foreign analysts say, bin Laden's death is unlikely to dent the global jihadist movement he helped create. Through the years, al-Qaida has metastasized into a loose confederation of groups inspired - but not directed - by him and his second-in-command, the Egyptian-born Ayman al Zawahiri.

Al Zawahiri has emerged as the most visible al-Qaida leader in the past two years, but even he hasn't been directing attacks such as those in Bali, Madrid and London, according to two senior U.S. counterterrorism officials.

Two American officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the matter involves classified information, said bin Laden's death, if true, would do U.S. interests little good.

"The sorry truth is that if bin Laden is dead, he's now a very large martyr in what a lot of Muslims have come to believe is a war against Islam," one of the officials said.

Chirac announced a probe to find out how the document was leaked to l'Est Republicain, a regional newspaper known for its investigative reports on security matters.

The DGSE, or Direction Generale des Services Exterieurs, sent the document to Chirac and other top French intelligence officials, according to the published account. The claim of bin Laden's death came from a single source, the DSGE document indicated. It said that Saudi agents were pursuing more detailed information, including the location of bin Laden's alleged burial site,

"The chief of al-Qaida was a victim of a severe typhoid crisis while in Pakistan on August 23, 2006," the newspaper quoted the intelligence document as stating. His remote location made medical assistance impossible, the French report said, adding that his lower limbs were partially paralyzed.

A Combative Clinton Defends Record On Fighting Terrorism (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Former President Faults Neocons for Inaction on Bin Laden

Former president Bill Clinton angrily defended his administration's counterterrorism record during a Fox News interview to be aired today, while accusing "President Bush's neocons" and other Republicans of ignoring Osama bin Laden until the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Clinton had planned to discuss his climate change initiative during his appearance on "Fox News Sunday," but he turned combative after host Chris Wallace asked why he hadn't "put bin Laden and al-Qaeda out of business." Clinton shot back that "all the conservative Republicans" who now criticize him for inattention to bin Laden used to criticize him for over-attention to bin Laden.

Clinton said he authorized the CIA to kill bin Laden, and even "contracted with people to kill him." He also said he had a plan to attack Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban and hunt for bin Laden after the attack on the USS Cole, but the CIA and FBI refused to certify that bin Laden was responsible, and Uzbekistan refused to allow the United States to set up a base. By contrast, Clinton said the Bush administration's neoconservatives "had no meetings on bin Laden for nine months," believing he had been "too obsessed with bin Laden."

"At least I tried," Clinton said. "That's the difference [between] me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now. They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try. I tried. So I tried and failed. When I failed, I left a comprehensive anti-terror strategy and the best guy in the country, [Richard] Clarke, who got demoted."

Clinton seemed particularly irked by Wallace's reference to his decision in 1993 to pull troops out of Somalia, a move bin Laden later described as a sign of American weakness. Clinton argued that even though many Republicans demanded a withdrawal from Somalia the day after the downing of a Black Hawk helicopter, he kept a U.S. presence there for another six months to ensure an orderly transition to United Nations forces.

That's when the interview got testy, as a Fox transcript reflects:

Clinton : There is not a living soul in the world who thought Osama bin Laden had anything to do with Black Hawk down or was paying any attention to it, or even knew al-Qaeda was a going concern in October '93.

Wallace : I understand.

Clinton : No, no, wait. Don't tell me that -- you asked why didn't I do more to bin Laden, there was not a living soul, all the people who now criticize me wanted to leave the next day. You brought this up, so you get an answer. But you -- secondly,

Wallace : -- Bin Laden says, but it showed the weakness of the United States.

Clinton : Bin Laden may have said it -- but it would have shown the weakness if we left right away. But he wasn't involved in that, that's just a bunch of bull. That was about Mohamed Aideed, a Muslim warlord, murdering 22 Pakistani Muslim troops. We were all there on a humanitarian mission; we had no mission, none, to establish a certain kind of Somali government or keep anybody out. He was not a religious fanatic --

Wallace : Mr. President --

Clinton : -- there was no al-Qaeda --

Wallace : With respect, if I may, instead of going through '93 and --

Clinton : No, no -- you asked it. You brought it up.

Wallace, a 30-year broadcast veteran who worked at NBC and ABC before Fox, is not usually considered part of the network's conservative commentariat, but Clinton accused him of doing "Fox's bidding" by preparing a "conservative hit job."

He attacked Wallace for failing to ask Bush administration officials why Clarke was demoted from his counterterrorism job: "Tell the truth, Chris. Tell the truth, Chris. Did you ever ask that?" He also complained that Wallace had lured him to the interview

"under false pretences," but when Wallace offered to discuss his climate change project, he replied: "No, I want to finish this now."

And so he did, attacking President Bush for focusing on Iraq instead of Afghanistan, urging Americans to read Clarke's book and accusing Republicans of "a serious disinformation campaign" to blame the Clinton administration for losing bin Laden.

"I got closer to killing him than anybody's gotten since," Clinton said. "And if I were still president, we'd have more than 20,000 troops there trying to kill him. . . . You got that little smirk on your face and you think you're so clever, but I had responsibility for trying to protect this country. I tried and I failed to get bin Laden. I regret it, but I did try and I did everything I thought I responsibly could."

By Curt Anderson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, September 24, 2006

MIAMI -- The Bush administration's decision to drop the "enemy combatant" label from alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla and prosecute him on civilian terror charges has not gone smoothly, with even the judge in the case raising questions about sketchy evidence and a vague indictment.

Trial for Padilla - an American once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive bomb - and two co-defendants was initially scheduled for early September. But it's now off until January and may be delayed further into 2007 if prosecutors file their expected appeal of U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke's dismissal of a crucial charge.

Cooke has also pronounced the U.S. case "weak on facts" and agreed with defense lawyers that prosecutors must provide more details about what crimes the trio may have actually committed instead of relying on sweeping allegations that they were involved in a violent Islamic jihad over a decade on several continents.

In response to one question about identities of any alleged victims, prosecutors listed armed confrontations against the Russian military in Chechnya and Tajikistan, opposing Muslim factions in Afghanistan and Serbian and Croat forces in Bosnia. They also cited violent acts against more moderate Muslim governments around the world.

Many legal experts say that kind of broad evidence won't be good enough for a jury, which must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Padilla and the others committed crimes. And to prove that, prosecutors must have specific violent acts and specific victims, experts say.

"You've got to mount a sufficient body of evidence to support the charges, and that's what's lacking," said Scott Silliman, law professor and executive director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security at Duke University. "If he is acquitted, it will be in my judgment a severely embarrassing moment for the government."

The difficulty prosecutors have in defining exactly what Padilla and the others allegedly did is a recurrent issue in terrorism cases where charges are brought before a violent act takes place, said Jeffrey F. Addicott, director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University School of Law.

"Law enforcement often faces the problem of stopping the terrorist before they strike, which means the overt act never happens," Addicott said. "It makes prosecution more difficult, but not impossible."

U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment on the status of the case, but has in the past expressed confidence in the strength of the government's evidence.

Padilla, a 35-year-old former member of the Latin Disciples gang in Chicago, was arrested by the FBI in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport and designated a month later as an "enemy combatant" by President Bush.

He was held by the U.S. military and interrogated without charge or real access to a lawyer for 3 1/2 years, with former Attorney General John Ashcroft famously claiming on television that Padilla was arrested while on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city.

With Bush's authority to hold an American like Padilla indefinitely without charge under legal challenge before the U.S. Supreme Court, the administration sidestepped the question last November by dropping the "enemy combatant" label and adding him to an existing Miami case charging alleged members of a North American terrorism support cell. No "dirty bomb" is mentioned in that indictment.

"There is a bit of a pattern in these cases of the government overstating what it can actually prove," said Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor.

Padilla couldn't be transferred to the U.S. terrorist detention camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and possibly tried before a military commission there because he is a U.S. citizen. So even if Congress succeeds in rewriting the rules for those commissions, Padilla will get his day in federal court.

The indictment essentially contends that Padilla, who had relocated in the 1990s to South Florida and converted to Islam, was recruited to al-Qaida by Adham Amin Hassoun, a Sunrise computer programmer allegedly active in the jihadist worldwide network. A third defendant, Kifah Wael Jayyousi, is accused of funneling support to terror groups in part through his "Islam Report" newsletter.

In a setback for the government's case, Cooke ruled in August that count one of the indictment, alleging a conspiracy to "murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country," must be dismissed because it duplicates other charges. Prosecutors are likely to appeal that ruling, which tosses out the only charge carrying a possible life sentence.

Other potential weaknesses in the case against include:

-Padilla's voice is heard on only eight of some 50,000 FBI wiretap recordings and his name is mentioned on about 20 others. His lawyers say violence or jihad is not discussed on any of those recordings, and some of them are between Padilla's mother and Hassoun. Most involve subjects such as Padilla's whereabouts, his marriage and his children, his lawyers say.

-A key piece of physical evidence is a "mujahideen" application Padilla allegedly completed to attend an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. Prosecutors say his fingerprints are on it. They have refused to produce a list of anyone who may have been at the camp at the same time or whose forms were found along with that application. They intend to call as a witness Yahya Goba, a convicted 28-year-old member of the so-called "Lackawanna Six" terror cell in upstate New York, who will tell jurors he filled out a similar form but at a later date. Goba could get a reduced prison sentence in return for his cooperation.

-Over government objections, Cooke ordered the Bush administration to turn over medical records from Padilla's long stretch in military custody. Defense lawyers say they will look for instances of possible misconduct during interrogations or use of drugs that might have impaired Padilla in some way.

-A magistrate judge found that Jayyousi's publication of the "Islam Report" may be protected by the First Amendment because it "merely advocated terrorism in general, or jihad at some indefinite time" rather than providing specific instructions or signals for a crime to be committed. Jayyousi is the only defendant to win pretrial release on bail.

Some experts compared the Padilla case to that of former University of South Florida professor Sami al-Arian, who was cleared of terrorism charges after a five-month trial in 2005. That case also involved thousands of telephone and wiretap intercepts but little direct links between al-Arian and particular acts of Palestinian violence overseas.

"If it's not a problem as a matter of law that they are getting people on talk rather than action, it certainly is a problem with juries," said Michael Greenberger, law professor at the University of Maryland. "If all they produce is telephone conversations, they run the risk that they are not going to convince a jury to convict."

'Islamo-Fascism' Had Its Moment (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON

SHORTLY after terrorists attacked the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, President Bush's speechwriters began grappling with a linguistic puzzle: What to call the enemy? In the five years since, Mr. Bush has road-tested an array of terms: evildoers, jihadists, Islamic extremists, even "Al Qaeda suiciders."

But no phrase has crashed and burned as fast as the president's most recent entry into the foreign policy lexicon: Islamic fascists, or, Islamo-fascism.

This latest iteration, which has percolated in neoconservative circles for several years, turned up in one of the president's speeches last year, and resurfaced in August when British authorities foiled a plot to blow up airliners headed for the United States. It was, Mr. Bush said then, "a stark reminder that this nation is at war with Islamic fascists who will use any means to destroy those of us who love freedom."

By Labor Day, Islamic fascists and Islamo-fascism were the hot new conservative buzzwords.

And then, just as suddenly, they were gone — at least from the president's lips.

"The debate that we wanted to launch was about an ideological struggle against an enemy that has very specific plans, ambitions and aspirations, much like movements of the past, like fascism and Nazism," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president. Addressing the term Islamic fascists, Mr. Bartlett said, "I'm sure he'll use it again."

But it seems unlikely Mr. Bush will use it again, given the outcry it provoked.

Muslims, both here and in other countries, were deeply offended. Even Karen Hughes, the former counselor to Mr. Bush who now runs the public diplomacy arm of the State Department, pushed back, telling CNN's Wolf Blitzer that she typically does not "use religious terms" for fear they will be misinterpreted around the world.

"The problem with the phrase is that it confuses more than it clarifies," says David Gergen, a former speechwriter for Richard Nixon. "It's important to find a phrase that's meaningful in the Arabic world, and Islamic fascism has no meaning."

The precise etymology of “Islamo-fascism” is unclear. Some say that the writer Christopher Hitchens introduced it into post-9/11 discourse. But Stephen Schwartz, executive director of the Center for Islamic Pluralism, which promotes moderate Muslim views, also takes credit, describing the phrase in a recent article as one that “refers to the use of the faith of Islam as a cover for totalitarian ideology.”

If “Islamic fascists” and “Islamo-fascism” have disappeared from Mr. Bush’s oratory — they were nowhere to be found in his 9/11 anniversary speeches, for instance — questions about the phrases have not. The president was forced to grapple with such inquiries twice last week alone. On Friday, in response to a Pakistani journalist, Mr. Bush invoked a far more general term: “these extremists.”

All of which leaves the central problem — what to call the enemy — unresolved.

“I’d prefer to call them Islamists,” said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian and neoconservative thinker at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. Fascists, Mr. Kagan said, idealize a strong man, like Hitler or Mussolini. “Bin Laden’s stated aim is for Allah to be venerated, so I think it’s a very different thing.”

David Frum, a former speechwriter for Mr. Bush, said the president turned to “evildoers” right after Sept. 11, 2001, in part because it translated well in Arabic and in part because it appeared in Psalm 27, which Mr. Frum says is one of the president’s favorite psalms. (“When evildoers came upon me to devour my flesh.”)

But evildoers has a kind of comic-book sound, and in any event, Mr. Frum says, it isn’t specific enough. He suggests Mr. Bush find an Arabic phrase to popularize — so long as it does not involve the word jihad, a term with a negative connotation in the United States, but positive overtones in the Muslim world.

Peter Beinart, the editor at large of The New Republic, has his own solution: “jihadi salafi,” which he loosely translates as “someone who would use violence, and ultimately state violence, to bring about a utopian vision of Islam.” So what if no one knows what it means.

“If Bush had been using it all these years,” Mr. Beinart said, “people would know it like the back of their hand.”

Maybe he should have stuck with Al Qaeda suiciders.

The 'Prudence Party' Takes On An Insurgent (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

To President Bush's supporters, nothing is more exhilarating than his willingness, even eagerness, to challenge long-established assumptions and policies, especially in foreign policy. "As an insurgent, with few ties in Washington," conservative journalist Fred Barnes wrote admiringly in his recent book, "Rebel-in-Chief," "Bush has found it easy to overturn major policies with scarcely a second thought."

To Bush's critics, that's exactly the problem.

As his second term proceeds, he's facing increasing resistance from what might be called the "prudence party." The prudence party represents a particular corner of the U.S. establishment. Informal and amorphous, it is populated by top-level corporate and Wall Street executives, former diplomats, retired military officers and some veteran legislators on Capitol Hill.

As a group, the prudence party is more Republican than Democratic. In modern political terms, it is more centrist than conservative, though it is profoundly conservative in the word's traditional meaning: it looks skeptically at radical change, especially when it is implemented "with scarcely a second thought." The prudence party generally believes that assumptions and procedures that have lasted for decades are usually so entrenched for a good reason. It has a healthy respect for the law of unintended consequences.

During Bush's first term, the prudence party gnashed its teeth over his movement to downplay America's reliance on our traditional allies, a tendency that culminated in the decision to invade Iraq without explicit authorization from the United Nations. But mostly those in this group bit their tongues.

Signs of the unease emerged in the 2004 presidential campaign. One came when several retired generals prominently endorsed the Democratic candidate, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts. Another was a statement issued during the campaign from a separate group of retired diplomats and military officials criticizing Bush's foreign policy.

But both of those groups tilted toward names identified more with the Democratic side of the foreign policy establishment. In Bush's second term, a broader spectrum of voices from the prudence party have dissented. The demands from retired military officers for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld earlier this year offered one indication of the discontent in these circles.

Even more telling was the resistance Bush faced in his effort to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Convention toward detainees in the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0068397

It wasn't particularly surprising to find Republican Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina leading that opposition; both are iconoclasts who have opposed Bush on other national security choices.

But behind them stood Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the 79-year-old chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, former Secretary of the Navy and the virtual white-haired embodiment of the prudence party.

And behind Warner stood an even more imposing phalanx of gray eminences — retired Gen. John Vessey, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under President Reagan; George P. Shultz, Reagan's Secretary of State; and, above all, Colin L. Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs for George H.W. Bush and the first-term Secretary of State for George W. Bush. All three, as well as another group of more than two dozen former military and State Department officials, played a more visible role than any congressional Democrat in blocking Bush's proposal.

Powell's resistance attracted the most attention. But Vessey captured the thinking of the prudence party most eloquently in his letter opposing any reinterpretation of the Geneva Convention.

In essence, Vessey rejected the core Bush argument that Islamic terrorism has created a threat so transcendent as to demand the abandonment of America's traditional approaches to ensuring its security. "I continue to read and hear that we are facing a 'different enemy' in the war on terror; no matter how true that may be, inhumanity and cruelty are not new to warfare nor to enemies we have faced in the past," Vessey wrote. "Through those years, we held to our own values. We should continue to do so."

Debate will continue for weeks over whether Warner, Graham and McCain sufficiently upheld those values in the deal they struck with the administration on the treatment of detainees. What's clear is that the dispute represented a kind of tipping point for many of the establishment figures who supported those senators — a moment when Bush's inclination to jettison established approaches collided too directly with their respect for the ways America has conducted itself since World War II.

Retired Col. Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Powell's chief of staff at the State Department, believes the disagreement became a flashpoint for growing concern that the administration, in its responses to the terrorism threat, "has made a radical departure from traditional political and cultural values as well as what heretofore was a rather consistent strain in foreign policy."

Others might not criticize the administration so pointedly. But it doesn't take much reading between the lines to see in the statements from Powell and others the fear that Bush has too casually alienated world opinion in his pursuit of greater security for America.

The pillars of the prudence party don't like to publicly air their disagreements. The fact that so many did so in this dispute is probably a warning sign to the White House that it could face more resistance from some of the same voices if it pursues other avenues seen as flouting international norms or global opinion, such as unilateral military action against Iran. Through 2008, Bush's disputes with these voices of restraint may shape America's national security decisions more than his arguments with the Democrats.

CIA Values Show In Stand On Detainees (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — For an agency that ordinarily steers clear of major policy debates, the CIA played an unusually prominent role in the showdown between the White House and dissident Republicans over the treatment of detainees.

To many outsiders, the CIA's position was puzzling.

Why would an agency whose own overseas officers are vulnerable to capture — and torture — defend harsh interrogation methods? And how did an organization often criticized for its caution end up pushing the legal envelope, even while the Pentagon was advocating tight new restrictions?

The answers, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials, reflect a cultural and operational fault line that separates the CIA from the other arms of the U.S. government that operate overseas — mainly the military and the State Department.

The detainee issue has tapped into "a cultural difference," said Mark Lowenthal, former assistant director of the CIA.

"This whole debate has no meaning for a CIA officer as he understands the world and the nature of the deal he made with the government and the nature of the risks he is willing to accept," Lowenthal said.

CIA leaders are typically closely aligned with State Department and Pentagon counterparts in their view of the world and their concern for overseas opinion of the United States. But on the detainee issue, the CIA is less swayed by concerns that other nations might retaliate against U.S. prisoners, and more inclined to consider any cost worth paying for the intelligence it generates.

DOJ_NMG_0068398

President Bush wanted to reestablish a secret CIA detention and interrogation program and insulate CIA officers from legal peril in pushing this month for new security legislation. Bush's proposal was opposed by Republican senators, retired military commanders and onetime administration officials such as former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who warned the harsh approaches favored by Bush would further soil the U.S. image.

Leading up to a key compromise on Thursday, CIA officials, including the agency director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, publicly took Bush's side in the fight, voicing concerns evidently felt by many CIA officers worldwide.

"There are smart, sensitive people who work in that agency who are bothered by the same sorts of issues as private citizens are," said Paul Pillar, former deputy director of the CIA counterterrorism center.

But Pillar and others noted that spies, unlike soldiers, are not afforded the protections of the Geneva Convention. Therefore, agency officials are less preoccupied with the concern over reciprocity articulated by Powell and others.

The convention spells out elaborate protections for captured soldiers, and sets minimum standards for others who are captured who are not in uniform.

But spies fall into a separate category. Those engaged in espionage "shall not have the right to the status of prisoner of war," according to the convention, which also says that an occupying government "may impose the death penalty" in cases when a prisoner is guilty of espionage.

The Supreme Court ruled in June that the Geneva Convention applies even to terrorism suspects under U.S. law. But "if a CIA operative is picked up by terrorists, he is unlikely to benefit under any circumstances from Geneva protections," said Robert Grenier, who retired earlier this year as head of the CIA's counterterrorism center.

Indeed, the history of the agency includes gruesome examples. In 1984, William Buckley, the CIA station chief in Beirut, was captured, tortured, and ultimately killed by operatives from the Hezbollah terrorist organization.

Some veterans said the agency's experience fighting terrorists, and the stakes of the interrogations they conduct when suspects are captured, also help explain its more aggressive mindset. While the military has held hundreds of relatively low-level prisoners at Guantanamo Bay and other facilities, the CIA has been responsible for detaining a relative handful of high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives.

"The agency is not recommending that these techniques be applied to everybody," said a former senior CIA official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We're talking about those very rare cases when you've got somebody who you know was the mastermind behind Sept. 11, who gleefully slit the throat of Danny Pearl."

The former official was referring to Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks who is also believed to have executed Wall Street Journal reporter Pearl after he was kidnapped in Pakistan in 2002.

The CIA is said to have used an array of harsh techniques against Mohammed, including "water boarding," in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and made to believe he is going to drown. Water boarding presumably no longer would be allowed under the new rules under consideration in the Senate. But CIA officials said they believe they will still have access to other methods that have proven effective.

"Overall, you have to characterize them as tough and aggressive," said a former senior CIA official involved in the program. "Certainly beyond what one would legitimately expect to encounter in a police precinct."

The CIA view of interrogation policy may also be colored by the fact that it is a principal user of the intelligence it gets from Al Qaeda prisoners — in contrast to other areas of intelligence where the CIA is a more passive conduit of information to policymakers and the Pentagon.

"If they get information on what the Chinese military is doing, that goes to the Pentagon," said another former CIA official. "If they get information on China's likely stance at the United Nations, that goes to the State Department."

But information from interrogations of high-value detainees has fueled dozens of counterterrorism operations mounted by the CIA, netting what officials have described as important captures.

Ex-POWs Defend Tough Interrogation Of Terrorism Suspects (MJS)

By Meg Jones

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 23, 2006

Survivors of torture offer views of Geneva Convention

The Geneva Convention meant nothing to Don Heiliger's captors.

To the men who used ropes and handcuffs to twist Heiliger's arms behind him until his shoulder blades touched and his arms went numb, the rules regarding humane treatment of prisoners of war were a joke.

Shot down over Vietnam on May 15, 1967, the Navy pilot who later became a Dane County supervisor was tortured and told he was a criminal who had no protection under the Geneva Convention.

The debate over the rules for the interrogation and trial of terrorist suspects is more than political rhetoric for Heiliger and other Wisconsin ex-prisoners of war, who spent days and weeks and years in captivity never knowing if they would survive their ordeal. Even as President Bush and key Republican senators such as John McCain reached an agreement last week over the issue, Heiliger's opinion was emphatic: The Geneva Conventions don't apply to terror suspects.

"To try terrorists doesn't bother me at all, because I don't think they're soldiers," said Heiliger, 69, of Stoughton.

Dan Doughty agrees. He, too, was shot down in Vietnam and spent almost seven years as a prisoner of war. He, too, was tortured and forced to write letters saying he was treated well.

In the war on terror, "there are no uniformed soldiers. They're not fighting for a country. They don't have a nation behind them," said Doughty, 73, who grew up in Ladysmith and now lives in Eau Claire. "I'd sure hate to see several thousand people die (in a terror attack) because we couldn't ask a question for fear we were mistreating" terror suspects.

When he was first captured, he told his captors his name, rank, serial number and date of birth - the only information military members are obligated to provide under the Geneva Conventions.

It didn't do any good and only infuriated Doughty's captors. It took two decades for the numbness in Doughty's hands and arms to go away.

Doughty saw the Abu Ghraib prison scandal photos and read about the convictions of American soldiers working as guards at the Baghdad prison. In Doughty's opinion, the Abu Ghraib prisoners were mistreated, not tortured. And the Bush administration's attempt to clarify some of the language in the Geneva Conventions probably won't matter in future wars, he said.

"I don't think anybody we'd have a future war with is going to be different than Vietnam," Doughty said. "Look at what happened to our soldiers that have been captured (in Iraq this year). They've been tortured and cut up and put in the street. That's what we're dealing with."

The Geneva Conventions are a series of international agreements signed in the Swiss capital in the 1800s and 1900s. The rules regarding the humane treatment of prisoners of war came out of the third Geneva Convention, held in 1929.

Mark Pink was a prisoner of war in a country that observed those rules. After the 85-year-old Union Grove man had the misfortune of getting shot down in his B-26 Marauder over France on April 24, 1944, he had the good fortune of ending up being treated humanely in prison camps operated by the German Air Force. Later, he found out Americans captured by the Japanese spent World War II in far different conditions.

"I thank my lucky stars that I ended up" in Germany, Pink said.

When Joseph Small III's OV-10 Bronco reconnaissance plane was shot down by the Iraqis over Kuwait during the first Gulf War, the Geneva Conventions had no meaning for his captors. Held for nine days, Small was beaten and whipped. When he regained consciousness from the beatings, he was whipped again. His rotator cuff was torn when his captors wrenched his shoulder.

Small said his treatment was different from that of terror suspects by the U.S.

"They're being treated roughly, but they're not undergoing torture that me or John McCain or any other Americans went through," said Small, 55, adding that he's not comparing his experience to that of McCain or other Vietnam ex-POWs.

Small isn't advocating torture of terror suspects. But he said interrogators should be allowed to reach suspects at a level that's not clearly defined in the Geneva Conventions.

"This is a different situation we've never had before, one that has degenerated into a political discussion. We're not fighting a country, we're fighting an ideology and an enemy that's dedicated to our destruction," said Small, a Midwest Airlines pilot who lives in Racine. "It takes new thinking and new definitions of what we need to do to stop attacks on innocent civilians."

According to Heiliger, Small is the only Gulf War ex-POW living in Wisconsin, and only three ex-POWs from Vietnam live full time in the state.

Like Heiliger and Doughty, Gerald Gerndt spent years in the so-called "Hanoi Hilton" and other camps where he was tortured. After an escape attempt by other prisoners in 1968, Gerndt remembers he and his cellmates were punished by being put in leg irons and kept in a stifling room without open windows throughout the hot, muggy summer.

Gerndt, whose F-4C fighter jet was shot down on Aug. 23, 1967, has conflicted feelings about the debate over handling terror detainees.

"If you're going to murder innocent civilians for the sake of shock value, I'm not so certain the Geneva Convention should apply to those people," said Gerndt, 64, a financial adviser who lives in Genesee.

However, Gerndt added that while he despises terrorists, "we're a country of laws, and everyone has a certain right to those laws in this country."

Why Retired Military Brass Don't Want Torture (LAT)

By Charles Kaiser, Charles Kaiser, Author Of "1968 In America" And "The Gay Metropolis," Is Completing "The Cost Of Cou

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

FOR ONE 83-year-old veteran of World War II, it was the searing memory of a Japanese prisoner who helped turn the tide on Iwo Jima. For a 40-year veteran of Army intelligence, it was a trip to the battlefield at Gettysburg. For all 43 retired generals and admirals, it was a combination of moral outrage and deep disgust over President Bush's proposed legislation on interrogating terrorist suspects that propelled them into unfamiliar territory.

"None of us feels comfortable speaking out publicly," said retired Rear Adm. John D. Hutson, who served as the Navy's judge advocate general from 1997 to 2000 and presided over the JAG corps' 1,600 members. "That's not the nature of what military officers do…. [But we] care very, very much about the country and the military — and that's why [we] are speaking out."

The group of retired flag officers first came together in 2005, when a dozen of them signed a letter opposing the nomination of Alberto Gonzales as attorney general for his role in developing Bush's policies on torture in the war on terror. Late last year, they supported Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) ban on cruel and inhumane treatment of detainees in U.S. custody anywhere in the world.

And last week, the Republican senators with whom the retired officers are allied in a fight against Bush's proposed legislation to weaken the spirit and the letter of the Geneva Convention won a compromise with the administration. According to the agreement, all forms of torture would be banned, including waterboarding, which White House officials had insisted wasn't real torture, although it was one of the Gestapo's favorite techniques.

The retired officers believe that the negative consequences of the president's anti-terror policies could have been avoided if the administration had followed traditional military practices. Retired Marine Maj. Gen. Fred E. Haynes, 83, is a veteran of World War II and the Korean and Vietnam wars. In 1945, he was a captain in the regiment that seized Mt. Suribachi on Iwo Jima and raised the U.S. flag there. In March of that year, his unit found two U.S. soldiers dead, apparently victims of torture. On March 17, about 10 days before the battle ended, a Japanese soldier, wearing nothing but his boots and a cotton jock strap, stepped out of a cave with his hands up. He had read one of the leaflets Americans were distributing in artillery shells that promised that anyone who gave up would get his wounds treated and his stomach filled.

The soldier surrendered to a lieutenant who spoke no Japanese. The lieutenant called his company commander to ask what to do with the prisoner.

"As he was talking," Haynes recalled hearing from soldiers in his unit, "a Japanese sniper apparently got a good aim on him and the bullet penetrated his helmet at an angle, scooted around inside the helmet and dropped out the back." Miraculously, the lieutenant was uninjured.

"In good conscience, he could have shot the Japanese [prisoner] dead," said the general, because the soldier could reasonably have concluded that he had been set up. "But he didn't."

Instead, the lieutenant waited for the company commander to join them. He subsequently discovered that French was a language he shared with the prisoner. Speaking French, the Japanese man offered to help clear out caves nearby.

When the prisoner was interrogated by two Marine interpreters fluent in Japanese, they quickly determined that he was the chief code clerk for the Japanese commander on Iwo Jima, an extraordinarily valuable catch.

"He not only knew the situation on Iwo, but he had good insight into the situation on Okinawa, which we were to invade on April 1 and did. He even knew a fair amount about the [Japanese army's] situation with respect to China," Haynes recalled.

The prisoner was immediately sent to the headquarters of Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, and from there to Washington.

"The moral of the story," said the general, "is we Americans have been so thoroughly imbued with the idea that you have to treat prisoners humanely — and this [story] is an example of why. It is an illustration of how by treating an individual decently you are much more likely to get any information you might want — and it's more likely to be correct."

Retired Army Brig. Gen. David R. Irvine spent 40 years in the Reserve as an intelligence officer, spending much of that time teaching the rules of interrogation to soldiers, Marines and airmen. He remembers a visit to Gettysburg, where he lined up with 125 other officers in front of a statue of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee, from which they retraced Pickett's Charge.

"Everything there is completely flat," Irvine said. "By the time you get 50 yards out … [you're] right in artillery range of the Union line. And you've got a mile and half to go on foot [to reach the Union soldiers]. As stragglers who survived found their way back to Seminary Ridge, Lee was riding his horse on that line and apologizing: 'It's all my fault.' He sent a letter of resignation to [Confederate President] Jefferson Davis, who refused to accept it. And the point of that whole exercise was command responsibility. That's a powerful lesson."

It's a lesson these retired officers think the administration doesn't get because no higher-ups were prosecuted for the abuses uncovered at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere. "Tailhook was a very painful time for the Navy," Hutson said, referring to the 1991 sexual misconduct scandal. "The Navy was not treating women with the respect and dignity that they deserved and had earned. But speaking of accountability, we had a chief of naval operations who resigned; we had a secretary of the Navy who resigned."

Retired Brig. Gen. James P. Cullen was chief judge of the U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals. "I grew up in an Army where the rules were very clear and where serviceman and women had no question about what their obligations and responsibilities were under both the Geneva Convention and our domestic law," he said. "When you have a winking-and-nodding policy [as was the case at Abu Ghraib], that just brings about the consequences that we came to view at [the prison]."

What further fuels the officers' outrage is that the policies they believe have undermined the military were mostly formulated by men, like Bush, who have not seen combat.

"[Vice President Dick] Cheney made mention in the days after 9/11 that he wanted to operate sort of on the dark side," Cullen said. "Here was a guy who never served, and now something terrible had happened, and he wanted to show that he was a tough guy…. So he's going to operate outside the rules of law. Bad message."

the Torture Debate (WP)

President Bush's advocacy of "alternative interrogation practices" in the fight against terrorism has moved beyond legality and morality -- to focus on practicality. "The information that the Central Intelligence Agency has obtained by questioning men like Khalid Sheik Mohammed has provided valuable information and has helped disrupt terrorist plots, including strikes within the United States," Bush said in a Sept. 15 news conference. "By giving us information about terrorist plans we couldn't get anywhere else, this program has saved innocent lives. In other words, it is vital."

In a recent statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee, a group of former Army interrogators disagreed. "Prisoner/detainee abuse and torture are to be avoided at all costs, in part because they can degrade the intelligence collection effort by interfering with a skilled interrogator's efforts to establish rapport with the subject," they wrote.

We spoke with three of the signers about their experience as interrogators and why they signed.

-- Rachel Dry

Peter Bauer, Army interrogator, 1986-1997

I conducted interrogation operations and training, and served as an interrogator near the front lines during Operation Desert Storm. When prisoners of high intelligence value were captured, they were brought to me immediately. I often just glared at them and in a stern voice asked their name, their rank, their unit affiliation, and then questions related to the intelligence collection mission. Direct questioning is usually effective.

With the [Iraqi] Republican Guard officers, I had to use some of the approaches from the field manual. I used "love of comrades" a couple of times: I would tell somebody, "You know that if you can help us end this war sooner, fewer of your own people will die." When I saw them, they were still reeling from the shock of battle and capture. You should never underestimate the power of one's own imagination to create danger. If you ask, "Do you know what can happen to you under the Geneva Conventions if you don't tell me your name?" the answer is "nothing." But that question put to somebody who's not familiar with the Conventions just opens up doors in their mind. Most terrorists should be no more difficult to interrogate than other fanatics we've dealt with -- including Viet Cong, Soviet spies and Iraqi Republican Guard officers.

I know the techniques in the field manual work, and I know torture isn't as effective. I was stationed in Europe almost all of my career and I did resistance-to-interrogation training for NATO forces. We simulated the sort of abuse they could expect should they fall into the hands of the Warsaw Pact. This treatment is quite similar to the sort of techniques described as the CIA's "alternative interrogation procedures." We invariably obtained more reliable information using our own techniques than we did using the abusive procedures. I cannot name one instance in which abuse was successful after standard interrogation techniques failed. When you abuse or degrade somebody, the reaction of the source is: "You're putting ladies' underwear on my head. [Expletive] you." In the hands of a skilled and trained interrogator, you wouldn't have to torture. Not a single military interrogator with whom I have communicated expressed anything but contempt for the idea that torture could be more effective than standard interrogation techniques.

Chief Warrant Officer Marney Mason (retired)

I've been doing the interrogation thing since the early 1970s. I was a Cold War interrogator in Europe in the 1970s and '80s, and I've trained interrogators at Fort Hood, Tex., and Fort Bragg, N.C. -- teaching them how to conduct interrogations and how to resist them. In some training sessions, I've even administered mild forms of torture. And I think anyone who believes torture is a useful means of extracting information has been watching too many Sly Stallone movies.

A good interrogation is like a seduction. You sit down. You ask the person questions. You try to develop a very intense personal relationship with another human being so they'll part with information they'd rather not part with. You wheedle, cajole, trick, lie. The point is to collect usable, actionable information. Sure, if you start pulling a guy's fingernails out, he'll start talking -- it may not be the truth, but he's going to tell you exactly what you want to hear.

In a training environment (a mock prisoner-of-war camp), my students would be subjected to hostile forms of interrogations: loud noises, fake burials, 15- to 20-volt electric shocks. And I got people to confess to things that they absolutely did not do. The information you receive is worthless.

Travis W. Hall, former Army interrogator and captain in the Army's Judge Advocate General's Corps

Over my 14 years of military experience, both as an interrogator and as a JAG, I observed a degradation in the respect of service members for the laws of war since 9/11. When I attended interrogation school in 1992, all the attendees had 40 hours of classroom time on the Geneva Conventions followed by a written exam on all the rights and obligations of the military personnel under the Conventions.

What I saw firsthand as an interrogator and, later, as a JAG in Iraq in 2003 working on detainee issues, has left me with a strong belief that torture is counterproductive. What has proven effective in interrogation, time and again, regardless of what culture the detainee is from, is building a positive relationship with an individual. Americans really want their soldiers to not only come home, but come home with honor. I would challenge the current administration to come up with one example where torture in interrogation has produced actionable intelligence that saved American lives in the United States.

Does It Work? (WP)

By Edwidge Danticat

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

President Bush says harsh interrogation tactics are a key tool in the War on Terror. Two authors consider the painful dilemma posed by his claim:

MIAMI Afew years ago, as I worked on a documentary film about torture survivors in exile from my native Haiti, I met a young woman who under questioning by a military officer was slapped until she became deaf in one ear, was forced to chew and swallow a campaign poster, and was kicked so hard in the stomach by booted feet that she kept slipping in and out of consciousness in a pool of her own urine and blood. Another woman had an arm chopped off and her tongue sliced in two before she was dumped in a mass grave, miles from her home.

When I met these women, some time had passed since their ordeals. But they could still feel the hammering of the blows and hear the menacing voices, threatening to drown them, dismember them and set them on fire. The younger woman, Marie Carmel, remembers thinking about her mother. Manman will surely die if I'm killed, she thought. I have to stay alive for her. Alerte, whose arm and tongue were severed, kept thinking about her children as she climbed out of the corpse-filled pit and crawled to the side of the road where she found help. Both had no idea how much pain they could endure until then. They wanted to live, they remembered, to defy their torturers, to tell their stories.

"There is no need for torture," wrote Jean-Paul Sartre. "Hell is the other." Those women saw hell and came back. However, neither one told their torturers what they wanted to know. Marie Carmel did not reveal the names of her fellow pro-democracy activists. Alerte did not divulge the whereabouts of her husband, who was the real object of her captors' search.

For many who remember -- just as these women do, and my own parents do -- what it means to live under a dictatorial regime, a regime in which citizens must leave work or school to witness public executions, torture is not just an individual affliction but a communal one. And now, when political leaders in the United States are asking us as a society to consider not only the legal and moral ramifications of torture but its effectiveness, we are brought closer to these regimes than we may think. If we are part of all that has touched us, as Alfred Tennyson wrote, then we are all endorsers of torture when it is done in our name.

Torture aims for a single goal -- obtaining information -- but it achieves a slew of others. For one thing, it martyrizes the tortured. Think of the old Christlike images of Che Guevara's corpse in Bolivia -- or even of Christ himself.

While working on the documentary and researching the novel it eventually inspired, I interviewed torturers as well as their victims. I realized that torture diminishes us all by numbing us to human distress; the level of callousness in the society rises, with once unimaginable acts suddenly charted and rationalized.

"This is why we have this proverb," one repentant torturer told me, " bay kou bliye pote mak sonje ." The one who strikes the blow might easily forget, but the one who wears the scars must remember.

When seemingly noble ideals -- after all, what can be nobler than wanting to save lives? -- lead us to torture, the path to the torture chamber can find its way to our front door, just as it did for Marie Carmel, Alerte and countless others before them.

"The people who kill and torture and tell lies in the name of their sacred causes . . . " wrote Aldous Huxley, "these are never the publicans and the sinners. No, they're the virtuous, respectable men, who have the finest feelings, the best brains, the noblest ideals."

As a child growing up in a dictatorial state, I always dreaded the pounding I heard at some of my neighbors' doors at night, when many were yanked from their beds never to be seen again. The lucky ones returned from a pit that was as much a physical place as a darkness that would always surround them. They were missing an eye or some teeth; they showed swelling that would take weeks to go down or shaking that worsened over time. These markers of torment first drew me to people such as Marie Carmel and Alerte, women who could have been my mother or myself.

When I first encounter men and women who've been tortured, I notice their dramatic and disfiguring scars. But eventually I recognize their hardened core and, more often than not, their reinforced defiance and renewed commitment to that for which they were abused.

When I meet former torturers, they don't proudly stand up and say, "Here I am, a torturer." Unless they're infamous, they have sought to compartmentalize their lives. At a lively game of dominoes or across a family dinner table, they can distance themselves from their past in a way that their victims can never even attempt. Occasionally, though, they are unwittingly exposed by a child who might say, "Papa was in the military and worked in such-and-such prison at such-and-such time." The torturers squirm and change the subject, knowing they've been unmasked.

Rare is the opportunity, as we seem to have now, for the torturer to plot out methods in advance and in public. Should a person be strapped to a board and have water poured down his nose? Should she be forced to stand for long periods of time in the cold without being allowed to sleep? Should he be slapped in the chest, face or belly? These are almost novelistic questions with no more rational answers than some haywire plot or dark verse.

After first reading it as a young girl newly escaped from Jean-Claude Duvalier's dictatorship in Haiti, I recently rediscovered a poem called "The Colonel" by Carolyn ForchÃ©. The narrator describes dining with a dictator who, after the luxurious meal, empties a bag full of human ears on the table.

"I am tired of fooling around," he tells his visitor. "As for the rights of anyone, tell your people they can go [expletive] themselves."

He lifts his glass of wine, and with one sweep of his arm, brushes the ears to the floor.

When the ears hit the ground -- like those of all my disappeared neighbors, I imagine -- the narrator notices that some of them are pressed to the floor while others are catching "this scrap of his voice." My fear is that when it is most needed, none of our ears will bother to catch any voices at all. Then will the tortured see any reason to live on? And if they live, whom will they tell?

Are We Really So Fearful? (WP)

By Ariel Dorfman

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

DURHAM, N.C.

It still haunts me, the first time -- it was in Chile, in October of 1973 -- that I met someone who had been tortured. To save my life, I had sought refuge in the Argentine Embassy some weeks after the coup that had toppled the democratically elected government of Salvador Allende, a government for which I had worked. And then, suddenly, one afternoon, there he was. A large-boned man, gaunt and yet strangely flabby, with eyes like a child, eyes that could not stop blinking and a body that could not stop shivering.

That is what stays with me -- that he was cold under the balmy afternoon sun of Santiago de Chile, trembling as though he would never be warm again, as though the electric current was still coursing through him. Still possessed, somehow still inhabited by his captors, still imprisoned in that cell in the National Stadium, his hands disobeying the orders from his brain to quell the shuddering, his body unable to forget what had been done to it just as, nearly 33 years later, I, too, cannot banish that devastated life from my memory.

It was his image, in fact, that swirled up from the past as I pondered the current political debate in the United States about the practicality of torture. Something in me must have needed to resurrect that victim, force my fellow citizens here to spend a few minutes with the eternal iciness that had settled into that man's heart and flesh, and demand that they take a good hard look at him before anyone dare maintain that, to save lives, it might be necessary to inflict unbearable pain on a fellow human being. Perhaps the optimist in me hoped that this damaged Argentine man could, all these decades later, help shatter the perverse innocence of contemporary Americans, just as he had burst the bubble of ignorance protecting the young Chilean I used to be, someone who back then had encountered torture mainly through books and movies and newspaper reports.

That is not, however, the only lesson that today's ruthless world can learn from that distant man condemned to shiver forever.

All those years ago, that torture victim kept moving his lips, trying to articulate an explanation, muttering the same words over and over. "It was a mistake," he repeated, and in the next few days I pieced together his sad and foolish tale. He was an Argentine revolutionary who had fled his homeland and, as soon as he had crossed the mountains into Chile, had begun to boast about what he would do to the military there if it staged a coup, about his expertise with arms of every sort, about his colossal stash of weapons. Bluster and braggadocio -- and every word of it false.

But how could he convince those men who were beating him, hooking his penis to electric wires and waterboarding him? How could he prove to them that he had been lying, prancing in front of his Chilean comrades, just trying to impress the ladies with his fraudulent insurgent persona?

Of course, he couldn't. He confessed to anything and everything they wanted to drag from his hoarse, howling throat; he invented accomplices and addresses and culprits; and then, when it became apparent that all this was imaginary, he was subjected to further ordeals.

There was no escape.

That is the hideous predicament of the torture victim. It was always the same story, what I discovered in the ensuing years, as I became an unwilling expert on all manner of torments and degradations, my life and my writing overflowing with grief from every continent. Each of those mutilated spines and fractured lives -- Chinese, Guatemalan, Egyptian, Indonesian, Iranian, Uzbek, need I go on? -- all of them, men and women alike, surrendered the same story of essential asymmetry, where one man has all the power in the world and the other has nothing but pain, where one man can decree death at the flick of a wrist and the other can only pray that the wrist will be flicked soon.

It is a story that our species has listened to with mounting revulsion, a horror that has led almost every nation to sign treaties over the past decades declaring these abominations as crimes against humanity, transgressions interdicted all across the earth. That is the wisdom, national and international, that has taken us thousands of years of tribulation and shame to achieve. That is the wisdom we are being asked to throw away when we formulate the question -- Does torture work? -- when we allow ourselves to ask whether we can afford to outlaw torture if we want to defeat terrorism.

I will leave others to claim that torture, in fact, does not work, that confessions obtained under duress -- such as that extracted from the heaving body of that poor Argentine braggart in some Santiago cesspool in 1973 -- are useless. Or to contend that the United States had better not do that to anyone in our custody lest someday another nation or entity or group decides to treat our prisoners the same way.

I find these arguments -- and there are many more -- to be irrefutable. But I cannot bring myself to use them, for fear of honoring the debate by participating in it.

Can't the United States see that when we allow someone to be tortured by our agents, it is not only the victim and the perpetrator who are corrupted, not only the "intelligence" that is contaminated, but also everyone who looked away and said they did not know, everyone who consented tacitly to that outrage so they could sleep a little safer at night, all the citizens who did not march in the streets by the millions to demand the resignation of whoever suggested, even whispered, that torture is inevitable in our day and age, that we must embrace its darkness?

Are we so morally sick, so deaf and dumb and blind, that we do not understand this? Are we so fearful, so in love with our own security and steeped in our own pain, that we are really willing to let people be tortured in the name of America? Have we so lost our bearings that we do not realize that each of us could be that hapless Argentine who sat under the Santiago sun, so possessed by the evil done to him that he could not stop shivering?

CIA Deal Reveals Shirker And Cipher (NSDY)

By Les Payne

Long Island Newsday, September 24, 2006

The White House compromise over legislation for the treatment of terror suspects was hardly worth the ink that scribbled the deal on Thursday. More ironic still was the venue for this military pact: the vice president's office in the Senate Office Building.

Dick Cheney has certified every jot and tittle of the U.S. invasion of Iraq - and been proved tragically wrong to the tune of $1 trillion and more than 2,600 American lives. The war policies of this most powerful of all vice presidents have been as inaccurate as his shotgun aim. Cheney said Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. Wrong. The United States would cakewalk over Baghdad. Wrong. The Iranians would greet GIs as liberators. Ditto. The war is winding down. Ditto, double damned.

Undiplomatic as Hugo Chávez's UN attack on a sitting U.S. president might have been, it is unfortunate that the Venezuelan leader did not include Cheney in his remarks. Not even Rep. Charles Rangel, who rushed to defend his president against Chávez, could have denied the sulfuric fumes to be whiffed in the wake of the former Halliburton chairman.

While viewing President George W. Bush as an amiable cipher, Rangel has publicly denounced Cheney as a troubled force. In an interview with NY 1 last year, the Harlem Democrat said, "Sometimes I don't think Cheney is awake enough to know what's going on. He's a sick man. He's got heart disease, but the disease is not restricted to that part of his body. He grunts a lot, so you never know what he's thinking." In a follow-up interview, he said: "I would like to believe he's sick rather than just mean and evil."

Former military men such as Rangel, or Sen. John McCain for that matter, seem to be roiled by the notion that Cheney is the helmsman of U.S. military policy. When able-bodied men were subject to the military draft, Dick Cheney maneuvered himself five deferments to avoid meeting this obligation. If not a flat-out coward, he possibly is a mere shirker and, at 64, a chicken hawk void of military sense or caution.

The vice president's office was the site of the high-powered, super-intense confrontation to decide how the Bush administration will proceed with the trial of the 14 suspected terrorists being held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

The compromise was necessitated by the U.S. government's push to avoid further scandal on the eve of the trial. Military and intelligence interrogators petitioned the White House and Congress for clear instructions to protect against charges of unauthorized torture and possible war crimes. Already, the Supreme Court had ruled that methods in play violated existing laws.

No stranger to tough talk, the Bush White House planned to try the suspects without allowing them to hear secret evidence allegedly gathered against them. Some might even have been executed without ever knowing the full extent of what brought them to the gallows. Additionally, Bush took the CIA's bait for clear interrogation directives and pressed for rewriting Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which deals with humane treatment of prisoners of war.

So reckless was the president's move to redraft the Geneva accords that even former Secretary of State Colin Powell rose in opposition. He was joined by McCain, who persuaded two other GOP senators to sustain Article 3 as protection, as well as reassurance, for U.S. soldiers who may be captured and held as prisoners of war. Having been held by the North Vietnamese as a POW for about five years, McCain knows about torture.

As a casual-duty goldbrick in the Texas Air National Guard, Bush knows nothing of war, honor or duty. Like so much of his balderdash and war swagger, Bush's toughness on torture seems more a son's determined attempt to escape the shadow of his father's executive reputation as a "wimp." It is most unfortunate that America's honor and resources are being drained away at the expense of this sick play staged by a member of one of the elite ruling-class families on his last legs.

Two-Tiered Torture Standards (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

By allowing the CIA leeway in interrogations, the Senate gave up too much in its compromise with Bush.

IF IT'S GOOD ENOUGH FOR John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner, then it's good enough for everyone else. That, essentially, has been the argument for the compromise reached last week between the White House and the Senate concerning the Bush administration's treatment of suspected terrorists.

But it's not good enough — neither the compromise nor the argument. The three Republican senators admirably opposed the administration's attempt to undermine international law on the treatment of prisoners captured in the war against terrorists. Yet Congress should not accept their assurances without the sort of sustained scrutiny that will be impossible if there is a rush to enact the compromise into law before the midterm elections. Democrats, who until now have allowed McCain and Co. to serve as their stand-ins, especially should resist a stampede.

To their credit, McCain of Arizona, Graham of South Carolina and Warner of Virginia (with an assist from former Army general and Secretary of State Colin L. Powell), forced the administration to back down from its proposal to redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which prohibits "cruel" and "degrading" treatment. That is good news for U.S. service members who might need to avail themselves of the protections of the convention in the future.

But the compromise has a major flaw. It perpetuates a two-tier system in which the U.S. military is bound by a strict reading of Common Article 3 while the CIA is apparently free to use what President Bush described as "alternative" interrogation methods.

And what exactly are those methods? Earlier this month, in describing how CIA questioning had loosened the tongues of 14 high-profile suspects captured after 9/11 and imprisoned abroad, Bush insisted that they weren't tortured. Yet in the same speech, he worried that U.S. interrogators "could now be at risk of prosecution under the War Crimes Act — simply for doing their jobs in a thorough and professional way."

DOJ_NMG_0068406

The implication was that the CIA might have engaged in activities that violate provisions of Article 3. The devil will be in the details — which will be spelled out in an executive order that will define rules for interrogation. Before writing Bush a blank check, Congress should insist on a convincing explanation of what the CIA would be allowed to do that would be forbidden for interrogators in the military — and why.

Thursday's compromise addressed another point of contention between the White House and the McCain group: whether military commissions the president has asked Congress to create could convict suspected terrorists on the basis of evidence not shared with the defendant. The administration and the senators agreed that defendants would have access to evidence made available to a jury, though some sensitive sources would be removed.

McCain and the White House didn't need to mend their differences on another issue — whether suspected terrorists can use the ancient writ of habeas corpus to challenge their confinement — because that avenue of appeal is choked off in both the Bush and Senate proposals. It should not be, and the Senate Judiciary Committee should make that clear when it considers that question Monday.

With habeas corpus, as with interrogation techniques and the conduct of military commissions, Congress needs to keep in mind not only American traditions of justice but the fact, noted by Powell in opposing a redefinition of the Geneva Convention, that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." Assuaging such doubts is also a matter of national security.

The President And The Law (1 Letter) (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

To the Editor:

John Yoo, a former deputy assistant attorney general in the Bush administration, acknowledges that President Bush's unique approach to the law, which the president has insisted is necessary to fight terrorism, is motivated by the "broader'' goal of strengthening executive power (Op-Ed, Sept. 17).

Mr. Yoo cites this goal as a reason the administration has fought a "pre-emptive'' war, "data-mined communications in the United States to root out terrorism,'' detained terrorists without "formal'' charges and conducted "harsh'' interrogations.

The agenda includes the reclassification of government information and the withholding of information from Congress and the courts, and has been buttressed by the president's "signing statements,'' which Mr. Yoo asserts claim the president's right not to enforce "unconstitutional'' laws.

In our system of government, it is the courts that determine the constitutionality of laws, not the president.

But Mr. Yoo takes his argument further, asserting that the president can ignore laws like the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act because they have produced "dysfunction.'' Indeed, according to Mr. Yoo, the president can ignore both laws and judicial decisions that he deems "wrongheaded'' or "obsolete.''

These views are clearly offensive to our constitutional system. It is long past time for Congress to reassert its proper role in checking an executive branch that has so little respect for the principles that have sustained our democracy for more than 200 years.

Attacks Spark Tougher Guantanamo Jail (AP)

By Andrew Selsky

AP, September 24, 2006

The military is toughening a new jailhouse for suspected al-Qaida and Taliban militants to protect guards after a spate of attacks and evidence that detainees have organized themselves into groups to mount uprisings, officials said.

The hardening comes as U.N. human rights investigators are calling for closing the entire detention center on this remote U.S. base. But with the war against terror groups dragging on, commanders say they have no choice in dealing with men deemed enemy combatants.

Events in recent months have made Guantanamo officials extremely wary:

· Detainees lured guards into a cell in the prison's Camp 4 by staging a suicide attempt in May, then attacked with fan blades and broken pieces of fluorescent light fixtures, the military says. Defense attorneys say the clash was sparked when guards tried to search prisoners' Qurans.

· On June 10, three detainees in Camp 1 committed suicide. Navy Rear Adm. Harry Harris, commander of the jail, described it as a coordinated protest action — "not an act of desperation but an act of asymmetric warfare against us."

· Guards recently discovered detainees in Camp 1 were dismantling faucets on sinks, removing long, sharp springs and reinforcing them into stabbing weapons, Army Lt. Col. Mike Nicolucci said. Camp 1 has been emptied of detainees while new faucets are installed, with inaccessible springs.

From July 2005 through August, the military recorded 432 assaults by detainees using "cocktails" of bodily excretions thrown at guards, 227 physical assaults and 99 instances of inciting or participating in disturbances or riots.

"What we have come to assess is these detainees — these terrorists — are still fighting a battle," said Army Brig. Gen. Edward A. Leacock, deputy commander of the detention operation. "They're not on the battlefield but ... they're still continuing to fight to this day."

Leacock said hard-core al-Qaida and Taliban detainees have established a hierarchy of "military guys, religious guys ... the muscle guys, and they all have a role inside the camps."

The goal is to coordinate attacks on guards or organize disturbances, Leacock said in an interview with journalists from The Associated Press and three foreign news organizations Wednesday.

"There are people in the camps — we have identified them — that continue to try to foment problems within the camp," Leacock said. "Our effort is trying to preclude them from developing the plans that will cause ... any kind of uprising."

Leacock did not identify the leaders but insisted extra security measures were called for, even before 14 top detainees, including alleged Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, were recently transferred to Guantanamo.

Human rights attorneys contend detainees are treated harshly, including enduring solitary confinement for months. The lawyers also say that among the roughly 460 Guantanamo detainees are men who were swept up by U.S. forces in Afghanistan and elsewhere who never intended to do the United States harm.

Underscoring the military's toughening stance, a jailhouse in the final stages of construction on a cactus-studded plateau overlooking the Caribbean is being "hardened" into a maximum-security facility. Camp 6 was to have opened in August as a medium-security lockup.

The modifications have pushed back the completion date of the $37.8 million jailhouse, which has a capacity for 220 inmates, to Sept. 30. It will take its first detainees in mid-October, Army Capt. Dan Byer said.

As a medium-security jail, inmates would have had common areas where they could talk and share meals. The eight common areas, with gleaming metal tables and stools, still exist, but will be off limits to detainees under maximum security.

"Anti-jump fencing" is being added to second floor tiers, and a high-tech control room will allow guards to monitor the facility while sitting at computers.

Shower doors have been specially made for the modification. Inmates will be escorted to showers, shut in and escorted back to their cells when they are finished washing. As a medium-security jail, inmates would have been able to walk unescorted across the common area to the showers.

Camp 6 underscores the prison's increasing permanence, standing in stark contrast to the cages that housed detainees when they began arriving in January 2002. Vines now entwine the cages at the abandoned Camp X-ray, standing in knee-deep weeds and grass.

The United States has determined that about 130 of the current detainees are eligible for release or transfer, but the timing will depend on negotiations with their home countries.

"I think what we have here is an orange. What we're doing is squeezing out the juice and what we're left with at the end of the day is pulp that will just stay here," said Navy Capt. Phil Waddingham, lead officer here for the Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants.

"We have dangerous men here who should not be allowed back to the battlefield," he said.

Last year, Guantanamo's former warden held talks with "the council," an ad hoc group composed of six detainees aimed at easing prison conditions and conflicts. One of the things they agreed on was having traffic cones placed in hallways during Muslim prayer time, so guards would know not to interrupt praying detainees.

The council has been disbanded amid suspicions it was coordinating resistance efforts. Defense attorneys say some council members have been in solitary confinement for months. Guantanamo officials refuse to discuss individual detainees, but say no one is denied all human contact.

Leacock said that while the prayer cones are still used, the experiment of allowing a detainee negotiating group is definitely over.

"The council of six is no longer in session," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Shots Fired At Mosque As Ramadan Begins (AP-Y)

AP, September 24, 2006

A mosque was hit by gunfire as members inside celebrated the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, authorities said Saturday.

No injuries were reported and there were no arrests.

A member of the Islamic Society of Brevard County stepped outside the mosque Friday night to use his cell phone when he heard several gun shots, police said.

The man, who was not immediately identified, took cover behind a wall as several rounds struck the building, police said. He then ran inside and told mosque members, who called police.

Authorities searched the surrounding area for suspects but found none. Police were not releasing many details of the shooting because the investigation was ongoing, spokeswoman Jill Frederiksen said Saturday. Detectives were working to determine a reason for the shooting.

Police will begin extra patrols around the mosque in Melbourne, about 50 miles east-southeast of Orlando.

Ibrahim Hooper, national spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said that while no motive had been determined by police, the shooting fit a pattern of incidents at mosques this year.

A bullet-riddled Quran was left outside a mosque in Chattanooga, Tenn., and an Indiana mosque was vandalized. There were other incidents at mosques in Maine, Arizona and Maryland.

"Worshippers of the mosque would obviously be disturbed if (religion) was the motive for the attack," Hooper said Saturday.

To Honor A Son Lost On 9/11, Parents Help Others Torn By Violence (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Bedford, N.Y.

When he was a child, there was something about the 10-day period starting with Rosh Hashana and ending with Yom Kippur that filled Stephen Alderman with a sense of wonder and of dread.

The holidays are called the Days of Awe. During that period, Jews are required to take stock of their life, to account for what they have done to merit inclusion in the Book of Life — their worthiness to live through another year. That seemed a thing of awful majesty and scary weight. It filled him with awe.

Dr. Alderman, a retired radiology oncologist, and his wife, Elizabeth, both 65, did not attend services this Rosh Hashana or observe the holiday in any way. They weren't very observant before Sept. 11, 2001, when their youngest son, Peter, attended a morning conference on the 106th floor of the north tower of the World Trade Center. They are no more so now.

Still, there can't be too many lives more in keeping with that sense of awe at life's responsibilities than theirs have been since their son, who was 25, died that terrible day. So, if they bear witness at the foundation they have established in their son's memory rather than in a synagogue, it's hard to argue with them. Because of all the redemptive tales that have followed 9/11, not many can surpass what the Aldermans have brought to life as a result of their son's death.

Victims of a trauma almost too much to bear, the Aldermans a year after 9/11 established a foundation dedicated to healing those even more traumatized than they were — victims of terrorism and mass violence in countries around the world — in Iraq and Uganda, Bosnia and Cambodia, Rwanda and Afghanistan, about 50 in all.

So they will spend their Days of Awe this year at a conference center in Italy, where their foundation (www.petercaldermanfoundation.org) will hold a training session for 35 professors and health professionals from around the world. Those in attendance, as part of a three-year program, will then go out and treat the torn psyches of people at refugee camps and in mud huts and teach others to do the same thing.

By the end of the year they will have trained more than 600 health professionals around the world, who will have treated more than 50,000 people.

"This is not about keeping Pete's memory alive," Mrs. Alderman said. "Only people who knew Pete, who knew his smile, will have any memory of him. You can't keep a memory alive, but you can do work he would have been proud of, work that really matters."

Battered and numb after 9/11, they soon began to look for ways to honor Peter's life. They had vague thoughts: a vest-pocket park, an endowed chair. And then the next June on "Nightline," Mrs. Alderman saw a show on the walking wounded of mass violence around the world, people with invisible wounds like theirs, only worse. These were the victims of war and ethnic cleansing and terrorism who didn't have a big house in Bedford, enough money to get counseling, any way to rejoin the living, to get out of their bleak shell of shock and pain.

And then it seemed so obvious. They couldn't do anything for Peter. But they could so something for tens of thousands of people — maybe more — around the world. It could help save people with scars like theirs. It could help save them as well.

So they contacted Dr. Richard Mollica, of the Harvard Program in Refugee Trauma, a leading expert in the field, and told him what they wanted to do. His ideas helped them create their foundation. It teaches local caregivers how to treat the depression and pain of people with wounds like theirs, using Western medical therapies combined with local healing traditions. They took the $1.4 million they had received as part of the 9/11 settlement, plowed the money into the foundation and set about raising more.

Now, there's a master class series, like the one going on now, dedicated to training caregivers who can both treat people and teach others how to do it. There are clinics operating in Cambodia and Uganda, with plans for more. There is the Peter C. Alderman International Society, one of the foundation's programs, to share research. There will be more.

As for them, the work has given them two things. The first is a link to something spiritual beyond their own lives, meaningful work, a sense of altruism. The second is a way for their son to live on, to be inscribed, if not in the Book of Life, at least in any accounting of those whose lives, however short, made a difference. "Peter died too soon to make his mark on this earth," his mother said. "What we're doing will leave a profound and indelible mark that Peter existed."

Some Texans Still Cleaning Up After Rita (AP-Y)

By Paul J. Weber, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Sam Henry swept dead pigs off Highway 87 two days after Hurricane Rita tossed them there. Then his job turned really unpleasant.

He pulled double shifts for the Texas Department of Transportation, hauling trash and patching roads cleaved by uprooted trees. The long days worsened Henry's ailing knees but hastened the repair of vital infrastructure.

In some parts along the Texas-Louisiana border, it seems as if there never was a Category 3 hurricane that pummeled the region one year ago Sunday.

The story on Henry's street is different.

In his neighborhood, a cluster of families working jobs like construction and maintenance, rebuilding the rural swath of southeast Texas has come at the expense of their own homes. Many are among the few still living in FEMA trailers that flank their tarp-covered houses, which remain neglected following long workdays.

"You can't work seven days a week forever," said home renovator Sheila LeLeaux, who lives near Henry and has a monthlong backlog of clients waiting for her to gut their houses. "Some days I want to come home and kick a dog."

Rita landed in Sabine Pass on Sept. 24, 2005, packing 120 mph winds that flattened the coastal hamlet before splaying into East Texas and lashing western parts of Louisiana. At least nine were killed after the storm roared ashore, and thousands of homes in the mostly poor and densely wooded path of the storm were destroyed.

But the destruction was a mere speck compared to that wrought a month earlier by Hurricane Katrina. Even one year later, Rita is best remembered for the chaotic evacuation of Houston, which was far more deadly, killing more than 100 people in accidents and exposure deaths.

The Southeast Texas Regional Planning Commission estimates Rita residental damages at $2 billion — far less than the tens of billions in damages borne by Katrina, but still a hefty price tag to area officials.

Already this year, LeLeaux and her husband have six times the number of home renovation jobs the couple contracts in a normal year.

"And it's only September," she said.

LeLeaux, 41, hangs drywall and rips out floors for about 10 hours, seven days a week. Her toenails are freshly painted bright pink but she's embarrassed that she has no time to touch up the gray roots in her hair. Nor does she have a spare hour to clean her house or wash the pile of laundry on her kitchen floor — she now pays her mother $50 to do that.

The placard pressed into her front yard plugs "LeLeaux's Drywall and Painting," but her house serves as no advertisement. Half the roof on her garage is peeled off, and the other half is held up by slats precariously wedged between the floor and the remaining beams. The neighboring lot, which she also owns, holds a concrete slab with two standing walls and a pile of rubble where the living room would have been.

Neighbor Lonnie Prejean, 49, still hasn't touched his flattened garage that buried a truck and a boat.

DOJ_NMG_0068410

"You try cutting trees all day and then come home to work on that," said Prejean, who spends 12 hours a day clearing acres of hurricane-toppled trees for Rogers Lumber Co.

Nearby, Henry's FEMA trailer is parked next to a simple square house rendered uninhabitable since Rita buckled the walls and pushed the frame from the slab.

"Everyone around here is at each other's throats a little more," said Nichol Bishop, Henry's girlfriend. "People are more stressed. Look around. The only people whose homes are fixed are retired. No one else has the time or energy at the end of the day."

Orange County Judge Carl Thibodeaux, who's still waiting for his county's slice of the $74.5 million in federal aid awarded to the state in December, paints a brighter picture. To be sure, the county has come a long way since spending the first month without power and policing gas station lines that formed three hours before pumps were turned on.

The county still sorely lacks hourly wage workers because most low-rent apartment complexes remain uninhabitable. But repaired homes in West Orange outnumber the damaged ones, and Thibodeaux believes the county needs only about another year before the last blue tarp is peeled from a roof.

Thibodeaux, a former West Orange mayor, believes that some whose homes still require dramatic overhauls are the same residents who failed to keep up their properties before Rita.

"The storm has just magnified this," he said.

LeLeaux pays no attention. She said she'll eventually clear the wind-shorn trees and crumbled brick still piled high on her lot. She said she'll cook a meal again for her family, quit drinking the beer she sometimes opens before bed and cut back to just one pack of Marlboro Reds a day.

She just doesn't know when.

"Know how I relax? Relieve stress? I get a paint roller and paint a few rooms," LeLeaux said. "That's the easiest thing I've got going."

La. Cattlemen Struggle 1 Year After Rita (AP-Y)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Summer rains have brought back the coast's usual lush green grazing land. Life for Louisiana's cattlemen, however, is far from normal.

A year after Hurricane Rita, the cattlemen say they're still struggling, hampered because the storm tore down hundreds of miles of fences essential to contain their cows, bulls and calves. Even if the fences and the farm structures Rita also destroyed get rebuilt, the storm has forever changed a sliver of southwest Louisiana culture.

"It's not going to be like it was, ever again," said Mike Montie, 41, a second-generation cattleman who evacuated his family's cattle north before the storm.

Category 3 Rita struck here last Sept. 24, flattening Cameron and other towns, its salt water turning the lush grass to brown and killing roughly 30,000 cattle, according to the state agriculture department. The region's cattle farmers produce a tiny fraction of the national industry; the animals killed in Rita had little effect on beef prices.

But along with catching shrimp and drilling for oil, the cowboy life is a generations-old facet of southwest Louisiana's mishmash culture. Cowboys who live in and around Cameron used to run into each other at the feed store, tip their cowboy hats back, kick the dirt with their boots, and swap tips and tales about their cows.

With few of their houses still standing, the cattlemen have moved themselves and their remaining animals north.

"Everybody's so scattered out now. That's the thing you miss: seeing people, the gossip at the post office," said Bobby Montie, 67, Mike Montie's father and a lifelong cattleman from the tiny town of Creole.

Some have begun receiving checks from a federal agricultural program that reimburses them for 75 percent of the value of each animal, up to a total of $80,000. Many cattlemen lost far more; the relief money is not nearly enough to restore their herd. The National Cattleman's Beef Association and other groups have also been donating hay, feed and farm supplies.

But until they can restore their barbed-wire fences, the Monties will keep their cattle on leased land, about 25 miles north, they said.

On Saturday, Gov. Kathleen Blanco, the state's two U.S. senators and other officials gathered in coastal Cameron for a concert, party and a staged cattle drive to commemorate Rita's one-year-anniversary and to honor the cattlemen's recovery effort.

The cowboys mostly ignored the politicians' speeches, munching on hamburgers and focusing instead on reconnecting with the friends they don't see much anymore. Several said they expected to continue putting up new fences, but won't move their animals back to the coast anytime soon.

Donnie Rogers, who lost about 100 cattle in Johnson Bayou in the storm, said: "Nobody's really got big plans to start up again until next year."

WAR NEWS:

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Fuels Terror (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The conflict spreads extremism and serves as a laboratory for deadly tactics, says a bleak analysis by 16 U.S. intelligence units.

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq has made global terrorism worse by fanning Islamic radicalism and providing a training ground for lethal methods that are increasingly being exported to other countries, according to a sweeping assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies.

The classified document, which represents a consensus view of all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, paints a considerably bleaker picture of the impact of the Iraq war than Bush administration or U.S. intelligence officials have acknowledged publicly, according to officials familiar with the assessment.

"They conclude that the Iraq war has made it worse," said a government official familiar with the document who spoke on condition of anonymity because of its classified nature.

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney repeatedly have described the war in Iraq as the central front in the war on terrorism and argue that Americans are safer as a result of the administration's policies.

The report, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," was completed and described to U.S. government officials in April but not made public. The document is what is known as a National Intelligence Estimate, or NIE, which is designed to represent the U.S. intelligence community's most comprehensive treatment of a subject.

The 30-page report documents an array of disturbing trends in the war on terrorism and focuses on forces that are contributing to the evolution of Islamic terrorist networks from centralized structures to an increasingly fragmented ideological movement.

"It paints a fairly stark picture of what we all know, and that this is a movement that is spreading and gaining momentum around the world," said the official familiar with the document. "Things like the Iraq war have given the terrorists recruiting tools and places to ply their trade and a training ground."

The official said the estimate touches on a number of factors fueling the jihadist movement, but that "the reference to Iraq was the main one."

A U.S. intelligence official who has seen the document said that many of the report's findings were outlined in a speech in San Antonio in April by Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the former principal deputy director of national intelligence. Hayden has since become director of the CIA.

Hayden did not single out the Iraq war in the speech as a particularly powerful force shaping terrorist networks. But he did acknowledge "the centrality of Iraq" and said the conflict there and how it is portrayed in Islamic media continue to cultivate support for the global jihadist movement.

In that speech, Hayden said that the global jihadist movement "is spreading and adjusting to our counterterrorism efforts, and it is also exploiting the communications revolution, the Internet."

While describing the Al Qaeda terrorist network as still the most dangerous threat to the United States, Hayden said that Islamic activists were increasingly identifying themselves as jihadists, and that they were "increasing in both their number and in their geographic dispersion."

Hayden went on to say how factors fueling the spread of the movement, including "entrenched grievances — corruption, historic injustice, even fear of Western domination — leave many in parts of the Islamic world with feelings of anger and a sense of powerlessness."

The Bush administration has made the case that a democratic government in the Middle East would serve as a beacon to other nations, providing new hope to populations of disaffected Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0068412

"The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power," Bush said in his speech to the nation on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." He also said that Americans were "safer, but we are not yet safe" from terrorism.

Bush and Cheney frequently have dismissed suggestions that the U.S. presence in Iraq has inflamed anger toward the United States, arguing that U.S. forces were not in Baghdad on Sept. 11, 2001.

In the run-up to November midterm elections, Republicans in Congress have sought to emphasize their credentials on national security and fighting terrorism, uncoupling those issues from the war in Iraq, which is unpopular with voters.

In public testimony and unclassified documents, U.S. intelligence officials have for several years been pointing to the more troubling consequences of the drawn-out conflict in Iraq. In particular, officials have highlighted the anger that Muslim extremists feel about the U.S. presence in the region — which has also been one of Osama bin Laden's rallying cries.

Intelligence officials have also pointed to the flow of Muslims from other countries, including Europe, to Iraq to join the insurgency. Those who survive the fighting often leave and return to their home countries with dangerous new experience in urban fighting, bomb-making and — perhaps most important — credibility with other potential Muslim recruits.

Last week, the House Intelligence Committee warned in a report that the danger from terrorists faced by the U.S. was "more alarming than the threat that existed" before Sept. 11. The document also warned that Iraq had become a breeding ground for terrorists who might target other countries.

The April intelligence estimate was produced under the direction of David B. Low, the national intelligence officer for transnational threats. Its conclusions were first reported by the New York Times on its website on Saturday.

National Intelligence Estimates are produced by the National Intelligence Council, a group of high-level analysts from government and academic institutions. The council was previously based at the CIA. But following intelligence overhauls passed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, the council was restructured to report to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Hurting U.S. Terror Fight (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

The war in Iraq has become a primary recruitment vehicle for violent Islamic extremists, motivating a new generation of potential terrorists around the world whose numbers may be increasing faster than the United States and its allies can reduce the threat, U.S. intelligence analysts have concluded.

A 30-page National Intelligence Estimate completed in April cites the "centrality" of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and the insurgency that has followed, as the leading inspiration for new Islamic extremist networks and cells that are united by little more than an anti-Western agenda. Rather than contributing to eventual victory in the global counterterrorism struggle, it concludes that the situation in Iraq has worsened the U.S. position, according to officials familiar with the classified document.

"It's a very candid assessment," one intelligence official said yesterday of the estimate, the first formal examination of global terrorist trends written by the National Intelligence Council since the March 2003 invasion. "It's stating the obvious."

The NIE, whose contents were first reported by the New York Times, coincides with public statements by senior intelligence officials describing a different kind of conflict than the one outlined by President Bush in a series of recent speeches marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Together with our coalition partners," Bush said in an address earlier this month to the Military Officers Association of America, "we've removed terrorist sanctuaries, disrupted their finances, killed and captured key operatives, broken up terrorist cells in America and other nations, and stopped new attacks before they're carried out. We're on the offense against the terrorists on every battlefront, and we'll accept nothing less than complete victory."

But the battlefronts intelligence analysts depict are far more impenetrable and difficult, if not impossible, to combat with the standard tools of warfare.

Although intelligence officials agree that the United States has seriously damaged the leadership of al-Qaeda and disrupted its ability to plan and direct major operations, radical Islamic networks have spread and decentralized.

Many of the new cells, the NIE concludes, have no connection to any central structure and arose independently. The members of the cells communicate only among themselves and derive their inspiration, ideology and tactics from the more than 5,000 radical Islamic Web sites. They spread the message that the Iraq war is a Western attempt to conquer Islam by first occupying Iraq and establishing a permanent presence in the Middle East.

The April NIE, titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," does not offer policy prescriptions.

"What these guys at NIC are supposed to do is to lay it out in very clear, understandable terms," said the intelligence official. "It's not the role of the NIC to offer recommendations." Rather, it "basically states the conditions" as the intelligence community sees them, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068413

This official and others would only discuss intelligence analyses on the condition of anonymity.

The National Intelligence Council is tasked with providing long-term assessments of strategic issues for the president and senior policymakers in the form of National Intelligence Estimates. Composed of current and former senior intelligence and national security officials, it is currently chaired by Thomas Fingar, the former head of the State Department's intelligence bureau and now deputy for analysis to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte.

An NIE drawn up in the fall of 2002 concluded that Iraq had "continued its weapons of mass destruction [WMD] programs," possessed stockpiles of biological and chemical weapons and "probably will have a nuclear weapon during this decade." All of those judgments, which provided the political and national security underpinnings for the Iraq invasion, turned out to be false.

As part of the intelligence reforms enacted in 2004, control of the NIC was transferred from the CIA director to Negroponte's newly created office, with a mandate to cast a wider net for information throughout the 16-agency intelligence community and among nongovernmental experts.

Negroponte announced last month that the council would begin drafting a new NIE on Iraq in response to a request from the Senate intelligence committee. That estimate is still in the early planning stages, intelligence officials said yesterday. But though the April NIE does not deal specifically with conditions in Iraq, many of its judgments emphasize the influence of the Iraq war on the spread of global terrorism.

According to officials familiar with the document, it describes the situation in Iraq as promoting the spread of radical Islam by providing a focal point, with constant reinforcement of an anti-American message for disaffected Muslims. The Web sites provide a narrative of a war with frequent victories for the insurgents, and describe an occupation that they say regularly targets Islam and its adherents. They also distribute increasingly frequent and sophisticated messages from al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, urging Muslims wherever they are to take up arms against the "Crusaders" on behalf of Iraq.

Both Bush and bin Laden now regularly describe the Iraq war as the "central front" of the global war, and both are depending on victory there to set the direction of future struggles far afield. Although intelligence officials believe bin Laden's ability to direct major terrorist operations has been greatly diminished, his status as the ideological leader of a global movement that appeals to disaffected Muslims has vastly increased.

The conclusions and tone of the NIE have been reflected in a number of public statements by senior intelligence officials this year. In a February speech at Georgetown University, Negroponte said: "My colleagues and I still view the global jihadist terrorist movement, which emerged from the Afghan-Soviet conflict in the 1980s but is today inspired and led by al Qaeda, as the preeminent threat to our citizens, homeland interests and friends."

In a sober and comprehensive address to an armed forces group in Texas in April, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then-deputy to Negroponte and now CIA director, drew heavily from the NIE judgments. If current trends continued, Hayden said, "threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide."

Before delivering the speech, an intelligence official said, Hayden spoke directly to the NIE authors, saying, "I want to make these points" to a public audience.

A series of intelligence assessments on Iraq since the faulty 2002 estimate have portrayed increasingly bleak prospects for democracy-building and stability there.

Even before the invasion, the NIC warned in January 2003 that the aftermath of regime change could include long-term internal conflict. A July 2004 NIE outlined a range of possible outcomes to the increasingly difficult security situation there, with the best prospect a government with only tenuous control and the worst a civil war.

National Intelligence Estimates have often sparked controversy, both for what they have said and what they have omitted. A 1997 estimate, the last on global terrorism before the 2001 al-Qaeda attacks, mentioned bin Laden in only three sentences, describing him only as a "terrorist financier" and making no reference at all to al-Qaeda.

The latest terrorism assessment paints a portrait of a global war in which Iraq is less the central front of actual combat than a unifying battle cry for disparate extremist groups and even individuals. "It is just those kinetic actions that lead to the radicalization of others," a senior counterterrorism official said earlier this summer. "Surgical strikes? Nothing is surgical about military operations. They tend to have impacts, affects."

That description contrasts with Bush's emphasis this month on offensive military action military battles in Iraq and elsewhere as the United States' principal road to victory in the global war.

"Many Americans . . . ask the same question five years after 9/11," he said in an speech in Atlanta earlier this month. "The answer is yes. America is safer. We are safer because we have taken action to protect the homeland. We are safer because we are on the offensive against our enemies overseas. We're safer because of the skill and sacrifice of the brave Americans who defend our people."

DOJ_NMG_0068414

But "a really big hole" in the U.S. strategy, a second counterterrorism official said, "is that we focus on the terrorists and very little on how they are created. If you looked at all the resources of the U.S. government, we spent 85, 90 percent on current terrorists, not on how people are radicalized."

Staff writers Dafna Linzer and Thomas E. Ricks and staff researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terror Threat (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A stark assessment of terrorism trends by American intelligence agencies has found that the American invasion and occupation of Iraq has helped spawn a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the Sept. 11 attacks.

The classified National Intelligence Estimate attributes a more direct role to the Iraq war in fueling radicalism than that presented either in recent White House documents or in a report released Wednesday by the House Intelligence Committee, according to several officials in Washington involved in preparing the assessment or who have read the final document.

The intelligence estimate, completed in April, is the first formal appraisal of global terrorism by United States intelligence agencies since the Iraq war began, and represents a consensus view of the 16 disparate spy services inside government. Titled "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States,'' it asserts that Islamic radicalism, rather than being in retreat, has metastasized and spread across the globe.

An opening section of the report, "Indicators of the Spread of the Global Jihadist Movement," cites the Iraq war as a reason for the diffusion of jihad ideology.

The report "says that the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," said one American intelligence official.

More than a dozen United States government officials and outside experts were interviewed for this article, and all spoke only on condition of anonymity because they were discussing a classified intelligence document. The officials included employees of several government agencies, and both supporters and critics of the Bush administration. All of those interviewed had either seen the final version of the document or participated in the creation of earlier drafts. These officials discussed some of the document's general conclusions but not details, which remain highly classified.

Officials with knowledge of the intelligence estimate said it avoided specific judgments about the likelihood that terrorists would once again strike on United States soil. The relationship between the Iraq war and terrorism, and the question of whether the United States is safer, have been subjects of persistent debate since the war began in 2003.

National Intelligence Estimates are the most authoritative documents that the intelligence community produces on a specific national security issue, and are approved by John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence. Their conclusions are based on analysis of raw intelligence collected by all of the spy agencies.

Analysts began working on the estimate in 2004, but it was not finalized until this year. Part of the reason was that some government officials were unhappy with the structure and focus of earlier versions of the document, according to officials involved in the discussion.

Previous drafts described actions by the United States government that were determined to have stoked the jihad movement, like the indefinite detention of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal, and some policy makers argued that the intelligence estimate should be more focused on specific steps to mitigate the terror threat. It is unclear whether the final draft of the intelligence estimate criticizes individual policies of the United States, but intelligence officials involved in preparing the document said its conclusions were not softened or massaged for political purposes.

Frederick Jones, a White House spokesman, said the White House "played no role in drafting or reviewing the judgments expressed in the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism." The estimate's judgments confirm some predictions of a National Intelligence Council report completed in January 2003, two months before the Iraq invasion. That report stated that the approaching war had the potential to increase support for political Islam worldwide and could increase support for some terrorist objectives.

Documents released by the White House timed to coincide with the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks emphasized the successes that the United States had made in dismantling the top tier of Al Qaeda.

"Since the Sept. 11 attacks, America and its allies are safer, but we are not yet safe," concludes one, a report titled "9/11 Five Years Later: Success and Challenges." "We have done much to degrade Al Qaeda and its affiliates and to undercut the perceived legitimacy of terrorism."

That document makes only passing mention of the impact the Iraq war has had on the global jihad movement. "The ongoing fight for freedom in Iraq has been twisted by terrorist propaganda as a rallying cry," it states.

DOJ_NMG_0068415

The report mentions the possibility that Islamic militants who fought in Iraq could return to their home countries, "exacerbating domestic conflicts or fomenting radical ideologies."

On Wednesday, the Republican-controlled House Intelligence Committee released a more ominous report about the terrorist threat. That assessment, based entirely on unclassified documents, details a growing jihad movement and says, "Al Qaeda leaders wait patiently for the right opportunity to attack."

The new National Intelligence Estimate was overseen by David B. Low, the national intelligence officer for transnational threats, who commissioned it in 2004 after he took up his post at the National Intelligence Council. Mr. Low declined to be interviewed for this article.

The estimate concludes that the radical Islamic movement has expanded from a core of Qaeda operatives and affiliated groups to include a new class of "self-generating" cells inspired by Al Qaeda's leadership but without any direct connection to Osama bin Laden or his top lieutenants.

It also examines how the Internet has helped spread jihadist ideology, and how cyberspace has become a haven for terrorist operatives who no longer have geographical refuges in countries like Afghanistan.

In early 2005, the National Intelligence Council released a study concluding that Iraq had become the primary training ground for the next generation of terrorists, and that veterans of the Iraq war might ultimately overtake Al Qaeda's current leadership in the constellation of the global jihad leadership.

But the new intelligence estimate is the first report since the war began to present a comprehensive picture about the trends in global terrorism.

In recent months, some senior American intelligence officials have offered glimpses into the estimate's conclusions in public speeches.

"New jihadist networks and cells, sometimes united by little more than their anti-Western agendas, are increasingly likely to emerge," said Gen. Michael V. Hayden, during a speech in San Antonio in April, the month that the new estimate was completed. "If this trend continues, threats to the U.S. at home and abroad will become more diverse and that could lead to increasing attacks worldwide," said the general, who was then Mr. Negroponte's top deputy and is now director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

For more than two years, there has been tension between the Bush administration and American spy agencies over the violence in Iraq and the prospects for a stable democracy in the country. Some intelligence officials have said the White House has consistently presented a more optimistic picture of the situation in Iraq than justified by intelligence reports from the field.

Spy agencies usually produce several national intelligence estimates each year on a variety of subjects. The most controversial of these in recent years was an October 2002 document assessing Iraq's illicit weapons programs. Several government investigations have discredited that report, and the intelligence community is overhauling how it analyzes data, largely as a result of those investigations.

The broad judgments of the new intelligence estimate are consistent with assessments of global terrorist threats by American allies and independent terrorism experts.

The panel investigating the London terrorist bombings of July 2005 reported in May that the leaders of Britain's domestic and international intelligence services, MI5 and MI6, "emphasized to the committee the growing scale of the Islamist terrorist threat."

More recently, the Council on Global Terrorism, an independent research group of respected terrorism experts, assigned a grade of "D+" to United States efforts over the past five years to combat Islamic extremism. The council concluded that "there is every sign that radicalization in the Muslim world is spreading rather than shrinking."

Report: Iraq Invasion Spurred Terrorism (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, September 24, 2006

A classified report prepared by U.S. intelligence agencies says the Iraq invasion has made the world less safe from terrorism, The New York Times reports.

The Times story was based on interviews with government officials and outside experts, all of them speaking on condition their names would not be used. The National Intelligence Estimate, "Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States," describes Iraq as a spawning ground for Islamic revolutionaries.

The report reaches different conclusions than those contained in documents released by the Bush administration that focused on the dismantling of al-Qaida.

The Internet has also become a haven for terrorists, the report said, taking the place of the secure base al-Qaida once had in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0068416

However, the report concludes that al-Qaida has become less important with the rise of "self-generating" small groups that use al-Qaida as a model.

New US Intelligence Report Says Terror Spreads Because Of Iraq: Report (AFP)

AFP, September 24, 2006

A new classified US intelligence report has concluded that the war in Iraq has helped spawn a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the September 11, 2001, attacks, The New York Times reported on its website.

The findings contained in the National Intelligence Estimate appear to be in stark contradiction with claims by President George W. Bush and other top administration officials, who insist that Iraq is and will remain the central front in the war on terror.

Citing unnamed officials who have read the final document, the newspaper said that the intelligence estimate, completed in April, is the first formal appraisal of global terrorism by United States intelligence agencies since the Iraq war began and represents a consensus view of the 16 different spy services inside government.

The report "says that the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," the paper quotes one of the officials as saying.

Analysts began working on the estimate in 2004, but it was not finalized until this year, The Times said.

Part of the reason was that some government officials were unhappy with the structure and focus of earlier versions of the document, according to the report.

The paper said that previous drafts described actions by the US government that were determined to have stoked the jihadist movement, like the indefinite detention of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal.

It is unclear whether the final draft of the intelligence estimate criticizes individual policies of the United States, The Times pointed out, but intelligence officials involved in preparing the document said its conclusions were not softened or massaged for political purposes.

Why We Don't Have Enough Troops In Iraq (TIME)

By Brian Bennett And Sally B. Donnelly

Time, September 24, 2006

As the Pentagon weighs whether to put more boots on the ground, TIME examines the reasons behind the U.S.'s chronic manpower shortage

The scenes almost seem lifted from a different war: On a scorching afternoon in Ur, a neighborhood in northeast Baghdad, members of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade are on a charm offensive. The soldiers spent 12 months in the restive city of Mosul, before having their tour in Iraq extended to help in the U.S.'s campaign to pacify Baghdad. The unit's experience shows. They are alert but relaxed, carrying themselves with a gentle posture, weapons down, waving to the locals, talking with them. Kids hold hands with the Americans; an Iraqi mother hands a soldier her baby to hold. Locals invite U.S. officers in to sit and have glasses upon glasses of tea, orange Fanta, Pepsi and Arabic coffee. They don't go into a house without a few Iraqi soldiers who can better gauge if someone looks suspicious. Walking out of one Iraqi home, Lieut. Colonel John Norris, commander of the Stryker 4th Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment Tomahawks, enjoys a moment of guarded optimism. "Days like this you think, wow, they can really do it. If they can just stop the killing."

It's the glimmers of hope that make the realities in Iraq so heartbreaking. Residents of Ur say that with the Strykers around, sectarian murders have all but disappeared. Neighbors emerge from their homes to chat and allow their sons and daughters to play in the street. But the Iraqis and Americans know that such sanity won't last. Though 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have moved to the capital to try to defuse sectarian violence, the level of killing across the city remains as high as ever. That's because the U.S. doesn't have enough troops to maintain the peace in the areas they've secured, instead relying on Iraqi units who have yet to prove they can impose order. In Ghazaliyah, a west Baghdad neighborhood the 172nd Strykers cleared weeks earlier, violence has already gone back up to previous levels. For all the progress made in Ur, the troops know the cycle is bound to repeat itself there too. "We leave," says Sergeant First Class Joshua Brown, as his Stryker pulls out of Ur city, "and it turns into f------ Somalia."

Despite isolated success stories, there is a palpable sense that things are getting worse in Iraq. A U.N. report says a record 6,600 Iraqis were killed in the past two months amid the lawlessness. Major General William Caldwell told reporters last week that six weeks into the battle for Baghdad there was an upward "spike in execution-style murders" in the city. The two major challenges facing the U.S. — quelling Sunni-Shi'ite conflict in Baghdad while subduing the jihadist insurgency in western Iraq — have raised questions among officers in Iraq about whether the U.S. has enough troops to keep the country from falling apart, let alone achieve anything resembling stability. That perception was bolstered this month by a classified Marine intelligence report that estimated the U.S. needed an additional 10,000 to 15,000 troops to defeat al-Qaeda-led rebels in Anbar province. In an acknowledgement of the problem, General John Abizaid last week reversed hints of a drawdown by the end of the year, saying U.S. troops will stay around the current 140,000 in Iraq until next spring.

Will that be enough?

The experience of sending the Strykers to Baghdad indicates that more troops could help in the short term. A growing number of analysts in Washington, including some conservative supporters of the Bush Administration, have called for a substantial increase in U.S. troop levels to stop Iraq's slide into civil war. But expanding the total U.S. force in Iraq remains unlikely — military officials interviewed by TIME say that the U.S. command remains reluctant to make a major manpower boost. To some, that reluctance is indicative of the leadership's broader failure to heed complaints about U.S. troop strength that have been voiced by officers in Iraq for more then three years. "I know I could have used more forces," says a Lieut. Colonel who served in Iraq. "We could have held more territory... I asked, but I'm not sure the request ever made it."

The roots of the U.S.'s current troop shortage stretch back to the earliest days of the occupation. Despite projections by former Army chief of staff General Eric Shinseki that "several hundred thousand soldiers" would be needed to occupy Iraq after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and former U.S. Central Command (Centcom) chief General Tommy Franks chose to go with a much smaller force of 125,000. As the insurgency intensified in 2003 and 2004, government and military sources say Abizaid did not ask the Bush Administration to send reinforcements. The sources say that in at least two White House meetings in 2004, Abizaid told Bush he "had everything he needed." That may have been at odds with what he was being told by officers on the ground. "I wouldn't say [the commanders] lied," says a colonel who served on the Centcom staff during the first year of the war, "but there was some intellectual dishonesty."

Once the force levels were set, the military's complex schedule for mobilizing troops and moving them in and out of the war zone made it difficult to make big increases rapidly. "It was the failure to adapt after the fall of Baghdad that set the Army on [this] course," says one retired officer. "Once you start the process of sustaining a force of 130,000 it is hard to shift."

But that doesn't entirely explain why the shortfalls persist. Military sources say they don't know of specific instances in which Abizaid and Gen. George Casey, the commander of ground troops in Iraq, failed to forward requests for more troops. Still, a senior Army officer says the nature of the Army's command naturally quashes sobering assessments. "One of the big reasons you don't tend to ask for more troops is the culture. If a superior asks how's it going, you say, 'Going great, sir' " says the officer. "It's a can-do culture."

The commanders' tendency to portray the situation in Iraq in a positive light has been compounded by disagreements about whether more U.S. troops, at this point, would intimidate the insurgency or just give them more targets to shoot at. And though the U.S. has enough active-duty troops to accommodate a troop increase, doing so would cause even more pain for the families of Army and Marine grunts, more than a third of whom have already done a tour in Iraq. "No one knows where the red line is that will break the Army," says Washington-based military analyst Andrew Krepinevich, "But Army leaders want to make sure they do everything they can to avoid crossing it."

The military's focus is on pushing Iraqi forces forward to make up for the shortage in U.S. boots on the ground. "The U.S. needs to find out if the Iraqi Army will fight," says Krepinevich. And yet after two years, a good portion of the 300,000 U.S.-trained Iraqi troops on the front lines can't handle the security challenges in Baghdad; in many cases, their willingness to fight is compromised by their sectarian loyalties. During a recent patrol, members of the 172nd ventured to the edge of Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Kids threw bricks at the soldiers and one smashed a fake Molotov cocktail filled with cooking oil against the eight-wheeled armored Stryker vehicle. A military intelligence officer determined the kids were part of a plan by al-Sadr's militia to provoke an attack on civilians that would inflame the population. The next morning, a battalion of the Stryker Brigade organized a rendezvous with Iraqi troops, but the Iraqis never showed. "They failed," says a U.S. company commander. "It's the biggest operation in Baghdad and they failed. That's why they're here."

The question is whether the Iraqis can prove their mettle and win the trust of citizens before the violence spills out of control. For now, the best that troops like the 172nd can hope to do is prevent things from getting worse. At current troop levels, commanders acknowledge the coalition can only clear three neighborhoods in Baghdad at a time. Some military officials have floated the possibility of a "surge" force of fresh troops to try to contain the violence. But that's still a short-term fix for a chronic problem — one that has already exhausted the patience of many Americans. "You can do a surge of 30,000 to 50,000 once or twice, but in an insurgency it's virtually impossible to guarantee that one surge will mean victory," says the retired Army officer. "This is a slow-grind war." And it's becoming harder to know just what it will take to win it.

Bomb Near Group Of Iraqi Women Kills At Least 35 (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0068418

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Hosham Hussein

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 23 — A horrific explosion on Saturday morning in the huge Sadr City district here killed at least 35 people, mostly women and children, when a bomb detonated next to a line of women waiting to receive cooking fuel from a tanker truck, according to residents and officials at nearby hospitals.

Many of the victims were burned to death. Two dozen of the dead were women or girls, as were 26 of the 36 wounded, the hospital officials said. The blast struck at the beginning of the holy month of Ramadan, in which more attacks were expected, given what has happened in past years, according to American and Iraqi officials.

Elsewhere, four Americans were killed. One soldier died after his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb in northern Baghdad on Saturday. Two other soldiers died and three were wounded when a roadside bomb struck their patrol near Kirkuk. An American working as a State Department contractor was killed Friday during a rocket attack in the southern city of Basra, and a Danish soldier was reported killed by a roadside bomb in Basra.

A senior military official in Baghdad said some death squad members captured since United States forces began sweeps through the capital last month also worked for or had affiliation with the Ministry of Interior or other government agencies.

American troops have killed 25 death squad members and captured 215 more since the sweeps began, the official said, adding that most have not had governmental affiliations. There are now 23 militias in Baghdad, said the official.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the delicate nature of the issue. "There is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government."

After the Sadr City blast, a Sunni insurgent group issued an Internet statement claiming credit, and saying the bombing was retaliation for Shiite militia attacks on Sunnis.

Some residents of Sadr City, a huge Shiite slum in northern Baghdad, said the attackers appeared to have exploited the fact that Saturday was the designated day for women to receive long-delayed allotments of kerosene in the Dakhil neighborhood. Men were scheduled to line up for fuel on Sunday, but attacking on Saturday would be easier, they said, because women are often not searched before they join the line.

Some reports quoted the police as saying that the bomb was hidden in a barrel, or in a car parked near the tanker.

Yet Bassim Mohammed, a 40-year-old worker, said one woman pretended she had shown up to receive kerosene but instead carried a bomb hidden inside an empty fuel can. The bomb was apparently detonated by remote control after the woman left, he said.

"It was like an oven," said Mr. Mohammed, who was fighting back tears as he recounted the blast. "Bodies were burned everywhere. I saw seven bodies of small boys. They are just boys! They did nothing. Why do they attack us?"

The casualty toll was worsened, he said, because concrete barriers near the line made it hard for people to flee the blast and the resulting fire.

In another grisly attack, gunmen riding in BMW's discarded nine severed heads in a square in downtown Bayji, north of Baghdad. The gunmen clashed with the police before escaping, according to a Salahaddin provincial spokesman. One of the victims was an interpreter for American forces and the others were army recruits, he said.

A group linked to Al Qaeda posted a Web video on Saturday purporting to show the bodies of two American soldiers being dragged behind a truck and then set on fire, The Associated Press reported. The act was apparently in retaliation for the alleged rape and killing of a young Iraqi woman by American troops from the same unit, the 101st Airborne Division.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an organization of insurgent groups, including Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia — posted a previous video in June showing the soldiers' mutilated bodies, and claiming that it killed them. It was not clear whether video posted Saturday was a continuation of that footage, or why it was released.

In Baghdad, the Iraqi military said American and Iraqi troops captured a leader of one of the most vicious Sunni terrorist groups, Ansar al-Sunna, during a raid early Saturday morning in the restive town of Miqdadiya, northeast of Baghdad. The raid captured Muntasir Hammoudi Alaiwi and two other insurgents, said Brigadier Qassim al-Mussawi. The group took credit for the December 2004 bombing of an Army mess tent in Mosul that killed 18 Americans and four others.

Fiery Blast In Baghdad Kills 38 (WP)

Most Victims Are Women, Children

BAGHDAD, Sept. 23 -- A fiery explosion tore through a line of people waiting to buy fuel on Saturday and killed at least 38 people, most of them women and children, continuing the wave of tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

DOJ_NMG_0068419

The horrific blast sent women engulfed in flames screaming through the streets. Two preteen girls embraced each other as they burned to death, witnesses said. Later, wailing mourners thronged the scene of the blast, which was strewn with the shoes of victims and a woman's bloodied cloak, and voiced doubt that the reprisal violence would ever end.

"We carry our death certificates with us now, waiting only to fill in the date of death," said Bayan Jasem al-Kaaby, 40, a minibus driver, after he was burned by the explosion that rocked the Shiite Muslim slum of Sadr City at about 10 a.m.

A Sunni Arab insurgent group, Jamaat Jund al-Sahaaba, or Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions, asserted responsibility for the bombing. The group said in an Internet statement that the attack was retribution for assaults on Sunnis in the Hurriyah district of Baghdad, where police said two mosques were attacked and five people were killed Friday.

"We tell the malicious Shiites that our swords are able to reach the depths of your areas, so stop the killing" of the Sunni people, the statement said, according to a translation by the Washington-based SITE Institute.

It was not immediately clear what caused the explosion. Jamaat Jund al-Sahaaba asserted that it had detonated a booby-trapped car, but witnesses said they saw a female suicide bomber, wearing a black veil that left only her eyes exposed, detonate explosives as she tried to cut into a line of women waiting for kerosene. The bomber pushed a cart carrying a metal barrel filled with ball bearings, witnesses said.

An Interior Ministry spokesman, Brig. Gen. Mohammed Salman, said at least 31 people were wounded.

By midafternoon, the street where the explosion took place was still littered with abandoned yellow, red and blue jerrycans. Bits of flesh flecked the muddy ground, and blood pooled in front of Um Ali's home, left by a woman who clutched her infant child as she bled from a wound in her neck.

"She mumbled some words incoherently," said Um Ali, 44. "Then she fell at my doorstep and died."

Local residents blamed the blast on Sunnis. "This is the work of the infidels who want to kill the Shiites with the help of the American forces and even this government," said a Shiite militiaman who identified himself as Sheik Mohammed.

Outside a hospital in Sadr City, a woman pummeled her face with her hands and shrieked the name of her dead younger sister Eman, the mother of three children.

"What am I going to say to your children and your husband? What shall I say? That I killed you when I sent you to that gas station?" wailed the woman, who refused to give her name. "I took her along to buy kerosene without her husband's permission. As we stood in line, I told her I had forgotten something and would be back soon. As I reached the end of the alley, the explosion happened and I was thrown on the ground.

"I got up and ran but could not find Eman. She was gone, nothing left of her," the woman cried. "What shall I tell my mother, or her husband, or her children?"

Violence also flared elsewhere across Iraq on Saturday. At about 5:30 p.m. in Baiji, north of Baghdad, six hooded men stepped out of their cars in the middle of the city, removed two large boxes from their trunks and then left the cartons behind, according to police 1st Lt. Musttafa Thabit.

The contents: 10 human heads.

Thabit said the victims appeared to have been either employees or contractors at the U.S. military base in Baiji. "This is the destiny of the traitors," read a note left in each box.

The U.S. military on Saturday announced the deaths of three soldiers. Two of them, assigned to Task Force Lightning, were killed when a bomb exploded while they were on patrol near Kirkuk. Another was killed after his vehicle was struck by a bomb in northern Baghdad.

In Basra, a State Department contractor was killed Friday by a rocket attack, the U.S. Embassy said. No details were released.

Bomb Kills 37 In Iraq; 3 U.S. Troops Die (AP)

By Hamid Ahmed

AP, September 24, 2006

A bomb claimed by a Sunni Arab extremist group killed at least 37 Shiites in Baghdad on Saturday as they stocked up on fuel for Ramadan, just days after the U.S. military warned that sectarian bloodshed could worsen during the Islamic holy month.

The group said it carried out the bombing to avenge a Friday attack by a suspected Shiite death squad on Sunni Arab homes and mosques that killed four people in a mixed Baghdad neighborhood.

Iraq's armed forces said they struck a blow against groups affiliated with al-Qaida in Iraq, announcing the arrest of a senior leader of Ansar al-Sunnah, a radical Sunni group responsible for attacks on U.S. forces, kidnappings and beheadings.

DOJ_NMG_0068420

Al-Qaida in Iraq, meanwhile, put a previously released video on the Internet showing what it said was the group's new leader killing a Turkish hostage two years ago. The statement identifying the masked killer as Abu Ayyub al-Masri couldn't be independently confirmed.

The tape's release was seen as a possible signal by Al-Masri, who was named the group's leader after a U.S. air raid killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June and earlier this month called on Sunnis to step up attacks on American troops.

A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northern Baghdad, and two other American soldiers were killed and three injured when a bomb exploded near their patrol outside Hawija, 150 miles north of the capital, the U.S. command said.

A Danish soldier was also reported killed and eight wounded in a roadside bombing in southern Iraq. He was the fourth Danish soldier to die in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion ousted Saddam Hussein's regime more than three years ago.

The Sunni extremist group Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba — Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions — claimed responsibility for the bomb attack on Shiites in Sadr City, a sprawling slum that is home to more than 2 million people and a stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Police said the bomb went off as people crowded behind a kerosene truck to buy fuel for Ramadan, during which people gather just after sunset for a communal meal to break a daylong abstention from food and water.

Dhiyaa Ali, a 24-year-old college student, said he heard the explosion from his nearby home and ran to the street to help people. He said bodies and blood were everywhere.

"I went into the flames just to get anyone left out of the fire," he told The Associated Press. "I saw a mother holding her child, both of them burned and dead."

Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba blamed al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia for the Friday attack that killed four people in the Hurryah neighborhood, where a Shiite militia last week openly threatened members of the Sunni minority.

"This operation comes in retaliation for the crimes perpetrated by the Mahdi Army against our Sunni people in Baghdad," the group said, warning of more attacks. The authenticity of the statement could not be independently verified.

The killings came on the first day of Ramadan for Sunni Arabs. Shiites, along with the Shiite-led Iraqi government, were expected to declare Sunday as the first day of the holy month, a tangible sign of the differences separating the two Islamic sects.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, spokesman for the U.S.-led military coalition, warned earlier of the danger of Iraq's already severe sectarian violence escalating during Ramadan.

In Kut, a city 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, eight apparent victims of sectarian death squads were turned in at the morgue. Their bodies had been dumped in the Tigris River.

One person was killed and six civilians injured in Saturday evening in a northern Baghdad district when a motorcycle rigged with a bomb exploded, police said.

Caldwell also said a spike in attacks by al-Qaida in Iraq could be coming after the threat issued Sept. 7 by al-Masri.

The video posted on a Web site often used by Islamic extremists was the first purported appearance of al-Masri since he was announced as the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq this summer.

In a statement accompanying the video, the group said the masked man shown shooting a blindfolded Turkish hostage three times in the head was al-Masri. The video was originally released Aug. 2, 2004, but none of the three militants on it were identified at the time.

Another al-Qaida-linked group posted a Web video purporting to show the bodies of two U.S. soldiers being dragged behind a truck in June, then set on fire in apparent retaliation for the alleged rape-slaying of an Iraqi woman by U.S. troops.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida, posted another video in June showing the two soldiers' mutilated bodies and claiming it killed them. It was not clear whether the video posted Saturday was a continuation of that footage.

Muntasir Hamoud Ileiwi al-Jubouri and two aides were captured late Friday near Muqdadiyah, 56 miles northeast of Baghdad, Brig. Qassim al-Mussawi, spokesman for the General Command of the Armed Forces, told The Associated Press.

The Sunni militant group has claimed responsibility for numerous suicide attacks as well as the August 2004 execution of 12 Nepalese hostages and a December 2004 bombing that killed 22 people at a U.S. military mess hall in the northern city of Mosul.

Insurgent violence continued. In the northern city of Beiji, gunmen threw the decapitated heads of 10 Iraqi army soldiers into a popular open-air market, police said.

Iraq Bombing Bloodies Start Of Ramadan (WT/AP)

BAGHDAD -- Sunni terrorists opened the Muslim holy month of Ramadan yesterday with a bomb attack in a Shi'ite neighborhood that killed at least 37 women and children who were purchasing kerosene to cook celebratory evening meals to break each daylong fast.

The Sunni extremist group Jamaat Jund al-Sahaba -- Soldiers of the Prophet's Companions -- claimed responsibility for the bomb attack in Sadr City, a sprawling slum that is home to more than 2 million people and a stronghold of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

U.S. officials had warned of the danger of Iraq's already severe sectarian violence could escalate during Ramadan, when Muslims fast from dawn to dusk.

Meanwhile, a roadside bomb killed a U.S. soldier in northern Baghdad, the U.S. command said without releasing any details.

A Danish soldier also was reported killed, along with eight wounded, in a roadside bombing in southern Iraq. He was the fourth Danish soldier to die in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion ousted Saddam Hussein's regime more than three years ago.

Woman May Have Set Baghdad Bomb (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, September 24, 2006

The holy month of Ramadan opened Saturday in Iraq with a bomb that killed at least 37 people, mostly women lined up for kerosene in Sadr City.

Investigators say the bomb, which set off a massive blast when a tanker truck exploded, may have been placed by a woman, The New York Times reported. Men, who were scheduled to pick up kerosene Sunday, would have been searched.

More than half of those killed or injured were women and girls.

A Sunni group issued a statement claiming responsibility for the bombing and saying it was a response to killings by the Mahdi Army, a Shiite group loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, The Observer reported.

DOJ_NMG_0068422

Bassim Mohammed, an eyewitness to the bombing, told the Times that concrete security barriers may have increased the number of casualties by preventing victims from escaping.

Iraqi defense officials said Saturday the leader of one of the most militant Sunni groups, Ansar al-Sunna, had been arrested about 50 miles north of Baghdad.

U.S. military officials did not immediately confirm the arrest of Sheikh Muntasser Hmoud E'laiwi El-Jbouri, whose group has been tied to al-Qaida.

The group, whose name means Protectors of Faith, fought the U.S.-led occupation and continues to fight the new ruling government.

At least two coalition soldiers were killed by roadside bombs Saturday, military officials said. A U.S. soldier died in northern Baghdad and a Danish soldier was killed in Basra.

Baghdad Blast Kills 35 Waiting For Fuel (LAT)

The dead include 22 women and eight children waiting in an alley to collect rations in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City.

BAGHDAD — A bomb exploded Saturday in an alleyway of a vast Shiite neighborhood where women and children had gathered to collect fuel rations, peppering victims with ball bearings and engulfing them in an inferno that killed at least 35.
